This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. CASES

DECIDED IN THE Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

October Term, 1855, Richmond.

Sale of Land—Case at Bar.—In 1809 C T assuming to act as the agent of M T, sold to M a lot in the town of Lynchburg, and L, from whom M T purchased the lot, conveyed it to M. M T then filed a bill to set aside the sale, and in 1819 the court made a decree setting the sale aside, and directing M to convey the lot to M T. This decree was affirmed in the Court of appeals as far as it went, but the court held that there should have been a decree over in favor of M against C T, and sent the cause back for this purpose. Pending these proceedings M conveyed twenty feet of the lot fronting on Main street to P and ten feet to C, and C purchased the remainder of the lot from R, who had verbally acquired M's right in the subject; and C had enclosed the ten feet first acquired and twenty feet adjoining that part which he bought of R as an alley leading from the street to his house. After the case went back, M T filed an amended bill making C a party, and C filed a cross bill to obtain the benefit of M's rights against C T. In 1834 C died, and the suits were revived in the name of his administrator; and in 1836 there was a decree in the first suit directing a commissioner to convey that part of the lot obtained by C from R to M T, which was done. In 1837 M T conveyed that part of the lot conveyed to him to L, and L conveyed it to G, who died, having devised it to his son the plaintiff.

2 *In 1835, in a friendly suit between the widow and heirs of C, the alley was allotted to the widow, and after her death to C's daughter H. In an action of ejectment brought in 1849 by the son of G against the trustee of H for the twenty feet included in the alley. HELD:

1. Same—Adversary Possession—Effect upon Transfer of Title.—If the ground in controversy was in the actual adversary possession of the widow or daughter of C at the time of the conveyance by M T to L or by L to G, these deeds could not operate as a transfer of the legal title.

2. Same—Same—Same.—The fact that M T was not in possession of the ground in controversy at the date of the decree of 1836 or of the deed of the commissioner to him, would not of itself suffice to restrict the operation of the deed to a mere transfer of a right of entry which he could not transfer to another. Nor would the fact of his not being in possession when he conveyed to L, prevent the transfer of the title to L. To prevent the transfer of the title, the possession must have been adversary in another.

3. Same—Decrees—Effect on Those Not Parties.—The suit not having been revived against the heirs of C, they are not concluded by the decree of 1836, upon the principle which binds parties to a judgment or decree.

4. Adversary Possession—Case at Bar.—There being nothing in the amended bill or any other part of the proceedings having special reference to the part of the lot bought of R by C, the decree does not ascertain that C was a purchaser of the lot pendente lite; and the defendant is not thereby estopped from setting up an adversary possession anterior to its date.

5. Evidence—Decrees—Conclusiveness of—Case at Bar.—Though the decree was conclusive evidence that such a decree had been rendered, it was not conclusive against the heirs of C that he was a pendente lite purchaser.

6. Instructions—Evidence Tending to Prove the Supposed Case.—When there is any evidence tending to make out the case supposed in an instruction, it is best and safest to give the instruction if it propounds the law correctly.

In the year 1809, Charles Terrill, assuming to act as the agent and by the authority of Micajah Terrill, sold to Robert Morris a lot in the corporation of Lynchburg, known as No. 79, and procured from John Lynch, who had sold the said lot to Micajah Terrill, but still held the legal title thereto, a deed for the same to said Morris.

Soon afterwards, Micajah Terrill, who

*Instructions—Evidence Tending to Prove the Supposed Case.—For the proposition laid down in the principal case that, when there is any evidence tending to make out the case supposed in the instructions, it is best and safest to give the instructions if it propound the law correctly, see the principal case cited and followed in New York, etc., Railroad Co. v. Thomas, 92 Va. 611, 24 S. E. Rep. 264; Chesapeake & Ohio R. Co. v. Anderson, 93 Va. 657, 25 S. E. Rep. 947; Washington, etc., R. Co. v. Lacey, 94 Va. 468, 26 S. E. Rep. 834; Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Whittington, 30 Gratt. 816; Gordon v. The City of Richmond, 83 Va. 439, 2 S. E. Rep. 727; Honesty v. Com., 81 Va. 297; Dickinson v. Dickinson, 25 Gratt. 330; State of W. Va. v. Betsall, 11 W. Va. 729; Michie v. Cochran, 93 Va. 648, 25 S. E. Rep. 884.

In the last-named case the court after approving the rule above laid down said: "It is still nevertheless the duty of the court, before giving the instruction to determine whether there is any evidence upon which it may be founded."

was then in the western country, filed
3 his bill in the County court *of Campbell county, on the chancery side thereof, repudiating said sale, and seeking to set the same aside, and obtain a reconveyance of the property to him, and he made the said Charles Terrill, Robert Morris and John Lynch parties to the suit.

The suit remained on the docket of the County court until the year 1818, when, by consent, it was removed to the Superior court of chancery for the town of Lynchburg, where such proceedings were had, that on the 18th day of May 1819 a decree was rendered by said court, disaffirming the sale aforesaid, and requiring Morris to reconvey the land to Micajah Terrill, and to pay the costs of the suit.

From this decree Morris appealed to the Court of appeals; and that court, on the 22d day of November 1823, affirmed the decree as far as it went, but declared it erroneous in not giving Morris a decree over against the estate of Charles Terrill for the amount paid him, with interest, costs, &c.; and sent the case back to the court below, for accounts, &c., and for relief to Morris.

In 1824, this decree of the Court of appeals was entered in the court below, and a decree was rendered by that court in conformity therewith.

Pending these proceedings, or prior to the institution of the suit, (which, it does not appear,) Robert Morris had conveyed a portion of the lot in controversy, fronting twenty feet on second or Main street, to one John Pointer, and another portion, fronting ten feet on same street, to Dr. John J. Cabell; and on the 9th day of September 1823, Dr. Cabell purchased from one Robert L. Coleman, who had verbally acquired Morris' rights in the subject, the residue of said lot No. 79, the same being contiguous to the ten feet purchased of Morris as aforesaid, and fronting one hundred and thirty-five feet on second or Main street.

After the case came back from the 4 Court of appeals, *viz: in October 1825, the plaintiff, by an amended bill, made Dr. Cabell a party defendant; and some time afterwards, (the record does not show the date,) Dr. Cabell filed in the same court a bill in the nature of a cross bill, referring to the proceedings in Terrill's suit, and seeking to secure to himself the benefit of Morris' claim against Charles Terrill's estate.

The two suits lingered on the docket without final decree in either, until the death of Dr. Cabell in 1834, when they were both revived in the name of his administrator, Thomas R. Friend; but the widow and heirs of Dr. Cabell were not made parties.

On the 22d day of October 1836, a final decree was entered in the two suits, directing, in the first suit, a conveyance by James Benagh, a special commissioner of the court, to Micajah Terrill, of so much of the lot in the proceedings mentioned as had not been conveyed by Morris to Pointer and Cabell; and quieting said Cabell and Pointer and those claiming under them, in their respective purchases, and in the cross suit decreeing to Friend, as administrator of Cabell, the balance shown to be due from Charles Terrill's estate to Morris, &c.

In pursuance of this decree, Commissioner Benagh, on the 29th of October 1836, executed the deed thereby required.

The defendants introduced evidence to prove that prior to the death of Dr. Cabell in 1834, he had enclosed the ten feet lot purchased by him of Morris and twenty feet of the lot purchased by Coleman, forming an alley of thirty feet front on Main Street, and running back to the mansion-house lot of said Cabell. The twenty feet purchased by Coleman, and making a part of the alley, is embraced by the deed from Benagh, commissioner, to Terrill, and forms the subject of controversy. The plaintiff also introduced evidence to prove that the 5 lot had not been enclosed until a *short time before the action was instituted, and that Dr. Cabell did not claim to hold the lot adversely to the title of the plaintiff. The evidence is stated by Judge Lee in his opinion.

After Dr. Cabell's death, viz: in 1835, a friendly suit was instituted in the Hustings court for the corporation of Lynchburg, by a portion of his heirs at law against his widow and the residue of his heirs, for an assignment of dower to the widow, and a division of his lands among the heirs of said Cabell; and a decree was rendered, by which the mansion-house lot, with the alley aforesaid, was assigned to Harry Ann Cabell, widow of said John J. Cabell, as part of her dower.

Mrs. Cabell died in 1843; and after her death the mansion-house lot and alley aforesaid were assigned by another decree made in another suit between the heirs of Dr. Cabell, to his daughter Henrian Cabell; and in 1846, she, being about to marry Samuel H. Early, conveyed the same, with other property, to Jubal A. Early in trust for her benefit.

In the year 1837, Micajah Terrill and wife conveyed to John Lynch the entire lot mentioned in the deed from Benagh, commissioner, embracing the twenty feet of said alley mentioned above as being in dispute.

In February 1837, John Lynch conveyed the same property to Maurice H. Garland; and by his last will, duly recorded on the 13th of October 1840, in the Hustings court of Lynchburg, Maurice H. Garland, after some specific bequests, devised his whole remaining estate to his son, Samuel Garland, jr.

In December 1849, Samuel Garland, jr. instituted his action of ejectment against Jubal A. Early, for that portion of the alley aforesaid fronting twenty feet on Main street, which is embraced by the deed from Benagh to Micajah Terrill.

After all the evidence had been introduced, the defendant moved the court

6 to give to the jury eight *several instructions; but the court refused to give any except the seventh. It is only necessary to state the first, second and third.

1st. If Micajah Terrill was not in possession of the lot of ground in controversy in the case of Terrill v. Morris & others, at the time of the decree pronounced in said case on the 22d day of October 1836, and at the time the deed from Commissioner Benagh to him, made in pursuance of said decree, was executed, the said decree and deed merely conferred upon said Micajah Terrill a right of entry which he could not transfer to another. And unless he had reduced the said lot of ground into possession at the time he made the deed of bargain and sale to John Lynch on the 14th day of March 1837, the said last named deed conveyed no title to the said John Lynch.

2d. If at the time Micajah Terrill executed the deed of bargain and sale to John Lynch, dated the 14th day of March 1837, Mrs. Harry Ann Cabell, as the widow of John J. Cabell, was in the adverse possession of the lot or parcel of ground in controversy, under an assignment of dower or otherwise, the said deed conferred no title on the said John Lynch to the said lot or parcel of ground.

3d. If at the time of the execution of the deed of bargain and sale from John Lynch to Maurice H. Garland, dated the 4th day of February 1838, Mrs. Harry Ann Cabell, as the widow of John J. Cabell, was in the adverse possession of the lot or parcel of ground in controversy, under an assignment of dower or otherwise, the said deed conferred no title upon the said Maurice H. Garland to the said lot or parcel of ground.

The fourth instruction asked, was that fifteen years' adverse possession under claim of title by the defendant and those under whom he claimed, was a bar to the action. And the fifth was, that the 7 like possession *of John J. Cabell for more than five years, and his dying in possession, was a bar to the action.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff: Whereupon Early applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

Stanard and Bouldin, for the appellant.
Garland and Slaughter, for the appellee.

LEE, J. The only questions material to be considered in this case are those on the first, second and third instructions asked for by the defendant. For if at the time of the execution of the deed from Terrill to Lynch or that from the latter to M. H. Garland the premises in controversy were in the actual adversary possession of those under whom the defendant claims such deed could not operate as a transfer of the legal title and as the plaintiff claims no otherwise than through these deeds, he must fail in this action. On the other hand, if at the time of these deeds or either of them, there was no such adversary possession, then any question upon the statute of limitations is out of the case; for even if the Code of 1849 did not extend the period of limitation (a question upon which I express no opinion) still to make out the bar the possession must have been adversary for at least fifteen years before the suit and must therefore have been carried back continuously embracing the period of both deeds to the 21st of December 1834: nor is it necessary to enquire whether the right of entry was tolled by descent cast from Dr. Cabell, because if so tolled, yet if the possession were afterwards surrendered, the descent cast would become immaterial, or if it were abandoned the right of entry would be restored as the law will refer the possession to him who hath the right. Clarke's lessee v. Courtney, 5 Peters' R. 318, 354; Taylor's devisees v. Burnsides, 1 Gratt. 165, 8 191. *Thus the duration and character of Dr. Cabell's possession become unimportant except so far only as the latter may serve to illustrate the character of the possession of those who came in under and after him.

That Micajah Terrill was not himself in possession of the lot in controversy in the suit against Morris at the date of the decree of the 22d of October 1836 nor that of the deed from the commissioner would not of itself suffice to restrict the operation of the deed to a mere transfer of right of entry which he could not transfer to another; nor although he had not yet taken actual possession himself at the time of his conveyance to Lynch does it therefore follow that no title passed to Lynch. Another element is required to prevent those deeds from operating as transfers of the legal title. The lot must not only have been in the possession of another but that possession must have been under such circumstances and accompanied with such a claim of title as would render it adversary to Terrill. Actual possession by the grantor is not indispensable to give effect to his deed, for if the possession held by another be of a fiduciary character or if its origin and continuance were such as not to amount to a disseizin except at the election of the owner for the purposes of the remedy, it will not impede the operation of the deed. Duval v. Bibb, 3 Call 362; Tabb v. Baird, Ibid. 475; Jackson v. Todd, 2 Caines' R. 183; Williams v. Snidow, 4 Leigh 14. As the first instruction therefore merely supposed the want of actual possession in Terrill without at all referring to the character of the possession of those by whom it was in fact held, the court may for this cause have very properly refused to give it.

The second and third instructions would seem to be unexceptionable in the statement of the rule of law which they undertook to propound, and the only ground upon which the refusal to give them is to be 9 *sustained is either that they presented mere abstract propositions irrelevant and immaterial because there was nothing in the evidence upon which to found the hypothetical case assumed, or that the defendant was in some way es-topped or concluded from alleging the possession to have been adversary at the periods referred to. The hypothesis was of adversary possession in a party claiming under Dr. Cabell under whom also the defendant claimed both title and possession: and it was not enough that the court should have thought the evidence of the defendant insufficient to make out such possession or that the proofs which he offered were overcome by stronger and more cogent proofs the other way. Whether adversary possession or not depends upon the fact of possession and the circumstances under which it was taken and held, especially the animus of the party holding and whether with a claim of title or without any such claim. Thus it was a matter proper for the jury and if there was any evidence tending to show possession and that it was of an adversary character not consistent with the plaintiff's title, the instructions should not have been refused. For where there is evidence tending to make out the supposed case however inadequate in the opinion of the court or to however little weight it may be deemed entitled it is best and safest to give the instruction if it propound the law correctly. Hopkins v. Richardson, 9 Gratt. 485; Farish v. Reigle, 11 Gratt. 697, 719.

Now it would seem impossible to say there was a total want of evidence tending to make out the adversary possession supposed. There was such proof however much it may have conflicted with other evidence in the case or been overweighed by the opposing proofs of the plaintiff. It was proved that Dr. Cabell enclosed the ground in controversy by a fence which also enclosed another parcel of ground belonging to him, making of the whole an alley thirty 10 feet wide: *that he erected a gate leading from the street into the alley thus enclosed and another gate leading from the same into a back lot on which his mansion-house was situated: that he used the ground so enclosed as an alley and wagon and carriage way to his mansion-house lot up to the time of his death and that he occupied a small building that stood on the ground in dispute as a lodging-house for servants. It was in evidence that after his death the ground in controversy was assigned to his widow as part of her dower in his real estate and was used and enjoyed by her as such up to the time of her death in 1843: that after her death the same was allotted to Mrs. Early, then Miss Henrian Cabell a daughter of Dr. Cabell, along with the mansion-house property, as a part of her share of his estate and had been used and enjoyed by her and her tenants up to the commencement of the suit. It was also proved that the mansion-house lot was so situated and so surrounded by other lots and steep cliffs that the alley consisting of the ground in dispute and other ten feet adjoining was the only practicable way to and from it for carriages and vehicles, and that the small brick building on the disputed ground had been removed by the defendant since the suit. One of the witnesses also deposed that M. H. Garland the father of the plaintiff had on one occasion admitted that the line separating the alley of thirty feet from the residue of the lot which was the line claimed by the defendant was the true line between the lot purchased by him from John Lynch and the property belonging to the estate of Dr. Cabell. It is true there was evidence offered by the plaintiff of various acts and declarations of Dr. Cabell tending to show that his possession never was adversary to the title of the plaintiff nor so regarded by himself. The allegations of his answer and cross bill in the case of Micajah Terrill v. Morris, &c., were referred to in this connexion.
11 But however *persuasive this evidence may have been, still the whole evidence upon the subject was not perfectly reconcilable and it was proper the jury should weigh it and decide upon the controverted fact. Certainly it cannot be said there was no evidence tending to make out the case which the defendant assumed.

But it is said Dr. Cabell was a party in the chancery suit and that the question both of title and possession must be regarded as res adjudicata under the decree of October 1836; and that even if he had never been a party, yet as he was a purchaser pendente lite, those claiming under him are concluded by that decree and thus estopped from setting up any possession as adversary to the title of the plaintiff.

It is true Dr. Cabell was made a party by an amended bill, but he died in August 1834 and his death was suggested on the record in February 1835. The case was however never revived against his heirs, so that they cannot be concluded by the decree of October 1836 upon the principle which binds those who are parties to a cause at the time a judgment or decree is pronounced and thus have had opportunity to make full defence. Nor is there anything on the face of the decree to authorize the court upon a bare inspection to hold them estopped from setting up an adversary possession even anterior to its date in a subsequent action. It does not ascertain that Dr. Cabell was a purchaser pendente lite. That question was not in issue in the cause. The amended bill contains no allegation whatever in reference to the twenty feet now in controversy. The purchase which it imputes to Dr. Cabell was of the other ten feet not now in controversy. Nor does it make Coleman, of whom Dr. Cabell purchased the twenty feet, a party or allude to him in any manner whatever. It is true Dr. Cabell in his answer states that he purchased the lot of Coleman during the pendency of the case in the Court of 12 *appeals and that Coleman had derived his interest from Morris though he does not state clearly when; but there is nothing more in the whole case upon this subject. This cannot amount to an estoppel upon the question of adversary possession, in a subsequent action, upon which the court can undertake to pronounce and hold the party concluded. It was but evidence to go to the jury as the admission of Dr. Cabell to have such weight as they might deem it entitled to, in common with the other evidence offered of his acts and declarations. The decree was no adjudication of the question whether Dr. Cabell was a purchaser under such circumstances that he and those claiming under him would be bound thereby, nor could it be conclusive upon that question. It was evidence and conclusive of the fact that such a decree had been rendered, but it was not conclusive as against the heirs of Dr. Cabell who were no parties, and whose ancestor the record itself showed was dead at the time it was pronounced, that that ancestor was such a purchaser. Even as against a party a judgment or decree is held to be conclusive only upon what was brought directly in issue and not upon a matter incidentally brought into controversy. Duchess of Kingston's Case, 20 How. St. Tr. 358, 538; 1 Phil. Ev. 321, Cow. & Hill's n. 557; Arnold v. Arnold, 17 Pick. R. 4; 1 Stark. Ev. (Phil. ed. 1830), p. 198. And as to those who are no parties though it is always evidence to prove that such judgment or decree was rendered yet it is not so as a medium of proof of ulterior facts upon which it was founded or which may be recited in the record. 1 Stark. Ev. 191 and n; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 527, 538. Of necessity in a subsequent and separate suit against one who was no party to the previous cause, but whom it is sought to hold bound by the judgment as a purchaser pendente lite, resort must be had to proof extrinsic to the judgment that he stood in cir-

13 cumstances *which made the judgment so binding upon him. And although in the record there may be an admission or declaration in regard to the fact it is admitted in evidence against him not as a judgment conclusively establishing the fact but as a deliberate declaration or admission that the fact was so, as indeed it might be admitted for such purpose even in favor of a stranger; and it is to be treated according to the principles governing admissions to which class it properly belongs. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 527, a. In this case it will be noticed the plaintiff introduced Robert Morris as a witness before the jury and sought to prove by him that Coleman's authority to sell the lot was acquired and the sale made by him to Dr. Cabell while the case was pending in the Court of appeals.

If the decree then was not conclusive upon its face as to the character of the previous possession, still less could it be so as to that of Mrs. Cabell's possession after the decree under the assignment of dower. And if it even were so as to the former that could be no good reason why it should be so also as to the latter.

No aid is derived to the argument from the cross bill filed by Dr. Cabell or from the fact that the decree was in that case as well as in the original cause, both being heard together. The object of this bill was to assert the right which Dr. Cabell alleged he had acquired by purchase from Morris of his claim against the estate of Charles Terrill and the decree as to it simply provided for the payment to the administrator of Dr. Cabell of the amount agreed to be due. But the heirs were not parties in this cross suit and there is nothing in it to estop them upon the question of adversary possession. The allegations of the bill, like those of the answer in the original suit, would of course be evidence against them, but they belong to the class of admissions not to that of judgments and decrees by which the fact is conclusively established.

14 *Upon the question of adversary possession as presented by the second and third instructions, I think it should have been left to the jury to weigh the evidence and draw from it the proper conclusion. Undoubtedly the court might instruct the jury as to the nature and effect of the lis pendens as it might upon any other question of law involved in the enquiry, but to withdraw the case in this form from the jury by first passing upon a question of fact and then refusing the instructions because in its opinion the evidence failed to prove the case assumed would as it seems to me necessarily involve a confusion of the boundaries separating the province of the court from that which properly belongs to the jury.

What has been said disposes of the fourth, fifth and sixth instructions, also. The seventh was given by the court but the eighth appears to have passed sub silentio. The failure to give it has however not been assigned as error, nor do I perceive in what view it could be with success. But for the refusal of the court to give the second and third instructions, I am of opinion to reverse the judgment and remand the cause for a new trial.

DANIEL and SAMUELS, Js., concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

ALLEN, P., and MONCURE, J., dissented. They thought that Cabell was a pendente lite purchaser, and that his possession of the lot was not adverse, but permissive.

Judgment reversed.

October Term, 1855, Richmond.

1. Discharge in Bankruptcy Conclusive upon Creditors—A decree discharging a bankrupt from his debts under the act of congress of August 19th, 1841, is conclusive upon all his creditors in all suits which may be brought against him in any court, except where the discharge is impeached for some fraud or willful concealment by the bankrupt of his property or rights of property, contrary to the provisions of that act.

2. Same—Impeachment of—Grounds.—Creditors who have not proved their debts in the proceeding in bankruptcy, may institute suits to set aside fraudulent conveyances made by their debtor before he petitioned for the benefit of the bankrupt law; and may impeach his discharge in bankruptcy on the ground of fraud or the willful concealment of his property or rights of property contrary to the provisions of the act of congress; such suit being instituted more than two years after the decree of discharge in bankruptcy.

3. Same—Same—Courts Which Have Jurisdiction.—Such suits may be instituted in any court, state or federal, in which, independent of the bankrupt act, a suit may be properly brought against the bankruptcy.†

4. Same—Limitation of Suits—To Whom Applicable.—The limitation of two years after the decree in bankruptcy or after the cause of suit shall first have accrued, provided in § 8 of the bankrupt act, has relation to proceedings by or against the assignee in bankruptcy; and does not apply to suits by creditors who have not proved their debts to set aside fraudulent conveyances by the bankrupt. The only effect of this provision on such creditors is to prevent such a suit until the two years have expired.†

5. Same—Impeachment by Creditor—Grounds—Statute.‡—A creditor of a discharged bankrupt who has not proved his debt in the proceeding in bankruptcy, may under the statute, Code, ch. 179, § 2, p. 677, file his bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance made by the bankrupt and impeach his
16 discharge on the ground of *fraud or a willful concealment of his property, without having first recovered a judgment against the bankrupt.§

6. Fraudulent Conveyance—Bill to Set Aside—Parties.—In a bill by a creditor to set aside a conveyance of his debtor as fraudulent, a deed of trust having been given by the vendee to secure the purchase money, and the debtor and the trustee in the deed of trust stating in their answers that the bonds given for the purchase money had been assigned by the debtor before the institution of the suit to a person named, the plaintiff should be required to make such person a party to the suit, if upon a rule for the purpose, it appears he is an assignee of any of said bonds.

In the year 1839, and for years previous thereto, Ira Tichenor carried on the coach-making business in the city of Richmond; and he had taken into partnership with him a certain Isaac L. Cary. On the 10th of October 1839 Tichenor executed to Benjamin W. Green two bonds, each for five thousand dollars; one of them payable on the 10th of October 1842 and the other on the 10th of October 1844; and both bearing interest from the date.

On the 19th of October 1839 the first of these bonds was assigned by Green to Joseph Allen, Tichenor having first assured Allen that it should be paid if he took it; and on the 24th of November following the second bond was assigned by Green to G. N. Clough.

On the 5th of March 1840 Tichenor and wife, in consideration, as expressed in the deed, of fifteen thousand dollars, conveyed to Isaac L. Cary one undivided moiety of a lot on Broad street in the city of Richmond, on which was situated Tichenors' coach-making shop, with an undivided moiety of all the buildings thereon, and also one 17 full moiety of all the *vehicles of every description, and the harness complete, then in the shop aforesaid, and of all the tools and materials for carrying on the business.

By deed bearing date on the same day Cary conveyed to Gustavus A. Myers and Hamilton Crenshaw the undivided moiety of the lot and buildings aforesaid in trust to secure the payment of seven single bills, each for two thousand one hundred and forty-two dollars and eighty-one cents, and payable with interest on the 1st of January 1844, 1845, 1846, 1847, 1848, 1849 and 1850. Two of these bonds, with the deed to secure them, were assigned by Tichenor to Joseph Allen on the 1st day of July 1840.

On the 28th day of January 1841 Tichenor and wife, in consideration, as expressed in the deed, of fifteen thousand dollars, conveyed to Cary the other undivided moiety of the said lot and the buildings thereon.

*Discharge in Bankruptcy—Impeachment of—Grounds.—The proposition laid down in the second and third headnotes of the principal case is approved in Beall v. Walker, 26 W. Va. 746, the court saying: "Under the same act (Bankruptcy Act of August 19, 1841) it was held that creditors, who had not proved their debts in the proceedings in bankruptcy, might institute suits to set aside fraudulent conveyances made by their debtor, before he petitioned for the benefit of the bankrupt law, and might impeach his discharge in bankruptcy on the ground of fraud or the willful concealment of his property or rights of property contrary to the provisions of the act of Congress; such suits being instituted more than two years after the decree of discharge in bankruptcy; that such suits might be instituted in any court, State or Federal, in which independent of the bankrupt act a suit might be properly brought against the bankrupt. (Tichenor v. Allen, 13 Gratt. 15.)"

†See the opinion of JUDGE DANIEL for the statute.

‡Same—Same—Statute.—The proposition laid down in the fifth headnote of the principal case, that a creditor of a discharged bankrupt who has not proved his debts in the proceeding in bankruptcy, may under the statute, Va. Code 1849, ch. 179, § 2, file his bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance made by the bankrupt and impeach his discharge on the ground of fraud or willful concealment of his property, without first having recovered his judgment against the bankrupt, is quoted with approval in Zell Guano Co. v. Heatherly, 38 W. Va. 415, 18 S. E. Rep. 612, following a similar statute in that state; Code of W. Va. 1891, ch. 133, § 2. See also, Watkins v. Wortman, 19 W. Va. 78; Tuft v. Pickering, 28 W. Va. 330; Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. Rep. 874.

§Code, ch. 179, § 2, p. 677. "A creditor, before obtaining a judgment or decree for his claim, may institute any suit to avoid a gift, conveyance, assignment or transfer of or charge upon, the estate of his debtor, which he might institute after obtaining such judgment or decree; and he may in such suit have all the relief in respect to said estate which he would be entitled to after obtaining a judgment or decree for the claim which he may be entitled to recover."

And on the same day Cary conveyed the same to James Beale and Robert G. Scott in trust to secure three bonds of five thousand dollars each, payable with interest on the 28th of January 1843, 1844 and 1845. All these deeds were regularly admitted to record.

On the 5th of June 1841 the Bank of Virginia recovered a judgment against Tichenor for two hundred dollars, with interest from the 21st of October 1839 until paid; and he having been taken in execution upon this judgment, on the 8th of October 1841 took the oath of an insolvent debtor, and was discharged from custody; having declared in his schedule that he had no effects, either real or personal, or debts due to him.

In February 1842 Tichenor applied by petition to the judge of the District court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia for the benefit of the bankrupt law. In the schedule of his debts accompanying his petition are debts ac-
18 knowledged by *him to be justly due to the Bank of Virginia and James D. Ellett. Then follows a list of debts which he says are claimed of him, but their justice is denied. Of these are the debts due to Allen and Clough of five thousand dollars each, and another due to John Mosby of one thousand two hundred dollars. In the schedule of his assets he states that having been constrained to take the oath of an insolvent debtor under the laws of Virginia during the fall of 1841, he had no property of any kind and no debts due to him.

Upon his petition Tichenor was declared a bankrupt, and a commissioner was directed to report an account of his debts. This report was made in July 1842, from which it appears that notice was given to all the creditors, but that none of them appeared before the commissioner to prove their debts. On the 13th of July the decree was made discharging the said Tichenor from all his debts.

In March 1852 Joseph Allen instituted a suit in the Circuit court of Richmond against Tichenor, Cary, Beale and Scott, the trustees in the second deed of trust, and the Bank of Virginia. In his bill he stated the execution of the bond for five thousand dollars by Tichenor to Green, and its assignment by Green to himself; and charged that Tichenor, with a knowledge of that assignment, with intent to defraud him, in fraudulent concert with Cary executed the deed of the 28th of January 1841 to Cary for the pretended consideration of fifteen thousand dollars; and that for the pretended purpose of securing the purchase money in three installments of five thousand dollars each, Cary had executed the deed of trust to Beale and Scott. He charged that the consideration for which the deed purports to be made was false and fictitious; that it never was intended that Cary should pay that money or any money for the property, for that he was without the means to pay for it.
19 That the object of Tichenor *and Cary in making the deeds, was to hold Cary out to the world as the owner of the property, whilst it would remain as it did remain, the property of Tichenor. That when taken under the execution sued out by the Bank of Virginia Tichenor had given in a schedule stating that he had no property or debts due him, which statement was charged to be false, and was made in continuation of the same fraudulent intent; and that he then was and continued still to be the owner of the property. That the trustees had never been called upon to execute the trust, though it could not be pretended that Cary had paid the money. And that Tichenor had continued ever since the execution of the deeds in the occupation of the property and to hold and enjoy it as his own.

The bill stated the application by Tichenor for the benefit of the bankrupt law of the United States, and his discharge by the decree of the District court of the United States; and insisted that it afforded no bar to the plaintiff's suit, because of the fraud and willful concealment by Tichenor of his property, contrary to the provisions of said act. And it proceeded to specify the fraud and concealment, as consisting in concealing his property in said lot and buildings; or if there was a sale to Cary, in concealing his property in the bonds given for the purchase money: And also that he fraudulently omitted to embrace in the schedule accompanying his petition in bankruptcy a large amount of personal property belonging to him, consisting of carriages, harness, tools and stocks of raw materials used in the coachmaking business.

The bill further stated that the proceedings in bankruptcy in the case of said Tichenor had long since terminated. That no step had been taken by Edmund Christian, the assignee in bankruptcy, in said proceedings, or by any creditor therein, or at his instance, to assert any claim against the property herein before 20 *mentioned, or to recover the same, or against Cary or Tichenor or any one else in respect thereof or of the bonds aforesaid. Nor was any objection made in the course of said proceedings, that Tichenor had not surrendered the said property or bonds in his schedule; and that much more than two years had elapsed since Tichenor was declared a bankrupt, and since his discharge and the final termination of all proceedings in the case; and that all such proceedings were then barred by the eighth section of the act of congress before referred to. That the plaintiff was no party to the said proceedings, and in no wise bound thereby. That Christian was dead, and that there was then no assignee in his place.

The bill prayed that if Tichenor relied on his certificate of discharge as a bankrupt, it might be declared null and void. That the two deeds of January 28th, 1841, might be set aside as null and void; and that after satisfying the debt of the Bank of Virginia, the property embraced in said deeds might be subjected to the plaintiff's debt; and for general relief.

Tichenor answered the bill. He stated the first sale and conveyance of one moiety of the lot, &c., the execution of seven bonds, the payment of two of them by Cary, and the assignment of the other five bonds to David Hayes of the state of New Jersey, who had assigned them to David A. Hayes. That he (Tichenor) assigned the bonds to David Hayes in part satisfaction of a large indebtedness to the said David Hayes, then bona fide and really existing. That in 1841, finding himself involved in pecuniary difficulties, he sold the other moiety of said lot and buildings to Cary at the price of fifteen thousand dollars, for which Cary executed his three bonds each for five thousand dollars; and that the deeds of January 28th, 1841, were executed. That these bonds were also assigned to David Hayes, 21 who had assigned them to *David A. Hayes, who was then the bona fide holder of them. That David Hayes had since died. That these assignments were made on account of a debt which respondent owed to David Hayes. And he denies all fraud in the said deeds and assignments.

He further alleged that the plaintiff had no legal or just demand against him. That though it was true he executed the bond to Green, he in fact executed it for the accommodation of Green, who was to pay the bond when it became due: And he states that he has been informed that the bond was assigned by Green to the plaintiff as a collateral security for certain claims which have been discharged; and that Allen therefore had no right to the bond. He further pleaded his discharge as a bankrupt, and filed the decree of discharge; and he also relied upon the lapse of time. He denied that he had concealed his property or effects from his just creditors, or that he had resorted to any fraudulent means to defeat their claims. He said that the claim on Cary was no longer his; but belonged to David A. Hayes of New Jersey.

Beside the papers referred to in the bill and answer in this case, several depositions were filed in May 1852, which showed that Cary had no means with which to purchase the property mentioned in the deeds to him; and that he had paid no part of the purchase money. That from 1840 to 1846 he was frequently sued for small sums, and though in the early part of that period he paid when sued, towards the latter period he failed to pay, and finally took the benefit of the act for the relief of insolvent debtors, upon an execution issued by a justice for a sum less than twenty dollars. Wellington Goddin, who was plaintiff as administrator in another suit which will be mentioned presently, stated that Cary informed him that the object of the sale was to avoid the payment of some debt to Joseph Al-
22 len; and his impression *from that conversation was that the purchase money was not intended to be paid, but that the sale was only intended to avoid the payment of Tichenor's debts. To this evidence Tichenor excepted. It also appeared that for a time after 1840 the property seemed to be in the joint possession of Tichenor and Cary, but that for some years prior to 1852 it had been in the possession of Tichenor. The trustees had never been required to execute the trust before the suit was brought, except by Allen, and they had never heard of any other owner of the bonds but Tichenor, except the two secured by the first deed which had been assigned by Tichenor to Allen.

In January 1853 Scott, one of the trustees in the second deed of trust, answered the bill. He said that he knew of no fraud or fraudulent design in making the said deed. That he had been informed that Tichenor had assigned Cary's bonds to David Hayes, who had assigned them to David A. Hayes. That Tichenor by his answer had disclosed the facts of said assignments; and although respondent and his co-trustee were on several occasions in the last year required by David A. Hayes to execute the trust, as he was no party to the suit, yet feeling anxious only to act in such manner as to do justice to all parties, and under the hope and expectation that the plaintiff would make said Hayes a party to the suit, no action was taken under said requisitions until lately. That the trustees delayed proceeding, until finding no action taken to make said Hayes a party, and he having forwarded to them the bonds of Cary with the assignments thereon, with a peremptory requisition to proceed and execute the trust, they did, in December 1852, advertise the property for sale, and shortly after the appearance of said advertisement, the plaintiff and others inserted a notice of the pendency of their suits for setting aside said deed as fraudulent. That this 23 *induced the trustees to postpone the sale, stating the fact of the assignment, and renewing the notice that the property would be sold unless they were restrained by the order of some court of competent jurisdiction. That nothing having been done by the plaintiff and the other creditors of Tichenor, the sale was made on the 3d of January 1853, under the said deed of trust, at public auction, when the property was purchased by the agent of David A. Hayes, at the price of five thousand eight hundred dollars, and the trustees would proceed that day to execute to him a conveyance for the same. That the bonds of Cary, with the assignments made by Tichenor to David Hayes, and by David Hayes to David A. Hayes, were enclosed to the trustees in a letter from David A. Hayes, some months before, and were then in respondent's possession, and would be exhibited to the court whenever desired. The advertisements referred to in the answer were filed with it.

After the commencement of the suit of Allen, Wellington Goddin, as administrator with the will annexed of John Mosby deceased, instituted a suit in the same court against all the parties to Allen's suit, including Allen himself. In his bill he stated that his testator, John Mosby, recovered a judgment against Tichenor for one thousand two hundred and fifty-seven dollars and sixty-seven cents, with interest, which remained unpaid. He then set out both the deeds of Tichenor and wife to Cary, and the deeds of trust and all the other facts stated in Allen's bill; and he charged that all the deeds were fraudulent, and intended to delay and hinder the creditors of Tichenor in the recovery of their debts. He charged that Tichenor's discharge in bankruptcy was obtained by a fraudulent concealment of his property; and the other allegations were substantially the same as in Allen's bill.

24 *Tichenor's answer and the grounds of defense were the same as in the previous case; and he stated the assignments to David and David A. Hayes, as in that case.

Allen, in his answer, stated that he was the assignee of two of the notes given on the first purchased by Cary, which notes he held as collateral security for the note of five thousand dollars, which had been executed by Tichenor to B. W. Green, and by Green assigned to him for value, with the knowledge and concurrence of Tichenor; and he insisted that he became the assignee of the said two notes, with full knowledge of the assignment on the part of Cary, and without any knowledge at the time he took said assignments of the alleged fraudulent transaction between the said Tichenor and Cary, in which the said notes are said to have originated. And he insisted that he was entitled to the protection extended to a purchaser for value without notice. The evidence in this cause was substantially the same as that in the previous case of Allen.

There were two other cases, one by John D. G. Brown, as administrator of George N. Clough deceased, claiming as a creditor of Tichenor by one of the bonds for five thousand dollars before mentioned, executed on the 10th of October 1839 to B. W. Green, and by Green assigned to Clough; and the other by James D. Ellett, claiming a debt of two hundred and fifty dollars, with interest, for which he had recovered a judgment against B. W. Green and Tichenor. The charges in these cases and the defences are similar to those in the case of Mosby's administrator; and need not be set out. The evidence was likewise substantially the same.

On the 5th of February 1853 the Bank of Virginia filed its answer in all the cases, stating that Tichenor had taken the oath of an insolvent debtor at the suit

25 *of the bank, and that the debt was still unpaid: And the trustees, Beale and Scott, also filed a plea in each case: That the court had no jurisdiction of the causes:

1st. Because, that after the making and recording the several conveyances in the bill mentioned, Tichenor became a bankrupt, and was, on the 19th of August 1842, so declared and discharged from all his debts, and duly certificated.

2d. Because, by the act of congress of the United States establishing a system of bankruptcy, it is provided that no suit touching the rights and property of a bankrupt shall be instituted after the lapse of two years from the decree of bankruptcy; and that more than two years did elapse after the decree declaring the said Tichenor a bankrupt was rendered before the institution of this suit.

The answer of Scott was taken as the answer of both the trustees in all the causes.

On the same day the four causes came on together to be heard, when the court held that both the deeds from Tichenor and wife to Cary, and the two deeds of trust executed by Cary were fraudulent and void as to the creditors of Tichenor. That Allen, as assignee of Tichenor, of the two notes secured by the deed of trust of the 5th of March 1840, was not entitled to the benefit of that security. That the trustees in the deeds being before the court, it was not necessary, under the circumstances, that David A. Hayes, as assignee of the bonds secured by the deeds of trust, should be a party. That it was competent for the plaintiffs, as creditors of Tichenor, who had not proved their debts before the commissioner in bankruptcy, to impeach his discharge as fraudulent. That the limitation of two years in the bankrupt act did not apply to these cases. And that the court had jurisdiction to grant relief in the cases.

26 There was thereupon a decree *in favor of each of the plaintiffs and the Bank of Virginia against Tichenor for the amount of their respective debts. And it was further decreed, that if Tichenor did not pay the sums so decreed against him within six months, a commissioner named should proceed to sell the real estate embraced in the deeds aforesaid, in the manner and upon the terms specified in the decree, and deposit the proceeds in one of the banks in Richmond, and make report to the court.

After the foregoing decree had been made, David A. Hayes applied to the court by petition, stating that he was the owner of the real estate mentioned in the deeds aforesaid, by purchase and conveyance to him; and asking that no decree affecting his rights in the said property might be rendered, until he had been made a party in said causes, and allowed the privilege of defense. This petition the court disallowed. And thereupon Tichenor applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Lyons and Patton, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That David A. Hayes was a necessary party. That he was the assignee of the bonds to secure which the deeds of trust were executed, and the decree took from him the property upon which he claimed a lien without giving him an opportunity of defending his interest. They referred to Calvert on Parties, p. 1, 2, 17, 17 Law Libr.; Story's Equ. Plead. § 137, 153, 201; Milf. Plead. p. 73; Chowning v. Cox, 1 Rand. 306; Clark v. Long, 4 Rand. 451.

2d. That by § 8 of the bankrupt act, suits are barred after two years; and here these suits were not brought for ten years after Tichenor's discharge as a bankrupt.

3d. That the discharge of Tichenor was conclusive on all his creditors, whether or not they proved their debts before the commissioner in bankruptcy; unless 27 *it could be shown in the proper proceeding that it was procured by fraud. Dusar v. Murgatroyd, 1 Wash. C. C. R. 13; Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. U. S. R. 612; Colby v. Ledden, Id. 626; Eden on Bankr. 413. That Mosby having obtained his judgment pending the proceedings in bankruptcy, stood on no better footing than those creditors who had no liens. Clark v. Rowling, 3 Coms. R. 216; Fox v. Woodruff, 9 Barb. Sup. C't R. 498. That the fraud which will avoid the discharge must be a fraud in procuring it; and not a fraud perpetrated long before and without any view to such discharge in bankruptcy. Powell v. Knox, 16 Alab. R. 364; Ragly v. Robinson, 19 Alab. R. 404; Shawhan v. Wherritt, 7 How. U. S. R. 627.

4. That by the decree declaring Tichenor a bankrupt, all his property was vested in the assignee in bankruptcy, and only the assignee in bankruptcy, in whom the property was vested, could sue for it. If indeed he refused to sue, the creditors might do so; but the creditors who could thus sue are the creditors who had proved their debts, as they alone were entitled to have the property subjected to the payment of their debts. Richards & als. v. Maryland Ins. Co., 8 Cranch's R. 84.

5th. That there was no fraud in the sales to Cary. The property was sold for its full value, and bonds taken 'for the purchase money, with deeds of trust to secure them. It was difficult to understand how such a transaction could be fraudulent. As to the statements of Cary to Goddin, they were incompetent evidence as against Tichenor; and Goddin being plaintiff in one of the cases, was an incompetent witness.

6th. That even if there was fraud between Tichenor and Cary, there was no proof that the assignee Hayes was a participant in it, or had any knowledge of it. And without bringing home the fraud to him as an assignee for value, he was 28 entitled in equity to the *benefit of the deeds of trust as securities for the debts due to him. Moore v. Holcombe, 3 Leigh 597.

7th. That the Circuit court had no jurisdiction to determine the questions involved in these causes, but that the subject was only cognizable in the courts of the United States. They referred to § 3, 4, 5 of the bankrupt act; Sturges v. Crowningshield, 4 Wheat. R. 122; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Id. 213; Golden v. Prince, 3 Wash. C. C. R. 313; Eames, ex parte, 2 Story's C. C. R. 322; Newhall, ex parte, Id. 360; Christy, ex parte, 3 How. U. S. R. 292; Norton v. Boyd, Id. 426; Houston v. City Bank of New Orleans, 6 Id. 486; Shawhan v. Wherritt, 7 Id. 627.

A. Johnston and Daniel, for the appellees, insisted:

1st. That the deeds from Tichenor to Cary were fraudulent and void as to creditors; and they reviewed the facts bearing upon that question. As to the admissions of Cary, they referred to Babb v. Clemson, 10 Serg. & Rawle 419; Platt Card v. Walridge, 18 Ohio R. 411; Claytor v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 285.

2d. That the deeds being fraudulent, Tichenor was guilty of a fraudulent concealment of his property in his application for the benefit of the bankrupt law, and by the terms of the statute his discharge did not protect him. And that this fraudulent concealment of his property might be set up in any court where the discharge was relied on as a defense. They referred to Chapman v. Forsyth, 2 How. U. S. R. 202; McLouth v. Rathbone, 19 Ohio R. 21; Alcott v. Avery, 1 Barb. Ch. R. 347; Suidam, Read & Co. v. Walker & als., 16 Ohio R. 122; Mabry, Giller & Walker v. Herndon, 8 Alab. R. 848; The State v. Bethune, 8 Ired. Law R. 139; Bond & Bennett v. Baldwin, 9 Georgia R. 9; Tuway v. Bourn, 2 Burr. R. 716.

3d. That the state court had jurisdiction to impeach the deeds for fraud at the 29 suit of the creditors *of Tichenor, especially those creditors who had not proved their debts before the commissioner in bankruptcy. Christy, ex parte, 3 How. U. S. R. 292; Norton v. Boyd, Id. 426; Mace v. Wells, 7 Id. 272; Peck v. Jenness, Id. 612; Strader v. Baldwin, 9 Id. 261; Linton v. Stanton, 12 Id. 423; Hubbell v. Crump, 11 Paige's R. 310; Lowry v. Morrison, Id. 327; Platt Card v. Walbridge, 18 Ohio R. 411; Davenport v. Bartlett, 9 Alab. R. 179.

4th. That the limitation of two years, prescribed in the 8th section of the statute, only relates to suits by the assignee; and the assignee not having sued in that time, so that his right to sue was at an end, the right of creditors then to sue was revived. Mabry, Giller & Walker v. Herndon, 8 Alab. R. 848, 863; Deadrick v. Armour, 10 Humph. R. 588; Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. R. 87.

5th. That the allegation that Hayes was assignee of the bonds secured by the deeds of trust was an affirmative allegation, which should have been proved; but there was no proof of the fact in the record. Tennant v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 195; Corbin v. Emmerson, 10 Id. 663; Breckenridge v. Auld, 1 Rob. R. 148, 156. That the suggestion in the answers of Tichenor and Scott was not sufficient to induce the court to require the plaintiffs to amend their bills and make Hayes a party. Barbour v. Whitlock, 4 Monr. R. 180; West v. Sanders, 1 A. K. Marsh. R. 108. That Hayes' application to be made a party was in the character of a purchaser of the property, and as such he was a purchaser pendente lite, and not entitled to be made a party. Morton v. Long, 3 A. 30 *DANIEL, J. The first question which we have to decide, is that raised and disputed in the several bills and answers, as to the effect of Tichenor's discharge and certificate as a bankrupt. On the part of the appellees, it is charged that Tichenor "was guilty of fraud and willful concealment of his property and rights of property," in several particulars specified in the bills; and they insist that his discharge and certificate consequently present no bar to the recovery which they seek. Whilst he, denying all fraud and concealment, relies on the said discharge and certificate as a complete bar, and insists that though it should be made to appear that the allegations of fraud and concealment were true, there would still be no ground laid for the jurisdiction of the Circuit court.

The fourth section of the bankrupt act of 1841 declares, that "every bankrupt who shall bona fide surrender all his property and rights of property, &c., shall be entitled to a full discharge from all his debts, to be decreed and allowed by the court which has declared him a bankrupt, and a certificate thereof granted to him accordingly, upon his petition filed for that purpose. Such certificate not, however, to be granted until after ninety days from the decree of bankruptcy, nor until after seventy days' notice in some public newspaper designated by such court, to all creditors who have proved their debts, and other persons in interest, to appear at a particular time and place, to show cause why such discharge and certificate shall not be granted; at which time and place any such creditors or other persons in interest may appear and contest the right of the bankrupt thereto. Provided, that in all cases where the residence of the creditor is known, a service on him personally, or by letter addressed to him at his known usual place of residence, shall be prescribed by the court, as in their discretion shall seem proper, having regard 31 to the distance *at which the creditor resides from such court. And if any such bankrupt shall be guilty of any fraud or willful concealment of his property or rights of property, or shall have preferred any of his creditors contrary to the provisions of this act, or shall willfully omit or refuse to comply with any order or direction of such court, or to conform to any other requisition of this act, or shall, in the proceedings under this act, admit a false or fictitious debt against his estate, he shall not be entitled to any such discharge or certificate." If the section stopped here, there would, I think, appear strong ground for maintaining that it was the intention of the act to make the decree allowing the discharge binding, not only on the creditors who might prove their debts, but on all other persons in interest, who had an opportunity of contesting it, and conclusive as well in respect to questions of fraud or willful concealment of his property by the bankrupt, as in relation to any of the other matters which the act allows to be urged as causes for refusing the discharge. It is difficult to conceive on what principle a creditor who had proved his debt, and who had unsuccessfully contested the right of the bankrupt to a discharge, on the ground of his refusal to comply with "some order or direction of the court," could be heard to dispute the validity of the discharge on the same ground in another forum. And I do not perceive how a creditor, who is served with notice of the proceedings, but declines to make any objection, stands on higher ground in this regard. And if this be so, there is, in this portion of the section, nothing which reserves to any of the creditors a right to impeach the discharge, after it is obtained, for "fraud or willful concealment." All the creditors are allowed to contest the right of the bankrupt to a discharge; and all the conditions to be complied with on his part, before his right to the decree is perfected, are placed 32 in the *same category; the creditors have the same right to show his failure to perform any one of these conditions as they have to show his failure to perform any other of them. His right to have a decree might be defeated by showing a willful refusal on his part to comply with "the orders of the court," as effectually as by proving a "willful concealment of his property." And when the bankrupt shows that he has made a bona fide surrender of all his property, and otherwise obeyed all the other requisitions of the act, this portion of the section declares him to be entitled to a full discharge from all his debts. If, therefore, the act said nothing further in relation to the discharge, the jurisdiction of the court being conceded, the conclusiveness of the decree, on all the creditors who might have resisted its allowance, and in respect to all prerequisites, (including absence of fraud on the part of the bankrupt,) would seem, on general principles, to follow as a legitimate consequence. But the section, a part of which we have already quoted, does not stop here. It proceeds, in terms, to declare what shall be the legal effect of the discharge and certificate, and in doing so, presents an entirely different view of the influence of fraud or willful concealment by the bankrupt, on their conclusiveness. It declares, that "such discharge and certificate, when duly granted, shall, in all courts of justice, be deemed a full and complete discharge of all debts, contracts and other engagements of such bankrupt, which are provable under this act, and shall be and may be pleaded as a full and complete bar to all suits brought in any court of judicature whatever; and the same shall be conclusive evidence of itself in favor of such bankrupt, unless the same shall be impeached for some fraud or willful concealment by him of his property or rights of property as aforesaid, contrary to the provisions of this act, on prior reasonable notice, specifying in writing such fraud or concealment."

33 *This clause of the section, it is perceived, is wholly silent as to all the matters mentioned as prerequisite to the discharge, except the bona fides of the conduct of the bankrupt. The discharge is declared liable to impeachment for his "fraud or willful concealment," but for nothing else. To that extent, and to that extent only, a conclusive character is denied to the discharge; but is it not denied to that extent fully and in all regards? What is there in the terms employed which would exclude any creditor from the benefit of this proviso? I can perceive none. And I can conceive of no process of reasoning, founded on this section of the act, which would place a creditor in the predicament to be bound by the discharge in other respects, that would not at the same time show him entitled to impeach the discharge for fraud. If the design to debar any of the creditors of the bankrupt of this right is to be found in the act, reference must be had to some other section for its disclosure. I have been unable to discover any language in the act, which, by fair interpretation, can be regarded as having such an aspect, unless perhaps it may be found in one of the clauses in the proviso to the 5th section. That section, after declaring that all creditors, who shall come in and prove their debts in the manner prescribed by the act, shall be entitled to share in the bankrupt's property and effects, provides, among other things, "that no creditor or other person, coming in and proving his debt or other claim, shall be allowed to maintain any suit at law or in equity therefor, but shall thereby be deemed to have waived all right of action and suit against such bankrupt." Whether this clause is to be construed into an inhibition on any of the creditors to open the discharge for fraud, is a question which it is obviously unnecessary for us to decide. Such inhibition can, by the terms of the clause, reach only those creditors who come in and 34 *prove their debts; and, as appears by the report of the commissioner in bankruptcy, none of the appellees (indeed none of Tichenor's creditors) proved or appeared to prove their debts.

The same clause of the fourth section, which declares the effect of the discharge, ascertains clearly, as I conceive, the tribunals or "courts" in which the impeachment of the discharge for fraud may be had. Jurisdiction over the matter is, by obvious implication, conferred on every court in which a suit may, independent of the act, be properly brought against the bankrupt. In the language of the court in the case of Mabry, Giller & Walker v. Herndon, 8 Alab. R. 857, "I cannot understand, by the terms 'all courts of justice,' and 'any court of judicature whatever,' that none other than the federal courts are competent to entertain an objection to the validity of the discharge and certificate of a bankrupt. In employing words of most extensive application and import, when every thing said was, or at least should have been, well considered, it cannot be contended that congress designed to convey a meaning much more limited than is expressed. The fair and natural inference is, that as the discharge and certificate, when duly granted, were effectual in all judicial tribunals in which they should be drawn in question, so they should be invalid in every court in which the bankrupt was sued and relied on them as a bar, if impeachable for any of the causes for which they are declared to be inoperative. If competent for congress to have withheld from the state courts the right to examine the validity of a bankrupt's discharge for extrinsic objections, it is enough to say that this has not only not been done, but that the power has been conferred in terms of unequivocal signification."

These views are fully sustained by numerous decisions of the supreme courts 35 of other states, and are *not in conflict with any decision of the Supreme court of the United States which I have seen. Bond & Bennett v. Baldwin, 9 Georgia R. 9; Beckman v. Wilson, 9 Metc. R. 434; Gupton v. Connor, &c., 11 Humph. R. 287; Humphreys v. Swett, 31 Maine R. 192; Wales v. Lyon, 2 Mich. R. 276; Dorimus, Suidam & Co. v. Walker, 8 Alab. R. 194.

It seems to me, therefore, that it was competent for the appellees to impeach Tichenor's discharge and certificate on the grounds of fraud alleged in the bills, and that the Circuit court had jurisdiction over the question of its validity.

And I do not perceive how the decree in bankruptcy operated as any bar to the jurisdiction which the Circuit court would otherwise have had to hear and determine the matters of controversy, litigated in the cause, in respect to the property conveyed by the several deeds in the bills and proceedings mentioned. It is true that all the property and rights of property of Tichenor were, upon his obtaining the decree declaring him a bankrupt, vested in his assignee in bankruptcy. And it may be conceded that there was a period during which it was competent for the assignee to have instituted suits for the purpose of recovering from any alienee or assignee of Tichenor, property or evidences of debt held by them in virtue of conveyances or assignments made by him, in fraud of his creditors, previously to his being declared a bankrupt; and that during such period such alienees and assignees might have relied on the outstanding title of the assignee in bankruptcy as a defense to suits instituted for a like purpose by creditors of Tichenor seeking to recover in derogation of such title. But that period had passed long before the institution of this suit, the right of the assignee to institute suits for the purpose of recovering the property of the bankrupt, from the adverse holders of it, 36 *being, by the 8th section of the bankrupt act, limited to two years after the decree of bankruptcy, or after the cause of suit shall first have accrued. During that period no suit was instituted by him to recover the property in controversy; nor indeed did any exigency arise making it necessary for him, in the performance of the duties of his trust, to institute such suit, as none of the creditors came in to prove their debts; no occasion presented itself calling for the prosecution of the rights of action with which he was temporarily clothed, and they were suffered to expire under the limitation imposed by the law which conferred them.

The creditors who are seeking to subject the property of Tichenor to the payment of their demands, claim nothing by virtue of his assignment in bankruptcy. They do not invoke the aid of the bankrupt law, nor do they seek to interfere with any right of the assignee under it. The appellees, Ellet and the Bank of Virginia, are seeking to enforce liens which had been acquired by them under the laws of the state before Tichenor was declared a bankrupt. Such liens, so far from being invalidated by the act, are expressly recognized in the proviso of the second section; and it is now well settled that the jurisdiction of the federal courts to enforce such liens, is not in exclusion of a like jurisdiction in the state courts. Russell v. Cheatham, 8 Smeades & Marsh. 703; Talbert v. Melton, 9 Id. 9; McCance v. Taylor, 10 Gratt. 580. The jurisdiction of the Circuit court to extend to the appellees Allen, Mosby's administrator and Clough's administrator, the aid sought by them in their several bills, in subjecting Tichenor's property to their demands, is, I think, equally clear, and equally free from the objection of involving an encroachment on the rights of the assignee in bankruptcy, or any claiming under him. The claim of Mosby's 37 administrator is founded on a *judgment obtained against Tichenor in 1842, since the decree in bankruptcy; and upon showing that Tichenor's discharge was procured by fraud, the right of Allen and of Clough's administrator to obtain judgments against him upon their debts, would stand on the same footing as if he had never been declared a bankrupt; and for all the purposes of the jurisdiction of a court of equity, the second section of the 179th chapter of the Code of 1849 places them (on proof of their allegations) on the same footing as if they had obtained judgments against Tichenor before filing their bills. To enforce such judgments against the property of Tichenor in the hands of his fraudulent alienees, would now, on account of the facts already adverted to, defeat no purpose or policy of the bankrupt law, nor interfere, in any manner, with the right of the bankrupt court to administer the assets of the bankrupt.

In a suit brought by the assignee in bankruptcy or any claiming under him, the alienees of Tichenor might rely on the limitation of two years prescribed for such suits. But such defense, so far from presenting a bar to the claims of the creditors in this suit, just mentioned, shows a state of facts remitting them to the rights which they had before the decree in bankruptcy, and protecting the alienees from all danger of being subjected to a double recovery. No effort has ever been made by the assignee in bankruptcy, or any claiming under him, to disturb Cary or his trustees, or the assignees of his bonds, in the enjoyment of any rights which they may have acquired by the conveyances and assignments under which they claim; and no effort of the kind could now be of any avail. They are no longer exposed to demands founded on the proceedings in bankruptcy, and they can no longer set up those proceedings as a defense against those creditors of Tichenor who are in a condition to enquire into the fairness and va-
38 lidity of his conveyances *and assignments. It seems to me that the Circuit court had full jurisdiction of the controversy, and power to determine the conflicting claims of the parties, uninfluenced by the proceedings in bankruptcy. But it seems to me that the Circuit court erred in proceeding to render a decree in the absence of David A. Hayes. Upon the supposition of the truth of the averments contained in the answers of Tichenor and the trustee Scott, he may have most important interests in the controversy, rendering it proper that he should be made a party before the subject is disposed of. For though the deeds from Tichenor to Cary and from Cary to his trustees should, upon a final hearing of the cause, be adjudged to be void as to the creditors of Tichenor, it would not, I think, necessarily follow that assignees, for value without notice, of the bonds given by Cary, might not have a better right to subject the property to the payment of the bonds than any creditor of Tichenor, who did not claim by some lien on the property, acquired prior to the execution of the deeds. No proof was offered of the assignment to Hayes, other than the affidavits of Tichenor and Scott.

These affidavits, however, furnished a sufficient ground for justifying and requiring the court to make a rule on the plaintiffs in the several suits, to show cause why the said Hayes should not be made a party.

And without expressing any opinion as to the extent and nature of the interests in the cause, which may be held by Hayes, or by Allen as assignee of the two bonds which he claims to hold as collateral security for the debt claimed by him in his bill, I think that the cause should be remanded in order that, unless the plaintiffs in the several bills will amend them, and make Hayes a party thereto, they be compelled to do so, if, upon the hearing of a rule to show cause why they should not make him a party, 39 first granted, it *shall appear that the said Hayes is an assignee of any of the bonds given by Cary to Tichenor, as averred in the answers of Tichenor and Scott; and in order for further proceedings, &c.

40 Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. City of Wheeling.

October Term, 1855, Richmond.

1. Injunctions—Violation of—Contempt Proceeding, How Reviewed.—A proceeding for a contempt in disobeying an injunction is not an order in the cause; but it is in the nature of a criminal proceeding, and the judgment in such a proceeding can only be reviewed by a superior tribunal by writ of error, and not always in that way.

2. Same—Order Overruling Motion to Dissolve—When Appealable.†—An order overruling a motion to dissolve an injunction may be appealed from, if the principles of the cause are thereby adjudicated; and this though such an order is made in vacation.‡

3. Same—Same—When Not Appealable.—The court, for good cause shown, may overrule a motion to dissolve an injunction and continue it to the hearing, without adjudicating the principles of the cause; in which case no appeal will lie from the order.

4. Same—Same—When Appeal Refused Even Though Principles Are Adjudicated.§—Where the principles of the cause are adjudicated by such order, an appeal may be refused, if the court or judge to whom the petition of appeal is presented deems it most proper that the cause should be proceeded in further in the court below before an appeal is allowed therein. And if, in such case, an appeal is allowed, it may be dismissed as prematurely allowed.‖

5. Same—Motion to Dissolve—Objections to.—In a case which is purely an injunction cause, the parties having had time to prepare the case, and having taken testimony to support their respective pretensions, and it not being probable that any other facts can be brought into the cause which will affect its principles, a motion was made in vacation to dissolve the injunction, on the ground that it was improvidently awarded, and upon the 41 cause *as it then stood. The hearing of the motion was objected to: 1st. Because a foreign corporation, which was a party, had not answered. 2d. Because exceptions had been filed to the sufficiency of the answer of the defendant, which were still pending and undetermined. 3d. Because the answer of the defendant, a corporation, was not verified by affidavit. The judge heard the motion, but refused to dissolve the injunction, and continued it until further order or decree. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Refusal to Dissolve—Principles Adjudicated—Appeal.—The refusal of the judge to dissolve the injunction adjudicated the principles of the cause to the extent that the injunction had not been improvidently awarded; and that the cause, as it then stood, ought to be continued. It is therefore such an order as may be appealed from; and it is a proper case for appeal at once.

2. Same—Same—Failure of Foreign Corporation to Answer—Not Grounds to Refuse Dissolution.¶—That the defendant which had not answered being a foreign corporation, which could not be compelled to answer, and the answer not being required for a discovery; the absence of such answer is not ground for refusing to dissolve the injunction.

3. Same—Same—Objections to.—That as upon a motion to dissolve an injunction all the allegations of the bill, which are not denied by the answer, are taken as true, it is no objection to the motion to dissolve, that the exceptions to the answer for insufficiency had not been acted on.

Contempt Proceeding—How Reviewed.—For the proposition laid down in the first headnote of the principal case that, a proceeding for a contempt is in the nature of a criminal proceeding and the judgment in such a proceeding can only be reviewed by a superior tribunal by writ of error, and not always in that way, the principal case is cited and followed in Ruhl v. Ruhl, 24 W. Va. 283; McMillan v. Hickman, 35 W. Va. 714, 14 S. E. Rep. 230; State v. Irwin, 30 W. Va. 415, 4 S. E. Rep. 419.

In addition to the above authorities, see division 3, H., monographic note on "Contempts" appended to Wells v. Com., 21 Gratt. 500.

†Injunctions—Order Overruling Motion to Dissolve—When Appealable.—For the proposition laid down in the principal case that an order overruling a motion to dissolve an injunction may be appealed from, if the principles of the case are thereby adjudicated, the principal case is cited and approved in Kahn v. Kerngood, 80 Va. 344; Bristow v. Home Bldg. Co., 91 Va. 23, 20 S. E. Rep. 946; Vance v. Snyder, 6 W. Va. 29; Gallaher v. Moundsville, 34 W. Va. 736, 12 S. E. Rep. 861; note to London-Virginia Min. Co. v. Moore, 6 Va. Law Reg. 44. See, in accord, Talley v. Tyree, 2 Rob. 500; Lomax v. Picot, 2 Rand. 247. See, in general, monographic note on "Injunctions."

‡Code, ch. 182, § 2, p. 682. "A person who is a party to" "any case in chancery wherein there is a decree or order dissolving an injunction, or requiring money to be paid, or the possession or title of property to be changed, or adjudicating the principles of the cause, or to any civil case, wherein there is a final judgment, decree or order, may present a petition, if the case be in chancery, for an appeal from the decree or order, or if not in chancery, for a writ of error or supersedeas to the judgment or order, except," &c.

§Same—Same—When Appeal Refused Even Though the Principles Are Adjudicated.—For the proposition that, where the principles of the cause are adjudicated by such order, an appeal may be refused, if the court or judge to whom the petition of appeal is presented deems it most proper that the cause should be proceeded in further in the court below before an appeal is allowed therein, see principal case cited and followed in Kahn v. Kerngood, 80 Va. 346.

‖Code, ch. 182, § 10, p. 684. "The petition shall be rejected when it is for an appeal from an interlocutory decree or order, in a case which the court or judge to whom it is presented deems it most proper should be proceeded in farther in the court below, before an appeal is allowed therein."

¶Same—Same—Failure of Foreign Corporation to Answer—Not Grounds for Refusal to Dissolve.—In N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Old Dominion Baggage Co., 97 Va. 90, 33 S. E. Rep. 385, it is said, citing the principal case, "As a general rule, subject to some exceptions, an injunction, properly granted, will not be dissolved until the defendant has answered." The principal case seems to be one of the exceptions, for it holds, that one of the defendants which had not answered being a foreign corporation, which could not be compelled to answer, and the answer not being required for a discovery, the absence of such answer is not ground for refusing to dissolve the injunction.

4. Same—Same—Unsworn Answer of Corporation a Mere Pleading.—As a corporation cannot be sworn, it must put in its answer under its common seal only. Not being sworn to, it is not evidence for the corporation, though responsive to the bill; but it puts in issue the allegations of the bill to which it responds: and this as well upon a motion to dissolve the injunction, as upon the hearing.

6. Statutes—Construction of—Case at Bar.†—The act of March 6th, 1847, Sess. Acts, ch. 99, p. 86, in securing to the city of Wheeling the benefits of the western terminus of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, does not forbid said company to connect with the Ohio river or a rail road in the state of Ohio, at any point between the mouth of Grave creek and Wheeling.‡

7. Same—Same—Same.—To induce the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company to accept the act of March 6th, 1847, the city of Wheeling and the company entered into a contract, by which Wheeling undertook to do certain things therein specified; and the committee of the company agreed to recommend to it to accept said act: "It being the intention of the parties to the agreement, among other things, to secure to the city of Wheeling the practical benefits of the terminus of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, according to the provi-
42 sions of said *law." The company is not forbidden by the contract to connect with the Ohio river, or a rail road in the state of Ohio, at any point between the mouth of Grave creek and Wheeling.

8. Same—Same—Case at Bar.—The Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company having been subjected by the act of March 6th, 1847, to the provisions of the act in relation to rail roads, passed March 11th, 1837, "so far as the same are properly applicable;" under this last act, the company has power to make a branch road from the line of her road to low water mark on the Ohio river, between Grave creek and Wheeling, in order to form a connection with the river, and with a rail road in Ohio, terminating opposite on the other bank of the river.‡

9. Corporations—When Stockholder Has a Right to Enjoin Action of.—Although a stockholder in a corporation may enjoin it from employing the property or powers of the corporation for a purpose wholly or materially different from that which was designed by the act of incorporation, yet it has no right to enjoin it from doing what is in direct furtherance of the object of its creation, and it is for the benefit of all the stockholders as such; though it may be injurious to such stockholders in another character; or the interest of some other person or the public may be injuriously affected by the work about to be executed.

In November 1854, the city of Wheeling applied to the judge of the Circuit court of Marshall county for an injunction to restrain the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company from forming a connection with the Central Ohio rail road at Benwood, a place on the Ohio river about four miles southwest of Wheeling. In the bill it was set out that the general assembly of Virginia, on the 6th of March 1847, passed the act entitled "An act to authorize the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company to construct the extension of their rail road through the territory of Virginia," thereby intending, among other purposes, "to secure to the said city of Wheeling the benefits of the western terminus" of that road. That the act is framed with a view to require the business of the road at the Ohio river to be transacted or concentrated in the city of Wheeling as "the western terminus." That after the passage of 43 this act a contract in writing *was made between the said company and the said city, dated the 6th day of July 1847, and duly ratified by both parties during the year; it being the intention of the parties, as expressed in the contract, among other things, "to secure to the city of Wheeling the practical benefits of the western terminus of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, according to the provisions of said law." That it was the duty of the said company so to exercise the privilege conferred upon it by the state as to secure to the said city the practical benefits of the said western terminus. That the practical benefits contemplated by the parties were the transaction in said city of the business between the rail road and the Ohio river, and that between said road and the Central Ohio rail road.

The bill further set out the performance by the city of Wheeling of the stipulations of the aforesaid contract, and especially that the city had subscribed for stock of the company to the amount of five hundred thousand dollars, and was a stockholder to that amount; though in fact at the time the subscription was made and since, the stock was worth little more than half that sum; and it was well understood at the time by the parties to the contract aforesaid, that the chief inducement to the city of Wheeling to make the said subscription and the donations and grants mentioned in said contract, was the expected practical benefits of the western terminus of the road, and not the value of the stock.

It was further stated, that in direct and manifest violation of these obligations of the law and the said contract, the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company were engaged in the construction of certain works at and near Benwood, a place on the east bank of the Ohio river, about four miles southwestward of their depot in the city of Wheeling, for the purpose of there receiving and delivering the travel of the Cen-44 tral *Ohio rail road; and for the same purpose had adopted and approved, in conjunction with the said Central Ohio Company, certain plans for the ferriage of such traffic and travel across the Ohio river at that place. And that the same structures were adapted and designed for making transfers of freight and passengers to the Baltimore and Ohio rail road from vessels navigating the Ohio river, and to the latter from the former.

The bill further stated, that the road of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company having been built near the hills, this connection at Benwood could not be made without great expense; and it described the works which the company was constructing. These consisted of a branch road extending from the main track down the bank of the river, and into it to low water mark, the whole being about two thousand feet in length, and a large embankment being made into the river for about three hundred feet, upon which a wharf was to be constructed. Just opposite this structure was one like it, erected by the Central Ohio Company; and by the agreement between the companies, the latter was to run a steamer from the one wharf to the other for the transportation of freight and passengers. And it was charged that the object of this structure was illegal, and in violation of the contract between the city of Wheeling and the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company; that the expenditure of the money of the company upon the work was an improper application of the funds of the company; and that the embankment and wharf extended into the river would be injurious to its navigation.

It is further stated, that the Central Ohio Company is authorized by its charter to extend its road to a point opposite the city of Wheeling; and such had been the declared purpose of that company, until the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Com-
45 pany had consented *to make the structures and have the connection between the two roads at Benwood. And it is charged that said company has no authority to make the agreement entered into with the Ohio company.

It is further stated, that the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company have illegally agreed to lend to the Central Ohio Rail Road Company the effects of the former company to the amount of four hundred thousand dollars, being bonds of the Northwestern Virginia Rail Road Company. That this loan was made to enable the Ohio company sooner to accomplish the said connection at Benwood; and was wholly unauthorized by any law of this state, and was in violation of the rights of the city of Wheeling as a stockholder as aforesaid.

It is charged that the city of Wheeling will be injured by the action of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company, in being thereby deprived of the practical benefits of the western terminus of the road; that as owner of wharfs in the city, from which a revenue is derived, the city will be materially injured, and also as a stockholder of the company; and that the injuries which would be done by the completion of the works at Benwood would be great and irreparable.

The Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company and the Central Ohio Rail Road Company were made defendants to the bill, and called upon to answer. And the prayer of the bill was for an injunction to restrain them and each of them from parting with any of the bonds of the Northwestern Rail Road Company aforesaid. That the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company, their officers and agents, might be restrained from carrying into effect the said contract, or any contract between them and the Central Ohio Rail Road Company, or any contract, agreement or arrangement between their respective officers, in pursuance
46 of *which the one of said defendants was to receive from or deliver to the other, at or near Benwood, freight or passengers carried on the rail road of one of them, and to be carried on the rail road of the other, or in pursuance whereof the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company were constructing or were to construct or complete any such works at or near Benwood as they were constructing or about to construct as aforesaid; or to use the same or any part thereof, or to use, employ, or run any such steamboat as aforesaid, or to make any such loan as aforesaid to the Central Ohio Rail Road Company; and to restrain the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company, their officers and agents, from doing any such acts, whether in pursuance of such contract, agreement or arrangement as last aforesaid or not; and from constructing or completing, at or near Benwood, any wharf, pier or embankment within or below the banks of the Ohio river, or connecting the same with their rail road; from receiving or delivering, at or near the same place, goods, &c., freight or passengers, to be carried on the Central Ohio rail road, or which had been carried on said rail road; and from making any expenditure of money, structures or arrangements, or doing any other act designed or tending to cause or induce freight or passengers, brought from or destined for the Central Ohio rail road or the Ohio river, to be received or delivered on or from the said Baltimore and Ohio rail road, at or near Benwood aforesaid; or to cause or induce any business connected with their rail road, which, without such act or acts on their part, might probably be transacted at Wheeling, to be done or transacted at Benwood; from forming any connection with the Central Ohio rail road at that place; and from obstructing the navigation of the Ohio river by making or completing any wharf, pier or other structure, within the bed or between the banks thereof; or

47 *from doing any other act of the like nature with those herein before specified, designed or tending to take away or withhold from the city of Wheeling the practical benefits of the western terminus of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, or to injure the interests or violate the rights of the said city as a stockholder in the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company, or as interested in the navigation of the Ohio river. That all such structures made by the said company within the bed or between the banks of the Ohio river might be abated and removed; and for general relief.

The application for an injunction was made to the judge in vacation, upon notice to the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company; and that company and the city of Wheeling having appeared by counsel, the judge awarded the injunction substantially according to the prayer of the bill.

At the April rules for 1855 the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company filed its answer. The company, whilst it admitted the act of 1847 and the contract with the city of Wheeling, referred to in the bill, strenuously contested the construction put upon them in the bill, and referred to their several provisions, as well as the past action of the general assembly and the company, as showing conclusively that the construction insisted on by the city of Wheeling was erroneous; and that both under the law and the agreement the company was entitled to form a connection with the Central Ohio rail road at Benwood, and had authority to make the branch road from its main track to the river, and do all other things which had been done by it to form that connection. The answer admits that it was expected at the time the agreement was made, that the Central Ohio Company would terminate its road opposite Wheeling, and avers that the Baltimore Company desired and endeavored to induce said company to do so: But it was an independent 48 *company, over which the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company had no authoritative control; and judging for itself of its own interests, it had determined to terminate its road, at least for the present, at Bellair, opposite Benwood. It denies that the practical benefits of the terminus which it was intended that Wheeling should enjoy, were such as are stated in the bill. It admits the compliance by Wheeling with the terms of the agreement. And it admits that at the time the injunction was granted they were employed in the construction of works substantially the same as described in the bill, for the purpose of facilitating the connection with the Central Ohio rail road at Benwood, both as to trade and travel; but they deny that these works have reference to the river trade, as the latter would be more convenient to them received at Wheeling. They were advised, however, that if any freight was offered at Benwood, which is a regular station of the company, they could not decline it. They deny that the works constructed by them would in any manner obstruct the navigation of the river; and if it did, they insist that the plaintiff has no right to raise such a question in this form of proceeding: And they demur to so much of the bill as relates to this subject.

The answer further denies that there was any specific agreement between them and the Central Ohio Rail Road Company as to said works or ferry boat. There was simply a concert of action to subserve the mutual convenience of both parties; nor had the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company any interest in the ferry boat referred to. But if such had been the case, they had a right to enter into such an agreement or arrangement as charged in the bill.

The answer further denies that the expenditures were unnecessary, wasteful or illegal. It admits the loan to the Central Ohio rail road of four hundred 49 *thousand dollars, as charged in the bill, but denies that the transaction was illegal or injudicious; and whatever might be its true character, it was not a proper subject of enquiry in this cause; and this part of the bill is demurred to. They say that this loan was in no manner connected with the connection at Benwood; and that these bonds, whether properly or improperly loaned, as above mentioned, have long since been transferred to said Central Ohio Rail Road Company, and are therefore alike beyond the control of the respondents and the court.

They deny that they have in any manner interfered to injure or affect the proper rights and interests of the plaintiff, in yielding to the necessity arising from no act of theirs, of forming the proposed connection with the Central Ohio rail road at Benwood; a right which they are advised properly belongs to them, and which a due regard to the interests of those whom they represent required them to exercise.

The answer was not sworn to, but was under the corporate seal of the company. To this answer the plaintiff filed numerous exceptions for the failure to respond to special allegations in the bill. The cause was, on the motion of the defendant, set for hearing on the bill and answer. And on motion of the plaintiff, the exceptions were set down for hearing and argument at the next term. And the cause was set for hearing as to the Central Ohio Rail Road Company.

At the May term of the court for Marshall county, the plaintiff moved the court for a fine and sequestration, for the contempt of the company in willfully disobeying the order of injunction made in the cause; and a rule was made upon the company to show cause against it upon a certain day in the term.

Upon the hearing of the rule, a number of affidavits and depositions in relation to the action of the Baltimore and Ohio Company were read, which satisfied

50 *the court that the injunction had been violated by the company. But whilst it held that there had been a violation of the injunction, yet being of opinion that it was not committed with a willful intent to disobey the order of the court, the rule was discharged upon the payment of the costs thereof by the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company. And the court then proceeded to explain in its order what action by the company would be a violation of the injunction.

On the 12th of May 1855, the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company gave notice to the city of Wheeling that on the 5th of June the company would move the judge in vacation for a dissolution of the injunction. And on that day the parties appeared before the judge, when the counsel of the company moved for the dissolution of the injunction, as well upon the ground that the said order of injunction had been improvidently awarded, as upon the cause as it then stood: And thereupon the plaintiff offered the affidavit of its counsel, and objected to the said motion and to the determination thereof, until a sufficient answer should be filed by the defendant; and also by the other defendant, the Central Ohio Rail Road Company: And also objected, that the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company was not entitled to move for such dissolution upon its answer theretofore filed, because it was not verified by affidavit. And the said matters being argued, upon consideration thereof the judge overruled the motion to dissolve, and ordered that the injunction be continued until further order or decree. And the clerk of the Circuit court of Marshall was directed to enter the certificate of the judge's order among the records of said court.

The affidavit of the counsel stated that he had endeavored, by such means as occurred to him to be legal and effective, to mature the cause as well against the Central Ohio Rail Road Company as the 51 other defendant, *and to obtain the answer of that company; and that he considered it material for the interests of his client that the Central Ohio Rail Road Company should appear and answer the bill. And he stated that almost continually since the said injunction was issued he had been engaged in different courts, so that he had been unable to collect and take the testimony which he considered material for the complainant in the cause.

Beside a mass of documentary evidence, and the affidavits and depositions taken upon the proceeding for contempt, the examinations of the president of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company and of one other of its officers, taken upon interrogatories, were filed in the cause. The evidence is sufficiently stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion.

The judge having refused to dissolve the injunction, the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company applied to this court for an appeal, both from the order in the proceeding for contempt and from that refusing to dissolve the injunction; which was allowed.

A. Hunter, Patton and Robinson, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That it was not competent for Wheeling to raise the question whether the navigation of the Ohio river was injured by the construction of the embankment and pier to low water mark, by the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company. That is a question, as they insisted, which can only be raised by the state in a proper proceeding for the purpose. They referred to Beveridge v. Lacey, 3 Rand. 63; O'Brien v. Norwich & Worcester R. R. Co., 17 Conn. R. 372; City of Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co., 12 Peters' R. 91; Bigelow v. Hartford Bridge Co., 14 Conn. R. 565; Corning v. Lowerre, 6 John. Ch. R. 439; Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Ves. R. 617; Dimes v.
52 Petley, 69 Eng. C. L. R. 276. *And they insisted, that in fact there was no obstruction to the navigation.

2d. That it was not a case in which the city of Wheeling, as a stockholder, had a right to come into equity to enjoin the expenditure of money in constructing the works at Benwood, or the loan of the bonds to the Central Ohio Railroad Company. That the loan was not made to enable that company to construct its works at Bellair, opposite Benwood, with a view to the connection of the two roads, but to enable the company to reach the river: and that the expenditure of money in forming the connection was essential to the prosperity of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company; and the policy of that connection, if the company was authorized to make it, no stockholder of the company, looking to his interest as a stockholder, could for a moment doubt. That in fact the city of Wheeling was endeavoring to use its character of a stockholder to sustain what it deemed its interests as a city. That the only ground on which a stockholder can come into equity in such a case is, where the company is about to apply its effects to an illegal purpose; and then the power will be exercised with great caution, and only where the damage would be irreparable. Ffooks v. London and Southwestern Railway Co., 19 Eng. Law & Equ. R. 7; Graham v. Birkenhead & C. Co., 6 Eng. Law & Equ. R. 132.

3d. That an appeal lies from an order in vacation refusing to dissolve an injunction. That this was so formerly; Lomax v. Picot, 2 Rand. 247; Talley v. Tyree, 2 Rob. R. 500; and that the Code of 1849 was still more explicit. Code, ch. 182, § 2, p. 682; Penn v. Whiteheads, 12 Gratt. 74.

4th. That under the act of March 6th, 1847, which expressly subjected the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company to the provisions of the general rail road law, Code, ch. 61, § 1, p. 316, that company 53 had the *power to construct the branch road at Benwood; and that instead of there being any provision in the act which, either in its terms or by implication, forbade the company to connect with other roads elsewhere than at Wheeling, its provisions plainly showed that such a power was understood to exist as to any point between Grave creek and Wheeling. And the act also showed that instead of securing to Wheeling the benefits of the terminus of the road, by forbidding the connection with other roads elsewhere than at Wheeling, that act provided other means for effecting this object. They referred to § 4 of the act, to show that it recognized the existence of the power to make a branch of the road; § 2, to show what were the means relied on to give to Wheeling the benefit of the terminus; and to § 6, to show that the company is also protected. They further denied that the benefits of the terminus of the road contemplated by the statute were such as were claimed by the city of Wheeling. They also referred to the previous and subsequent legislation of the state of Virginia and to the previous action of the company, to show what was the true meaning of the act of March 6th, 1847.

5th. That the agreement between the city of Wheeling and the company did not give the city any greater rights as to the benefits of the western terminus, than was conferred by the act of March 6th, 1847. And they further insisted that the agreement was so indefinite and uncertain in its terms that a court of equity would not enforce a specific execution of it. They referred to James v. Cochrane, 7 Welsb. Hurlst. & Gord. 170; Aspdin v. Austin, 48 Eng. C. L. R. 671; Dunn v. Sayles, Id. 685; Kemble v. Kean, 6 Simons R. 333, 9 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 296; Kimberley v. Jennings, Id. 340, Id. 300; Baldwin v. Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, 9 Id. 393, 16 Id. 394; 2 Eden on Inj. 365, note.

54 *6th. That the judgment upon the proceeding for contempt was erroneous, because the original order of injunction was improper. Benwood was a regular station, at which the company was bound by law under a penalty to receive all passengers and freight that were offered. Drewry v. Thacker, 3 Swanst. R. 546; 2 Eden on Inj. 363.

Russell, for the appellee, insisted:

1st. That the appeal ought not to have been allowed from the judgment in the proceeding for contempt, because it was not an order in the cause, but a judgment in a criminal proceeding at the suit of the commonwealth. And the judgment was correct. 3 Eng. Law and Equ. R. 263; Ogden v. Gibbons, 4 John. Ch. R. 174.

2d. That no appeal lies from a refusal of the judge in vacation to dissolve the injunction. And in this case the order of the judge does not adjudge the principles of the cause, and therefore no appeal lies. Code, ch. 182, § 2, p. 682. At least only the bill can be regarded on the appeal, because the order adjudicated the principles only, if at all, by affirming that the bill contains sufficient equity.

3d. That the city of Wheeling, as a stockholder in the company, had a right to come into equity to enjoin the execution of the illegal contract between the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company and the Central Ohio Company for making the connection at Benwood; and also to enjoin the Baltimore and Ohio Company from constructing a work or expending money not authorized by its charter: And of this character, he insisted, was the building a pier in the bed of the river; the transportation of freight and passengers to and from the state of Ohio by ferriage, &c.; and the loan to the Central Ohio Rail Road Company. He referred to Beman v.

55 Rufford, 6 Eng. Law *& Equ. R. 106; Winch v. Birkenhead Lanc. & Chesh. Junc. Railway Co., 13 Id. 506; Code, ch. 62, § 3, p. 326; Dimmett v. Eskridge, 6 Munf. 308, 311; Inhabitants of Springfield v. Connecticut River R. R. Co., 4 Cush. R. 63; Rex v. Trafford, 20 Eng. C. L. R. 498; Trafford v. The King, 21 Id. 272; Rex v. Ward, 31 Id. 92; Peavey v. Calais R. R. Co., 30 Maine R. 498. To show the rule in construing the powers of corporations, he referred to State of Ohio v. Granville Alexandria Soc., 11 Ohio R. 1, 12; State of Ohio v. Washington Social Library Co., Id. 96; Moorehead v. Little Miami R. R. Co., 17 Id. 340; People v. Utica Ins. Co., 15 John. R. 358, 381; New York Fire Ins. Co. v. Ely, 2 Cow. R. 699; Beaty v. Knowler's lessee, 4 Peters' R. 152; Simpson v. Denison, 13 Eng. Law & Equ. R. 359; and New York & Sharon Canal Co. v. Fulton Bank, 7 Wend. R. 412; and insisted that according to the principle established in these cases, the contract between the two rail road companies, establishing between them a partnership in transporting from one state to another, &c., was unauthorized by the charter of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company. Middle Bridge Corporation v. Marks, 26 Maine R. 326.

4th. That the acts enjoined were illegal, because they were in conflict with the provisions of the company's charter intended to secure to Wheeling the benefit of the western terminus of the road. And that Wheeling would be entitled to enforce these provisions by injunction, even if she had no contract with the company. Blakemore v. Glamorganshire Canal Nav., 6 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 544; Coats v. Clarence Railway Co., 1 Russ. & Mylne 181, 4 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 378; Livingston v. Van Ingen, 9 John. R. 507, 585. But that if this were otherwise, the law, he insisted, was incorporated in the contract between Wheeling and the company, and she might sue to enforce the provisions of the law as parts of 56 her contract. And to aid *in the construction of both, he gave a history of the transactions between the parties, and of the legislation of the state on the same subject; and also a statement of extrinsic circumstances existing at the date of the charter and the contract, and having relation thereto.

5th. To show that the paper on which he relied was an agreement binding on the company, he referred to Shepherd's Touchstone 162; Foster v. Mapes, 1 Leonard's R. 324; Hill v. Carr, 1 Ch. Cas. 294; Hallis v. Carr, 2 Mod. R. 86; Rigly v. Great Western Railway Co., 14 Mees. & Welsb. 811; Easterly v. Sampson, 19 Eng. C. L. R. 188, 17 Id. 431; Saltoun v. Houston, 8 Id. 368; Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Co. v. Baltimore & Ohio Rail Road Co., 4 Gill & John. 1, 129; Newby v. Forsyth, 3 Gratt. 308; Seddon v. Senate, 13 East's R. 63; Duke of St. Albans v. Ellis, 16 Id. 352.

6th. He insisted, that as by the charter of the company Wheeling was entitled to the benefits of the western terminus of the road, the company could not, unless specially authorized, do any act to defeat that benefit, although the act be of a class which was lawful for such corporations generally. Nor could the enumeration of particular means for securing that object absolve the company from the duty of abstaining from all efforts to defeat the object by the exercise of mere general franchises; especially when its charter explicitly confers these general powers only, "so far as properly applicable." Nothing less than an express grant of power to do the very act in the very case could justify acts opposed to the general purpose. He referred to Angel & Ames on Corporations, p. 84, 96; 2 Kent's Com. 298; People v. Utica Ins. Co., 15 John. R. 358, 380; London & Brighton R. R. Co. v. Cooper, 2 Eng. Railr. & Can. Cas. 229; Blakemore v. Glamorganshire Canal Nav., 6 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 544. That this was so under the charter; and that the agreement by the company "to secure to 57 Wheeling the practical *benefits of the terminus," rendered it only still more obligatory upon the company to abstain from every act which could defeat that object. That agreement, interpreted in good faith, signified to Wheeling that the company would so exercise its powers and privileges, under the law, as to secure to her these practical benefits as far as it lawfully could. Or at the very least, that it would not voluntarily exercise or abuse those powers so as to defeat her just expectations as to these benefits, unless obliged by law to do so.

MONCURE, J. Before the merits of this case are considered, it is necessary to dispose of several preliminary questions.

1. As to the order of the Circuit court in the proceeding for contempt. It is not an interlocutory order made in the cause; much less an order adjudicating the principles of the cause. A contempt of court is in the nature of a criminal offense; and the proceeding for its punishment is in the nature of a criminal proceeding. The judgment in such a proceeding can be reviewed, by a superior tribunal, only by writ of error, and not always in that way. Code, p. 682, ch. 182, § 2; p. 737, ch. 194, § 24, 25, 26 and 27; and p. 779, ch. 209, § 1 and 4. This appeal, so far as it is from that order, must therefore be dismissed.

2. As to the objection that no appeal lies from the other order; it being a mere refusal of the judge in vacation to dissolve the injunction, and not an order adjudicating the principles of the cause. There seems to be no substantial difference between the provision on this subject in the Code, p. 682, ch. 182, § 2, and the law as it existed when the Code took effect. In Lomax v. Picot, 2 Rand. 247, it was decided that an order overruling a motion to dissolve an injunction might come within the terms of the law allowing appeals from interlocutory orders, and within the 58 mischief *intended to be remedied by that law. The appeal in that case was from such an order, and the court entertained jurisdiction of it. In Talley v. Tyree, 2 Rob. R. 500, it was held, in accordance with Lomax v. Picot, that an appeal lies to this court from an order of a circuit court overruling a motion to dissolve an injunction which was improvidently granted. The law under which those two cases were decided being the same in effect with the provision on the subject in the Code, they maintain the right of appeal from the order in this case. That order adjudicated the principles of the cause, if any order overruling a motion to dissolve an injunction can have that effect. The court, for good cause shown, may refuse to dissolve an injunction and continue it to the hearing, without adjudicating the principles of the cause; in which case of course no appeal would lie from the order. And even when the principles of the cause are adjudicated by the order, an appeal may be refused, if the court or judge to whom the petition therefor is presented deems it most proper that the cause should be proceeded in farther in the court below before an appeal is allowed therein. Code, p. 684, ch. 182, § 10. Or if an appeal is allowed in such a case, it may be dismissed as having been prematurely allowed, if the court deems it most proper that the cause should be farther proceeded in as aforesaid. The order for the injunction in this case was made by the judge in vacation on the 22d of November 1854. It was made on due notice of the motion therefor to the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company, and after hearing the argument of the counsel of both parties. The reasons of the judge for making the order were given at length, in writing, from which it appears that he then fully considered the principles of the cause as they appeared in the bill and exhibits. The injunction was not perfected by the execution of process until 59 March *1855. The appellants filed their answer on the 30th of April, and on the 12th of May gave notice to the appellee of a motion to dissolve, to be made to the judge in vacation on the 5th day of June next following. On that day the parties appeared by counsel before the judge, and the motion was accordingly made. It was made as well upon the distinct ground that the injunction had been improvidently awarded, as upon the cause as it then stood. The appellee objected to the motion, and to the determination thereof, on the grounds, 1, that the Central Ohio Rail Road Company had not filed an answer; 2, that exceptions had been taken to the sufficiency of the answer of the appellants, which were still pending and undetermined; and 3, that that answer was not verified by affidavit. The said matters being argued by counsel and considered by the judge, he (for the reasons given at the hearing of the motion for the injunction, and filed with the order refusing to dissolve it, and upon the authority of certain cases referred to,) overruled the motion to dissolve, and directed the order of injunction to be continued until further order or decree.

Both parties had taken depositions to sustain their respective allegations in the bill and answer; and those depositions formed part of the cause as it stood when the motion to dissolve was made. The refusal of the judge to dissolve the injunction adjudicated the principles to this extent, that the injunction had not been improvidently awarded, and that as the cause then stood it ought still to be continued. It is therefore such an order as may be appealed from. And it does not seem most proper that the cause should be proceeded in farther in the court below, before an appeal is allowed therein. The parties had ample time to prepare and it seems did fully prepare, the cause for the decision of its principles. It is not probable that any other fact will be 60 brought into it *which can at all affect them. It is mainly, if not entirely, an injunction cause, in which the most summary proceedings compatible with its correct decision seem to be proper. Irreparable mischief may be done, not only by denying, but also by granting and refusing to dissolve an injunction. The legislature has provided the most summary means of relief in both cases, and has authorized an application to a judge in vacation, not only to grant, but to dissolve an injunction. An order refusing to dissolve an injunction seems, therefore, to be peculiarly within the meaning and object of the law authorizing appeals from interlocutory orders adjudicating the principles of a cause. That the order in this case was made in vacation can make no difference. It is an interlocutory order made by authority of law in the cause, and comes within the letter as well as the spirit of the law in regard to appeals. In Penn v. Whiteheads, 12 Gratt. 74, this court entertained jurisdiction of an appeal from such an order, and affirmed it so far as it overruled the motion to dissolve, but reversed it in other respects. That case at least shows that it is no objection to the appeal in this case that the order appealed from was made in vacation.

3. As to the objection that the Central Ohio Rail Road Company had not filed an answer. It is a general rule that an injunction, properly granted, will not be dissolved until all the defendants have answered. But to this rule there are many exceptions. 2 Rob. Pr. 242; Adams' Equity 196, and note 1. It may be dissolved upon the answer of one or more defendants within whose knowledge the facts charged specially or exclusively lie, or upon whom the gravamen of the charge rests; and this, too, where all the defendants are implicated in the same charge, and the answer of all can and ought to come in, if the plaintiff has not taken the requisite steps, with 61 reasonable diligence, to *expedite his cause. See the cases cited in the note to Adams, above referred to. In this case the appellee cannot be charged with any want of diligence in expediting the cause. But the Central Ohio Rail Road Company is a foreign corporation, and cannot be compelled to file an answer. An opportunity will be afforded to the plaintiff, in a proper case, to enforce an answer from all the defendants, before a motion will be heard to dissolve an injunction properly granted; but there can be no reason for affording such an opportunity as to defendants who are out of the jurisdiction of the court, and cannot be compelled to answer. Again, the answer of the Central Ohio Rail Road Company is not required for the purpose of discovery. None of the officers or members of the corporation are made defendants, as might have been done for that purpose; and it is not perceived what effect an answer from that company could have upon the right of the appellants to have the injunction dissolved. Where a discovery is required of a defendant who may be compelled to make it, the answer, though it may not be evidence against a co-defendant, may yet properly have some effect in preventing or postponing a dissolution of the injunction.

4. As to the objection that the appellants' answer was insufficient. This objection is answered by the rule that upon a motion to dissolve an injunction on bill and answer, the facts alleged in the bill and not denied by the answer, are taken to be true; which is the most that the appellee could obtain from a full answer. None of the officers or members of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company are made defendants, as they might have been, for the purpose of discovery. But the president of the company was examined as a witness, and answered all the interrogatories propounded to him by the appellee.

5. As to the objection that the ap-
62 pellants' answer *was not verified by affidavit. A corporation cannot be sworn, and therefore must put in its answer under its common seal only. Story's Eq. Pl. § 235. If the plaintiff wishes to have a sworn answer, he must make some of the officers or members of the corporation parties. The answer of a corporation not being verified by affidavit, is no evidence for the defendant, though responsive to the bill. But it at least has the effect of putting the allegation to which it responds in issue, and of imposing on the plaintiff the burden of proving it. This is, undoubtedly, its effect on the hearing of the cause; and it is not perceived why the same effect does not exist on a motion to dissolve. That it does, was decided by Judge Washington in Haight v. Proprietors of Morris Aqueduct, 4 Wash. C. C. R. 601. The case of Fulton

Bank v. New York & Sharon Canal Company, 1 Paige's R. 311, seems to be contra. But the circumstances in that case were peculiar. The case of the Union Bank of Georgetown v. Geary, 5 Peters' R. 99, tends to sustain the case in 4 Wash. supra. The difficulty in that case was in not giving to the answer of a corporation, under its common seal, the same effect as to the sworn answer of an individual. But the court inclined to adopt it as a general rule, that an answer not under oath is to be considered merely as a denial of the allegations in the bill, analogous to the general issue at law, so as to put the complainant to the proof of such allegation. Even if it would have been improper to have dissolved the injunction in this case on the bill and answer only, it might still have been proper to have done so in the condition in which the case stood when the motion was made.

It may be remarked, in reference to all of the three last mentioned objections, that whether they are well or ill founded, it was error to refuse to dissolve the injunction if it was improvidently awarded.

63 *Having disposed of all the preliminary questions, I will proceed to consider whether, on the merits, the motion to dissolve the injunction was properly overruled.

Wheeling claims to have the acts complained of enjoined, because they are in violation of her rights; first, under the act of March 6, 1847; secondly, under the contract of July 6, 1847; and, thirdly, as a stockholder. And,

First: Under the act of March 6, 1847.

Wheeling claims that under this act the benefits of the western terminus of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road are secured to her; that the appellants had no power to do, or were bound to refrain from doing, any thing which might deprive her of any of these benefits; and that the acts enjoined would have that effect, and therefore are unlawful. On the other hand, the appellants contend that they have done every thing they were bound to do to secure to Wheeling the benefits of the western terminus; that their interest and duty required them to connect at Benwood with the Central Ohio rail road, which terminated on the opposite side of the river at Bellair; that they were expressly authorized by the act to make such a connection; and that in doing the acts enjoined they were doing no more than was necessary to enable them to effect that object. Let us see what are the relative rights of the parties. And to enable us to do so we must look to the act itself, and as far as may be necessary, to the preceding acts in pari materia, and to the surrounding facts.

The first Virginia act on the subject of the road, the act of March 8, 1827, which re-enacted, with modifications, the Maryland charter passed in the preceding month, did not fix any definite terminus, but required that the road should not strike the Ohio lower down than the mouth of 64 the Little Kanawha. *In the succeeding year an act was passed by Pennsylvania, authorizing the company to make the road through that state, on condition of making it, or a branch, to Pittsburg. Under the acts of these three states, the company had a broad river front, as they call it, extending from Pittsburg to the mouth of the Little Kanawha, in which to select a terminus. It seems they selected two, Wheeling and Pittsburg. But the time limited by these acts expired, leaving the work unfinished beyond Harpers Ferry. In 1836, 1837 and 1838, other acts were passed by Virginia, assuming that Wheeling was to be the terminus, authorizing conditional subscriptions to the work by Wheeling and the state, and extending the period of its completion to 1843. But this period also expired, leaving the work unfinished beyond Cumberland.

Pennsylvania, it seems, was unwilling to renew the permission to make the road through that state, except on condition of making Pittsburg the terminus; and the company could get to the Ohio river at no other point but by passing through the territory of Virginia, without passing through that of Pennsylvania. They accordingly made an application to the legislature at the session of 1843–'44 for the privilege of extending their road to the Ohio, without restriction as to terminus, except that it should be north of the mouth of the Little Kanawha, as in the original act of 1827. "This, (in the language of the learned counsel for Wheeling,) was the opening of the controversy between the company and Wheeling." The application failed. It was renewed at the session of 1844–'45, and again failed. But an act was then passed, (Sess. Acts, p. 69,) the first section of which authorized the company to construct their road, in whole or in part, through the territory of this state, "so as to terminate and strike the Ohio river at the city of Wheeling;" and in the 17th section it was declared that "no part 65 *of this act shall be so construed as to authorize or permit the said company to construct their said rail road, or any branch thereof, to any point on the Ohio river below the said city of Wheeling." The act contained many other provisions objectionable to the company, and they rejected it. In 1845–'46 another act was passed, repealing some of the objectionable features of the act of 1844–'45, but leaving the provisions as to the route and terminus in force. Sess. Acts, p. 88. This act was not accepted. At the next session of the legislature, the act of March 6, 1847, was passed; which was accepted, (after the contract with Wheeling of July 6, 1847, was entered into). The terms of this act and the relative rights of the parties under it, are now to be considered.

The first section authorizes the company to complete their road through the territory of the state, so as to pass from a point in the ravine of Buffalo creek at or near the mouth of Piles' fork to a depot to be established by said company on the northern side of Wheeling creek in the city of Wheeling, by such route as, upon minute estimates, &c., shall appear to be the cheapest upon which to construct, maintain and work said road. Provided that it should not be made to enter the ravine of the Ohio river at any point further south than the mouth of Fish creek: or at any point further south than Grave creek, if Wheeling would pay the excess of the cost of the latter over the former route.

The second section is in these words: "That to secure to the said city of Wheeling the benefit of the western terminus, all parts of the said railroad between the Monongahela river and said terminus, shall be opened for the transportation of freight and passengers simultaneously; and the aggregate charge for toll and transportation, upon freight and passengers respectively, shall be the same between 66 Baltimore and *any point on said road within a direct distance of five miles from the Ohio river, as between Baltimore and Wheeling."

The 6th section declares, "that the said company shall be subject to the provisions of the act of assembly passed on the 11th day of March 1837, establishing general regulations for the incorporation of rail road companies, with respect to that portion of their road or other improvements now or hereafter to be constructed within this commonwealth, so far as the same are properly applicable;" and a proviso is added as to charges on way trade and travel.

The 9th section authorizes Wheeling to subscribe to the capital stock of the company such sum not exceeding one million dollars, and upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the council of said city and said railroad company.

By the 11th section, the act is to be accepted in six months, and the road to be begun in three years, and completed in twelve.

By the 25th section of the general rail road law above referred to, authority is given to the president and directors of a company, which is subject to that law, to make branches or lateral rail roads in any direction whatever, in connection with their rail road, not exceeding ten miles in length, &c. This provision is to be considered as much a part of the act of March 6, 1847, as if it had been embodied therein in totidem verbis, if it be "properly applicable." The appellants contend that it is so applicable, and under it claim the right to make the connection at Benwood. On the other hand, Wheeling contends that it is not so applicable; at least to the extent of authorizing that connection. She does not deny that the provision is applicable to some extent; that it confers on the company the branching power. Indeed, the 4th section of the act of March 6, 1847,
67 expressly recognizes the *existence of such a power. But she contends that it must be taken in subordination to the main intent of the act to confer on her the practical benefit of the western terminus; and that it cannot be so exercised as to contravene that benefit: especially, that it cannot be exercised for the purpose of connecting with the Ohio river or the improvements on the other side, except at Wheeling. This is the main, if not the only hinge on which this controversy turns.

I am of opinion that the provision is applicable, and does authorize the connection in question. What was the state of things when the act was passed? Wheeling had desired not only that the road should run to her, but run and terminate in such a way as that it could make no connection with the river or improvements beyond it but in that city. The company had desired so to run and terminate the road as to be in a position to make the most favorable connections with those great highways. The legislature had favored the views of Wheeling, and passed the acts of 1845 and 1846. But those acts could have no effect without the consent of the company. The road was to be made with their money, and would cost about six million dollars. They were unwilling to expend and risk so large a sum without more favorable terms than those acts presented, and therefore declined to accept them. The route to Pittsburg was still within their power; and some of the stockholders, it seems, desired to pursue that route. But a majority were still anxious to terminate the road at or below Wheeling. It very clearly appeared that if it passed through Virginia, it must terminate at Wheeling: and the company were willing to make it to Wheeling, provided they could pursue such a route as would place them in a position to make the connections they desired. There were two great rail roads then in a course of construction in 68 Ohio, and approaching *the river: The Central Ohio road passing through the centre of the state, and the Cincinnati and Marietta road passing through the southern part. The company desired to connect with both of these roads. They supposed that by running their road to the river at the mouth of Fishing creek, and thence up the river about forty miles to Wheeling, the object they had in view would be effected. They would then have it in their power to connect with those roads at any point or points in all that river front of forty miles, which the termination of those roads on the river might render necessary. They accordingly proposed to the legislature, at the session of 1846-'47, so to run their road. Their proposition was rejected, and the act of that session was passed, the terms of which have already been referred to. Wheeling was in favor of it; and her object was the passage of such an act as would be most apt to attain her views, and at the same time hold out sufficient inducements to its acceptance by the company.

In this state of things, it was important that the act should plainly express the intention of the legislature; that nothing should be intended which was not expressed, and nothing expressed which was not intended, in order that there might be no mistake on either side. When, therefore, the legislature by that act gave to the company the branching power without any express restriction, it cannot be fairly presumed that they intended to restrict it. If they had so intended, they ought and would have said so expressly. It was known that the company desired to make connections wherever they could do so to advantage; especially with the river and roads beyond it. And it was known that it might be necessary to connect with those roads below Wheeling, should they terminate below that city. With this knowledge, the act was passed.

69 *Another important fact, tending to show that such a restriction as is contended for was not intended, is, that in the act of 1845, which was rejected by the company, the branching power was given in precisely the same terms as in the act of 1847, but with an express restriction to prevent the road or a branch from striking the river below Wheeling. Why, then, was this express restriction in the act of 1845 left out of the act of 1847, if it was not by design; and because it was known that, with its insertion, the latter act would have shared the fate of its predecessors, and been rejected by the company? We are irresistibly led to the conclusion, then, that the omission was by design.

It was doubtless the desire of the legislature, as well as of Wheeling and the company, that all the connections with the river and the improvements beyond it should be made in Wheeling. But the subject was not entirely within their control. The Ohio companies might terminate their works according to their pleasure, and would do so according to their interest. They were embarrassed; and want of funds might prevent them from reaching Wheeling. It was proper, therefore, that the appellants should be left free to make connections wherever necessity might require and the location of their road along the river might enable them. Wheeling, not being able to do better, was willing to incur this risk for the sake of the benefits she expected to derive from the road. It was expressly required to terminate at Wheeling: That benefit she would certainly obtain by its construction; the benefit of a direct and continuous rail way to one of the largest and most important Atlantic cities; the benefit of daily arrivals and departures of rail road trains from and to that city; and all the local benefits necessarily incident to the terminus of a great rail road. She desired benefits beyond these—the ben-

70 efit *of connections between that and other roads within her limits. But she expected to obtain them by the advantages of her position, her wealth, trade, population and importance; which she hoped and expected would be sufficient to attract to her limits all connections which might otherwise have been made at some other point of the road within its limited river front of ten or twenty miles. For these expected benefits the company did not stipulate by the acceptance of the act, except to the extent of a compliance with its terms. It does contain terms which were intended to promote the attainment of these benefits. But these very terms plainly indicate that the company would have the power to make connections below Wheeling, if necessary. The first section, requiring the road not to enter the ravine of the Ohio lower down than a certain point, shows that Wheeling was to incur the risk of intermediate connections. The second section shows the same thing. In requiring all parts of the road between the Monongahela and Wheeling to be opened for transportation simultaneously, and the aggregate charge for toll and transportation to be the same between Baltimore and any point on the road within five miles of the Ohio river as between Baltimore and Wheeling, it was intended to give to Wheeling these advantages in attracting connections to her limits, but not to prohibit them elsewhere.

These being the relative rights of the parties under the act of March 6, 1847, have the rights of Wheeling been violated by the appellants? They made the road within the time and along the route prescribed by the act. It terminates in Wheeling, to and from which all the through trains run, and where all the depots and other structures suitable to the terminus of such a road have been erected, and where a large force of officers, clerks, mechanics and laborers are constantly employed. The requisi-

71 tions of the 2d section have *been strictly complied with; or, at least, there is no complaint in that respect. And the only complaint on the part of Wheeling, is of the connection at Benwood. Is that a violation of her rights under the act? I think not. I think they had a right to make it, under their branching power. They deny that the necessity which has arisen to make it was the result of any act or course of policy on their part: And in support of this denial, they refer to and exhibit a letter of their late president, Mr. Swann, in reply to one from the president of the Central Ohio rail road of December 18, 1849, made an exhibit with the bill, in which the writer says, "This company have no intention of making a terminus at any other point than the city of Wheeling: nor could I advise you to locate your work under any expectation of this company doing more than making their road under their Virginia charter, to its terminus on the Ohio river at that city. The whole road from the Ohio river to the city of Wheeling will be put under contract at the same time, and pressed to completion, so as to be opened simultaneously throughout its entire length."

It appears, from the evidence of Mr. Harrison, the present president, and Mr. Done, master of transportation, that the company had no agency, directly or indirectly, in the selection of the route of the Central

Ohio road, or in causing it to stop at Bellair. These witnesses say they were anxious to connect with that road through Wheeling, and endeavored to effect that object, but the president of that road refused, and insisted on the connection between Benwood and Bellair. The appellants, then, had to choose between the alternatives of that direct connection and the circuitous and uncertain one through Wheeling; in the latter case, subjecting passengers to the inconvenience of an additional journey of eight miles, one-half of it by water or in an omnibus, according to the state of 72 navigation, *and to the danger of being delayed on their way by not arriving in time to make the connection; and subjecting themselves, in their competition with other great rival roads, to the disadvantage of such a break. They chose the former, as it was their interest, and I think their right to do. Suppose the Central Ohio road had terminated opposite Moundsville, at the mouth of Grave creek, where the Baltimore road first enters the ravine of the river, and ten or eleven miles below Wheeling, would a connection at that point have been unlawful? It is necessary to maintain that it would, in order to carry out the principle contended for by Wheeling in regard to the connection at Benwood. And so also, if the Cincinnati and Marietta road should reach and terminate at a point opposite Moundsville.

If the company have the right to make the connection at Benwood, it is their right and duty to provide all proper facilities to effect the object in a manner most convenient for their travel and trade; and there is nothing in the manner of making the connection which can give Wheeling a right, under the act of 1847, to complain.

The next question to be considered is as to her rights:

Secondly: Under the contract of July 6, 1847.

So much of what has been said under the preceding head is applicable to this, that it will not be necessary to say much more. I am of opinion that there is nothing in this contract which can restrain the right to make the connection in question any more than in the act of 1847. The contract was obviously designed on the part of Wheeling to induce the company to accept the act, and prosecute at their earliest convenience the construction of the road. It consists almost entirely of terms to be fulfilled on the part of Wheeling. She agreed, 73 1, to grant ten acres of land *for a depot; 2, to secure the right of way within her limits; 3, to subscribe five hundred thousand dollars to the stock of the company; 4, to waive, sub modo, the control given her by the act of 1847 over the selection of routes between Fish creek and Grave creek; and 5, to be bound by the contract so soon as the stockholders of the company should accept the act of March 6, 1847, and agree to prosecute, at the earliest convenience of the company, the construction of the road from Cumberland to Wheeling. The acceptance of the act and early prosecution of the work seem here to be the only consideration for the stipulations made on the part of Wheeling; and this is not affected by any thing that follows in the contract; which contains four other paragraphs: The first of which provides for the return to Wheeling of the amount paid on account of her subscription and cost of depots and interest, in case the road should not be made in time. The second is an agreement on the part of the committee of the company to convene a meeting of the stockholders at as early a day as practicable, and to recommend to them the acceptance of the conditions above referred to. The third is in these words: "It being the intention of the parties to this agreement, among other things, to secure to the city of Wheeling the practical benefits of the western terminus of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, according to the provisions of the said law." The fourth declares the understanding to be, that the necessary surveys and estimates should be made, and the route decided upon, as soon after the ratification of the agreement by both parties as the company should find convenient.

If any additional obligation is imposed on the company, it is by the third of the four paragraphs above mentioned. It is difficult to perceive the precise purpose for which that paragraph was inserted. Without making any speculations on the 74 subject, it is enough *to say that, in my opinion, it imposes no additional obligation on the company. The words "according to the provisions of the said law," with which the paragraph closes, expressly limits the security referred to, to a compliance with the provisions of the law. It therefore only raises the question which I have already fully considered under the preceding head. Certainly the company, unwilling to accept the act without further inducements from Wheeling, would not have agreed to surrender a right secured to them by that act; especially a right so important to enable them to make the connections they had so long desired. Wheeling knew they desired to make them, and might have an opportunity of doing so at any point in all their river front. She knew they had the branching power, without any express restriction in the act. And if she desired to restrain them, she ought to have done so expressly in the contract. Had she insisted on such a restriction, it would doubtless have resulted in a rejection of the act. The strict rule of construction contended for in regard to charters of incorporation, certainly do not apply to a contract made between two corporations. The waiver by Wheeling of her control over the selection of routes, (thus giving the company, as they then supposed, the right to enter the ravine of the river as low down as Fish creek, twenty-eight miles below Wheeling, instead of Grave creek, eleven miles below,) serves strongly to show that, instead of giving up the right to make favorable connections below Wheeling, the company desired and intended by the contract to enlarge that right, by extending their river front. That such was their desire and intention, and such their understanding of the contract, plainly appears from the report of the committee, (made in pursuance of a stipulation contained in the contract,) recommending the acceptance of the act and ratification 75 of the contract, *to the stockholders. Upon that recommendation the act was accepted and the contract ratified.

It now only remains to be considered, whether the rights of Wheeling have been violated:

Thirdly: As a stockholder.

The ground on which she bases her claim to relief as a stockholder is, that the acts enjoined are unlawful; and therefore any stockholder of the company may have an injunction to restrain them. Some of these acts are said to be unlawful, without respect to their effect on Wheeling as the terminus; and others, only because in contravention of the purposes of the law to secure to her the benefits of the terminus. I have already disposed of the latter. The former only remain to be considered under this head. As enumerated by the counsel for Wheeling, they are, 1. The construction of a pier in the bed of the river, with a rail way track upon it; 2. The contract with the Central Ohio Rail Road Company; 3. The transportation of freight and passengers to and from the state of Ohio by ferriage, &c.; and 4. The loan to that company. The appellants deny that they have violated, or intended to violate, the law in any of these respects. But I deem it unnecessary to enquire how far the appellants are implicated in these acts, or whether the said acts or any of them be in themselves unlawful or not; as I am decidedly of opinion that, even if they be so, the claim of Wheeling as a stockholder to have them enjoined cannot be maintained. Undoubtedly there are cases in which a stockholder may be entitled to this mode of relief. Cases, for instance, in which the property or powers of the company are about to be perverted to a purpose wholly or materially different from that which was designed by the act of incorporation. If a company incorporated to make a rail road should be about to make a canal; or, incorporated to make a road from A to B, should be about to make one 76 from A to C. These *would be plain and palpable violations of the charter, and would be restrained at the suit of a dissatisfied stockholder.

The cases relied on by the counsel for Wheeling in support of her claim as a stockholder, seem to be of this kind. In Beman v. Rufford, 6 Eng. Law & Eq. R. 106, one rail way company gave up the management of its line to another. Lord Cranworth, V. C., who decided the case, said, "In my opinion, that is delegating the functions which the legislature has given them to other parties; which they have no possible right to do. For the security of the public, there are a vast quantity of duties imposed on the company," &c. But even in that case, he said, "I only restrain them from carrying into execution that portion of it, (the agreement between the two companies,) which we call, for want of a better expression, irreparable injury; that is, the expenditure of money which it will be impossible, perhaps, ever to get back again."

The suit there was brought by some of the stockholders in behalf of themselves and the others. Winch v. The Birkenhead, &c., Railway Co., 13 Id. 506, decided by Turner, V. C., was a similar case; and the right to relief by injunction was sustained on similar grounds. There, too, the suit was brought by one of the stockholders in behalf of himself and all the rest. Even in cases of this kind, relief by injunction has been very cautiously administered; and has been denied to parties in consequence of their acquiescence in the illegal act of the company, or other peculiar circumstances. Graham v. Birkenhead, &c., Co., 6 Id. 132, decided by Lord Cottenham, and Ffooks v. The London, &c., Co., 19 Eng. Law & Eq. R. 7, decided by Stuart, V. C., were cases of this class. Some of the observations of the court in those cases apply very forcibly to this; but I will not prolong my opinion by repeating them.

In this case there has been no perversion of the property or powers of the com-
77 pany to a purpose *wholly or materially different from that which was designed by the act of incorporation. The connection at Benwood seems to have been required by the interest of all the stockholders, and was in direct furtherance of the design of their work to form a part of a great national thoroughfare. Every stockholder, except Wheeling, must have been in favor of that connection; and Wheeling would doubtless have been so, if her relation to the subject had been only that of a stockholder. She has other interests to subserve, which prompt her to endeavor to avail herself of her position as a stockholder to arrest, by injunction, the contemplated connection, though at the imminent risk of loss to all the other stockholders, as well as of great inconvenience to a large portion of the traveling public. Under such circumstances, can she be entertained in a court of equity in her character of stockholder, merely because, in the manner of making the connection, the navigation of the Ohio river may be obstructed, the franchise of some neighboring ferry owner may be interfered with, or the powers of the corporation may, in some other respect, be exceeded or misused. I think not.

I am, therefore, for dismissing the appeal, as improvidently allowed, so far as it is from the order of the Circuit court in the proceeding for contempt; for reversing, with costs, the order of the judge in vacation refusing to dissolve and continuing the injunction; and for dissolving the said injunction.

78 *Bull & als. v. Read & als.

October Term, 1855, Richmond.

1. Chancery Practice—Suit by One or More Persons to Test Validity of Act.—A statute having provided for a system of free schools in a particular district in a county, and provided for commissioners to establish and manage the schools; some of the inhabitants of the district may file a bill in behalf of themselves and the other inhabitants against the commissioners, to test the validity of the act, and the propriety of the proceedings of the commissioners under it.

2. Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Where a large number of persons are interested in a common subject, and acts are done to the injury of the common right, the approval of the majority will neither excuse the wrong nor take away from the other parties their remedy by suit.

3. Statutes—Power of Legislature to Delegate Authority to Adopt.†—An act is passed providing for the establishment of a system of free schools in a particular district in a county; and it provides that it shall not be carried into effect until the people of the district shall, by a vote taken for the purpose, approve it. A majority of the people of the district having approved it by their vote, the act is a valid and constitutional law.‡

4. Same—Levy of Tax to Support District Schools—Constitutionality.—The act provides for the election of certain commissioners who are authorized to establish schools in the district, and to levy taxes for their support. This is constitutional.

5. Same—Authority of Commissioners to Build Schools.—The commissioners being authorized to establish schools and levy taxes sufficient to defray the expenses thereof; they may build the necessary school-houses, and levy sufficient taxes to pay for them.

6. Same—Same—Ad Valorem Tax upon Slaves—Constitutionality of.—The act authorizes the commissioners to levy a capitation tax upon the white male inhabitants, and an ad valorem tax upon the property of the district, sufficient to raise the amount necessary to defray the expense of the schools. This provision is to be construed in accordance with the constitution; and the capitation tax is properly levied upon the white male inhabitants above twenty-one years of age only; and the ad valorem tax upon slaves is property levied upon slaves over twelve years of age, and valued each at three hundred dollars. And the ratio of the capitation to the ad valorem tax may be greater than that prescribed in the constitution. Article 4, § 25.

79 *Thomas W. Bull and sixteen others, white male inhabitants of the first magisterial district in the county of Accomack, in behalf of themselves and the other inhabitants of said district, except the defendants, applied to the judge of the Circuit court of that county for an injunction against the board of school commissioners of that magisterial district. In their bill they set out the provisions of an act of the general assembly of Virginia, passed the 31st of March 1853, entitled, "An act to establish the first magisterial district free school in the county of Accomack." By the first section of his act it is provided, that that portion of Accomack county, known by the name of the first magisterial district, shall form a district distinct from the other portions of the county. By the second section, the County court of said county is directed to order a vote to be taken in said district for or against the establishment of a separate free school system within and for that district; and the court is directed to appoint a day not exceeding six months after the passage of the act, and a suitable place within the district for holding said election. The third section provides that commissioners of election shall certify the result of the election to the court within ten days from the time of holding the same.

*Chancery Practice—Suit by One or More Persons to Test the Validity of a Statute.—For the proposition laid down in the principal case that, one of the inhabitants of the district may file a bill in behalf of himself and the other inhabitants against commissioners, to test the validity of the act and the propriety of the proceedings under it, the principal case is cited and followed in the following cases: McClung v. The fourth section declares that if three-fifths of the voters be in favor of adopting a separate free school system within and for said district, the said court shall have the fact entered to the minutes of their proceedings: And this section also provides for three commissioners. These commissioners are constituted a corporation under the name and style of "The Board of school commissioners for the first magisterial district free school in Accomack county;" with power to sue and be sued, and to "take and hold, to them and their successors in office, any property which may be given, granted, bequeathed or devised to 80 them, or which they may *purchase, to an amount not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars." The commissioners are authorized to establish, if they deem it necessary, more than one school for said district, at such place or places therein as they think best, adapted to the wants and convenience of the scholars in said district. The ninth section provides for the boards holding annual meetings to "ascertain the amount necessary to defray the expense of the school or schools for said district;" and declares, that "the said board shall levy a capitation tax upon the white male inhabitants, and an ad valorem tax upon the property of said district sufficient to raise the necessary amount: provided such amount be not less than two hundred and fifty dollars per annum." There is a provision for the appointment of a superintendent, who is to be the treasurer and clerk of the board; and he is to collect the taxes assessed by the board, with the powers of sheriffs in the collection of county and state taxes. And another section provides for abolishing the system by a majority of the votes taken as therein provided.

The vote having been taken according to the directions of the act, the system was adopted by a vote of one hundred and seventy-two to twenty-five; and subsequently, Richard P. Read, Augustus J. F. Kellam and James R. Garrison, were elected commissioners. These commissioners organized by appointing Obed P. Twiford superintendent. They then determined on the number and fixed the location of the school-houses, fixing the number at eight; and they proceeded to let out to the lowest bidder the contracts for building the houses; the aggregate cost of the eight amounting to three thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven dollars and ten cents. At another meeting, in March 1854, they proceeded to assess the tax for that year, laying a capitation tax on white males above twenty-one years old, at five dollars;
81 *slaves over twelve years valued at three hundred dollars, tax on land, slaves and personal property, at fifty cents on the hundred dollars; the whole assessment amounting to about six thousand five hundred and twenty-five dollars.

The plaintiffs in their bill insist that the board had no authority, under the act of assembly, to build school-houses, or to raise funds, by taxation, for that purpose. That the board should have levied a capitation tax on all white male inhabitants of the district, of whatever age, instead of restricting it to those above the age of twenty-one years. That the mode of levying the tax on slaves, in confining it to those above the age of twelve years, and fixing the value of all above that age at three hundred dollars, was in violation of the act of assembly: And that the act itself was unconstitutional and void, in providing that it should be submitted to the vote of the people of the district for ratification.

The defendants to the bill were the three commissioners and the superintendent, who filed their answer, and put in issue the several questions raised by the plaintiffs. And the cause coming on to be heard on the 24th day of January 1855, the injunction which had been granted was dissolved and the bill dismissed. Whereupon the plaintiffs applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Patton, for the appellants:

1st. To show that the mode of proceeding by bill in equity was proper, referred to Calvert on Parties 35, 17 Law Libr.; Story's Equ. Pl. § 114, 115, a, b; Bromley v. Smith, 2 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 5; Milligan v. Mitchell, 3 Mylne & Craig 72, 84; Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh 120; Osborn v. Bank U. S., 9 Wheat. R. 738; Bonaparte v. Camden & Amboy R. R. Co., Baldwin's R.
82 *205, 218; Gardner v. Village of Newburgh, 2 John. Ch. R. 162; Belknap v. Belknap, Id. 463.

2d. To show that this act was to be construed as a private act, he referred to 7 Dodd's Bac. Abr. title Statute, letter F, p. 444; Dwarris on Statutes, p. 629, 9 Law Libr. And to show that a private statute was not to be liberally construed, he referred to Threadneedle v. Lyman, 2 Mod. R. 57. And that when a law is plain and unambiguous, there is no room for construction, but it is to be understood according to its terms, he referred to United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch's R. 358, 386, 390, 399; Lofft's R. 438; Dwarris on Statutes, 711, 748, 750, 9 Law Libr.; Rex v. Croke, Cowp. R. 26; Jones v. Smart, 1 T. R. 52.

3d. He insisted that though the act, Sess. Acts 1852-3, p. 232, provides for schools, and authorizes a levy for the amount of the annual expenses of the school, it does not authorize a levy for building school-houses; and the language is inconsistent with and inapplicable to that object. The word school refers to pupils, not the house in which they are taught. And he referred to many acts of the general assembly establishing such schools, in all of which, except those relating to the county of Accomack, the authority to build or purchase school-houses was expressly given. He referred to Priestman v. The United States, 4 Dall. R. 30, note 1; Moser v. Newman & Boole, 19 Eng. C. L. R. 165; and he insisted that if the general assembly intended to give this power, quod voluit non dixit.

4th. That the act did not authorize the omission of all the white males under twenty-one years old, from the capitation tax; nor the omission of slaves under twelve, or the fixing the price of every slave over twelve at three hundred dollars, in laying an ad valorem tax upon personal property. That when the act said white males, it included all of them, and 83 *when it authorized an ad valorem tax upon personal property, it meant all of it. That the board had no authority to adapt the act to the provisions of the constitution; the board being but a creature of the act and deriving all its authority from it. That if the legislature could not confer the power as given, then it was a void power. That the board derived no power from the constitution but from the law; and the law conferring on them an unconstitutional power, it is void and illegal; and the board could not execute it upon the doctrine of cy pries. Christy v. Minor, 4 Munf. 431; Wilson v. Bell, 7 Leigh 22; Nalle v. Fenwick, 4 Rand. 585; Allen v. Smith, 1 Leigh 231; Chapman v. Bennett, 2 Leigh 329; Jesse v. Preston, 5 Gratt. 120. And in fact the relative amount of the capitation tax and the tax upon property, was not that fixed in the constitution; but to make it conform to that rule the capitation tax should have been thirty-six cents instead of five dollars.

5th. That the law was unconstitutional and void, because the general assembly, instead of exercising the legislative power exclusively vested in it by the constitution, and enacting the law, referred it to a vote of the people, and made its existence as a law to depend upon the vote of the people. He admitted that there had been a number of statutes similar in this respect to this act, but said the subject had not been considered. But the evil had now gone to such an extent as to have attracted attention to it, and the most serious consequences might arise if the system was not arrested. Upon the question of the constitutionality of the act, he referred to Price v. Foster, 4 Harring. R. 479; Parker v. Commonwealth, 6 Barr Pa. R. 507; Bradley v. Baxter, 1 Amer. Law Reg. for August 1853, p. 658, 15 Barb. Sup. C't R. 122; Thom v. Thamer, Id. 112; Barto v. Himrod & als., 6 Monthly Law Rep. for 1853, N. S. 238; People 84 v. Collins, *Amer. Law Reg. 1854, p. 591. And further, that the act was unconstitutional because it gave the power of taxation to these commissioners. That though the courts had sustained the power of the County courts to levy taxes, this was on the ground of immemorial usage; a ground which could not be invoked for such boards as this. And the constitution having required the legislature to levy a tax for schools, it could not confer that power on a part of the people.

Lyons, for the appellees, insisted:

1st. That the act is to be expounded reasonably, and with a view to the end to be accomplished; and the real intention when ascertained, is to be carried out, though against the letter of the statute. Dwarris on Statutes, p. 688, 9 Law Libr. Nor is the intent to be ascertained from a particular expression, but from the whole act. Id. 703; Cooper v. Telfair, 4 Dall. R. 14; Pennington v. Coxe, 2 Cranch's R. 33; United States v. Fisher, 2 Id. 358; Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Id. 87.

The language of the Code, p. 376, is that they shall provide school-houses; and this may be done by building as well as buying. By the act under consideration the commissioners have authority to receive and to purchase property, to establish schools, to visit schools, &c. A school is defined to be a place where any language or science is taught, or a place for all kinds of education. And as a school cannot exist without a local habitation, when the commissioners are authorized to establish schools, and to levy for the expenses attending them, the term must be held to embrace the preparation of a suitable building, as well as the appointment of a teacher, and the regulation of the institution.

2d. That the act did not intend to embrace all the white males in the capitation tax, because it would be impossible to as-85 certain them at any one moment; *and the omission of one would be as much a violation of the law as the omission of all under the age of twenty-one years. The constitution provides for the levy of a tax for education purposes, upon white males over the age of twenty-one years, and the act should be construed with reference to this constitutional provision, and as not intended to conflict with it.

3d. That as slaves under twelve years old are exempted from taxation by the constitution, it was proper to exempt them in this case. So as the constitution had fixed the value of slaves who are to be taxed, it was proper for these commissioners to adopt that valuation. Indeed, it was necessary for them to do so, as they had no authority to appoint a person to value them; and their assessment of the tax was necessarily based upon the valuations of property made by the state officers. And as to the relative amount of the capitation tax and the levy upon property, the act left that to the discretion of the commissioners.

4th. That the question as to the constitutionality of the law made by the appellants, did not arise in this case. That there was nothing in this act which was not done every day in the creation of corporations for useful or private purposes. The act was passed by the general assembly, and became a law, by its terms, from its passage. The people were not authorized to say whether it should be a law; but whether, it being a law, they would accept its provisions made solely for their benefit. What the people were to do, was precisely what is to be done by those interested in every case of a charter of incorporation granted by the general assembly. That to hold that this act is unconstitutional, would be to condemn and overturn a large mass of our legislation; legislation which had been most considerately entered upon, as was to be seen by the provisions in the Code of 1849; and to destroy our whole system of free schools.

86 The counsel *then reviewed the cases cited on this question by the counsel for the appellants, and insisted that they either related to laws essentially unlike the one before the court, or enunciated principles inconsistent with the settled doctrines of this court. And as to conferring the power of taxation on the commissioners, he referred to the Fairfax Justices, 5 Call 139; Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh 120; Harrison Justices v. Holland, 3 Gratt. 247.

LEE, J. The mode of suing in this case and the jurisdiction of the court have both been called in question but as I think upon insufficient grounds. The act in question is one necessarily affecting all the inhabitants of the district named who in respect of persons or property were liable to taxation under its provisions; and as they were many in number but had a common interest, it was allowable according to settled practice, for some to file a bill on behalf of themselves and the other inhabitants similarly situated seeking any relief to which they might all in common be justly entitled, although their individual interests might be several and distinct. Calvert on Parties 28; Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. R. 321; Chancey v. May, Pr. in Chy. 592; Attorney General v. Heelis, 2 Sim. & Stu. 67, 1 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 348; Gray v. Chaplin, 2 Sim. & Stu. 267, Id. 451; Blackman v. The Warden and Society of Sutton Coldfield, 1 Chy. Cas. 269; Mit. Pl. 137; Milligan v. Mitchell, 3 Mylne & Craig 72, 14 Eng. Ch. R. 72. And it would seem where a large number of persons are thus interested in a common subject and acts be done to the injury of the common right, the approval of the majority will neither excuse the wrong nor take away from the other parties their remedy by suit. Bromley v. Smith, 1 Sim. R. 8, 2 Cond. Eng. Ch. 5. See also Sto. Eq. Pl. § 107, 112, 114, 120; Taylor v. Salmon, 4 Mylne 87 *& Craig 134, 18 Eng. Ch. R. 133, opinion of Lord Cottenham; Wallworth v. Holt, Id. 619; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 287, et seq.

Nor is the jurisdiction of the court of equity in such a case more difficult to be maintained. It may be that for each act of the board of commissioners affecting the inhabitants of the district, every one who is aggrieved might have a remedy at law of some sort, more or less effectual, but the remedy in equity would be far more perfect adequate and complete, and as the acts of the commissioners would be in their nature continuing and to be renewed from time to time, to restrict the parties to their legal remedies would be to consign them to interminable litigation and involve endless multiplicity of suits. Hence the court of chancery will interpose by its injunction to prevent the threatened wrong and provide a remedy which shall at once reach the whole mischief and secure the rights of all both for the present and the future: and its jurisdiction in such cases would seem to be well defined and fully sustained by authority. Mit. Pl. 89, et seq. 117; Sto. Eq. Jur. § 33, § 437; Hughes v. Trustees of Modern College, 1 Ves. R. 188; Shand v. Aberdeen Canal Company, 2 Dow. Par. R. 519; Agar v. Regent's Canal Company, Coop. Eq. R. 77; Gardner v. Trustees of Newburgh, 2 John. Ch. R. 162; Belknap v. Belknap, Ibid. 463; Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat. R. 738; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 6 Pick. R. 376; Crenshaw v. Slate River Company, 6 Rand. 245; Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh 120.

These difficulties being overcome, we are brought to the merits in the front rank of which stands the question raised as to the validity and legal operation of the act of assembly in question. This has been denied upon two grounds: First: because the legislature has no power under the constitution to make the operation of a law depend upon the result of a vote of the people 88 *or a portion of them. Second: because it cannot delegate the power of taxation to a board such as that created by the act for the purpose specified.

There is certainly no express inhibition in the constitution upon the provisional mode of legislation adopted in this case. The fourth article contains various restrictions and qualifications of the legislative power, and prescribes certain rules which the general assembly is required to observe in the exercise of its appropriate functions and the enactment of laws, but there is nothing which directly forbids the legislature to make the operation of an act dependent upon a vote of the people thereafter to be taken or other future contingency. The objection however is that it is inconsistent with the representative principle and the theory of our government, in transferring the power and duty of making the law directly to the people or a portion of them, and thus relieving the representative body of their proper duty and just responsibility.

It will not be questioned that it is entirely competent for the legislature to provide for taking a vote of the people or of any portion of them upon a measure directly affecting them, and if a given number be found in favor of its adoption to enact a law thereupon carrying it into effect. And there would seem to be but little difference in substance in a reversal of the process by first enacting the law in all its parts but providing that its operation is to be suspended until it be ascertained that the requisite number of the people to be affected by it were in favor of its adoption. In regard to many measures especially those of a local character, it might be eminently just and proper that before they should be actually enforced the wishes of a majority or some other proportion of those who are to bear the burdens and reap the benefits, if any, should be ascertained in some some occasions a great saving of valuable time especially under a system of biennial sessions of the legislature, if the order may be inverted and the act be first framed and submitted to the forms of enactment and the question as to its acceptance be subsequently determined upon by those interested.

It will be conceded that the legislature may provide that an act shall not take effect until some future day named or until the happening of some particular event or in some contingency thereafter to arise or upon the performance of some specified condition. The exigencies of the government may frequently require laws of this character and to deny to the legislature the right so to fame them would be unduly to qualify and impair the powers plainly and necessarily conferred. Accordingly we find this a familiar feature in the legislation both of the national and state governments. The constitution of the United States was submitted by resolution of the convention, to congress and to the delegates of the different states in convention assembled, for their assent and ratification, with a further resolution declaring it to be the opinion of the convention that the proper steps should be taken to execute the constitution as soon as it should be ratified by nine of the states. By the ordinance of the 13th of July 1787 erecting the territory northwest of the Ohio the governor and judges were to adopt and publish such laws of the original states as were necessary and best suited to the circumstances of the district which were to be in force until the organization of the general assembly therein unless disapproved by congress. The validity and effect of this provision was affirmed both in the Supreme court and in the Court of errors of New York in a case involving the right of the government of 90 the territory of Michigan, which was erected in 1805 out of part of *the northwest territory with a government similar in all respects to that established by the ordinance of 1787, to incorporate a banking company. Bank of Michigan v. Williams, 5 Wend. R. 478; S. C. in error, 7 Wend. R. 539. The noninter course acts of March 1, 1809, May 1, 1810, and May 2, 1811, were expressly made to depend upon the course that might be adopted by England and France with regard to the edicts promulged by them, to be made known by proclamation of the president. And the principle of this mode of legislation was sustained by the Supreme court. Brig Aurora v. United States, 7 Cranch's R. 382. See another illustration, Gray v. State of Delaware, 2 Harring. R. 76. Nothing is more common than for an act of assembly to be made to commence upon a future day. The Code of 1849 is an instance of the kind. All acts of incorporation are in effect acts to take effect upon a future event, the acceptance of the corporators; for without their consent the corporate body cannot be created. 3 Kent's Com. 277. The various acts making subscriptions on the part of the state to works of internal improvement when a certain amount shall be raised by private subscriptions, are of this character. The several acts authorizing the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company to construct their road through the territory of Virginia contain the same feature. Such was the character of the act of March 3, 1835, which authorized the County courts to dispense with the first and second sections of the act in their respective counties and reinstate the road law of 1819. Such also was the act of February 3, 1846, accepting the county of Alexandria upon its retrocession. Instances of the same kind might be multiplied indefinitely.

Now if the legislature may make the operation of its act depend on some contingency thereafter to happen, or may prescribe conditions, it must be for them

91 *to judge in what contingency or upon what condition the act shall take effect. They must have the power to prescribe any they may think proper; and if the condition be that a vote of approval shall first be given by the people affected by the proposed measure, it is difficult to see why it may not be as good and valid as any other condition whatever. There can be no inherent vice in the nature of such a condition which shall serve to defeat the act when it would be legal and effectual if made to depend upon some other event. To say in such a case that the act is made by the voters and not by the legislature is to disregard all proper distinctions and involves an utter confusion of ideas upon this subject. Wherever the contingency upon which a law is to take effect depends upon the action of third persons, it might be said with equal truth that the law was enacted by those persons instead of the legislature. But there is a plain distinction between the act to be done by the voters and the legislative function. They have no power to alter or amend the act or substitute something else in its place. When it passed the assembly with the forms and in the mode prescribed by the constitution, the legislative function was exhausted although by its terms it required a vote of approval by the people interested before it went into operation. But when that vote was given and the result ascertained in the mode prescribed, the act became as operative and effectual as if it had simply fixed upon that day for its commencement. That its operation should depend upon the result of the vote is as much a part of the legislative will as any other of its provisions, and there can be no difference in principle depending on the nature of the event or contingency upon which the act is to take effect though the differences in kind and degree may be without end.

That there can be nothing in the 92 contingency of a *vote of approval of an act by the people which shall serve of itself to nullify and defeat it is well attested by the numerous instances to be found in the legislation both of the general and state governments in which that feature is presented. By the act of assembly of the 3d of February 1846 before referred to, provision was made for the reannexation of the county of Alexandria to this state "so soon as congress should by law recede to the commonwealth of Virginia the said county of Alexandria." By the act of congress of the 9th of July 1840 provision is made for submitting the question of retrocession to a vote of the qualified electors of the county: and it was enacted that if a majority should be against accepting the provisions of the act, it should be void and of no effect; but if a majority should be in favor of accepting, it was to be in full force. And in that event it was made the duty of the president to inform the governor of Virginia of the result of the election and that the act was consequently in force. The constitutionality of neither of these laws has so far as I am informed ever been questioned; and indeed the case of McLaughlin v. The Bank of Potomac, 7 Gratt. 68, must have proceeded upon the concessum, that both were constitutional. By the schedule attached to the constitution of 1830, the general assembly was to provide by law for submitting the same to the voters thereby qualified for their ratification or rejection and for organizing the government under it in case it should be ratified. And by the act of February 12, 1830, provision is made both for a vote of the people and for the organization of the government and the election of senators and delegates under the amended constitution in case the same should be so ratified. By the constitution of 1851 a similar provision is made for submitting the same to the people for their ratification or rejection, 93 and in the event of ratification, *for the election of officers under the new constitution and the organization of the government. The general provision in the Code of 1849 (ch. 82) for free schools is upon the principle complained of here. It authorizes a vote to be taken in any county upon the petition of one-fourth of those entitled to vote in the election of delegates, by order of the County court, and if two-thirds of the votes be in favor of adopting a free school system, it prescribes the measures to be taken for carrying the same into effect. Code of Virginia, ch. 82, § 2, et seq. p. 376, 377. The provision for subscriptions on behalf of a county to a work of internal improvement, is upon a similar principle. It authorizes a vote of the freeholders of the county to be taken by order of the County court, and if three-fourths are found in favor of the subscription, provides for making the same and the means of paying the quotas. Code, ch. 62, § 38, 40, 42, p. 324, 325. These general provisions but adopted the principle of submitting the subject to a vote of the people from numerous special acts which had passed from time to time for particular counties and districts and particular works of improvement. And this principle has been adopted and sustained in other states. Thus by an act of the legislature of Pennsylvania, an election by qualified voters of two certain townships was directed to be held in order to determine whether one of the two which had been created out of part of the other should be continued or annulled, the question to be determined by a majority of the votes polled. An election was held and a majority of the votes was given against the continuance of the new township. This act was held to be constitutional. Commonwealth v. Judges of Quarter Sessions, 8 Barr Pa. R. 391. So a law establishing a new county which was to be submitted to the vote of those on whom the burdens were to fall was decided to be

94 not unconstitutional. State *of Missouri v. Scott, 17 Missouri R. (2 Bennett) 521. So an act concerning the removal of the seat of justice of Delaware county, which provided that the question of the removal should first be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors and if a majority should be found in its favor, the commissioners should designate the location for the new public buildings and proceed to erect them, was held to be valid and constitutional. Commonwealth ex rel., Lyons v. Painter, 10 Barr Pa. R. 214. So an act of the legislature of Kentucky which authorized the mayor and council of the city of Louisville with the consent and approbation of a majority of the qualified voters of the city expressed by a vote at a regular election of city officers and upon a regular submission of the question after due notice, to subscribe for stock in the Louisville and Frankfort rail road company, was sustained. Talbot v. Dent, 9 B. Mon. R. 526. In Steward v. Jefferson, 3 Harring. R. 335, a law authorizing taxation for the purposes of free schools by the determination and vote of a majority of the voters of a school district was decided to be constitutional. A similar law was sustained in Maryland. Burgess v. Pue, 2 Gill's R. 11. The case of Bridgport v. Housatonic Rail Road, 15 Conn. R. 475, was upon a similar principle and the act in question was maintained to be valid. In Slack v. Maysville and Lexington Rail Road Company, 13 B. Mon. R. 1, the power of the legislature of Kentucky to impose local taxation for local purposes and its right to employ the agency of County courts, trustees of towns, and other bodies created for the purpose, are fully maintained; and it was held to be no objection to the mode of exercising it that it was referred to the vote of a majority of those to be affected by it. Accordingly the provision of the act incorporating the company which made it the duty of the mayors and councils of the cities of Maysville 95 and Lexington and *of the County courts in certain counties to ascertain the sense of a majority of the qualified voters within their respective limits, and if a majority should be in favor of subscriptions to the stock, to make the same and to levy or borrow money to raise the necessary amounts was held to be within the legitimate powers of the legislature. And in a case which went before the Supreme court of New York, the very question was decided in the most imposing form. The act of that state of March 26, 1849, known as the "free school law" provided (§ 10) that the electors should determine by ballot at the annual election whether the act should or should not become a law. By section 14 it was provided that if a majority should be found against it, the act should be null and void; but if the majority should be for the law, the act should become a law and take effect on a day specified. It was objected that the effect of the act was to transfer the power of enacting laws from the legislature to the electors at the ballot box. The court however distinguished between the exercise of legislative power in framing and enacting a statute which is to become a law, and the exercise of another altogether different and foreign but subordinate power in producing the event or result upon which such enactment is to take effect; and held the act in question to be valid and constitutional. Johnson v. Rich, 9 Barb. R. 680. Other cases will be found to the same effect or asserting a similar principle in several of the states.

I am aware there are cases to be found in the reported decisions in some of the states in which the contrary doctrine has been maintained. Several have been cited by the counsel for the appellants. One of these is the case of Rice v. Foster, 4 Harring. R. 479. This appears to be a leading case as it is cited in all the other cases which I have seen in which the decisions have accorded with it, and the line of 96 argument *adopted in it seems to be very much the same as that which led to the conclusion in the subsequent cases. The act in question provided for taking a vote of the citizens of the several counties upon the question of licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors: and if there should be a majority of votes for "no license" it was declared to be unlawful for any person to retail intoxicating liquors within any county which had given such majority, and the retailing such liquors was declared to be a nuisance. The court held the act null and void because it was a delegation of legislative power to the people which it was said the legislature had no power to make. But it will be observed that the court carefully distinguish this case from Steward v. Jefferson (above cited) in which it was held that the legislature might properly leave it to a majority of the school voters to say whether a tax should be laid for the establishment of free schools. This case was approved, but the distinction in principle between it and Rice v. Foster, has eluded my perception, though the court in the latter case seem to think it very apparent. However this may be the utmost ingenuity will fail to distinguish it from the case in judgment and the authority of the decision in the one case and of the opinion of the court approving it in the other, may both be cited here in support of the argument.

The case of Parker v. Commonwealth, 6 Barr Pa. R. 507, was upon a similar law of the state of Pennsylvania, and the case was decided in the same way as in the Delaware case, and upon very similar reasoning. And yet it will be seen that Judge Bell who delivered the opinion of the majority of the court (two of the judges dissenting) fully sustains the constitutionality of the school law of 1836, one of the provisions of which was that elections should be held at stated periods within each district at which the question of establishing common schools should be decided by 97 the *qualified voters of the district. If a majority should be "for schools" the directors were to go on and establish them according to the provisions of the act: but if the majority should be "for no schools," the system was not to go into operation for a certain period. And if after a district had accepted the system a majority of the voters should be against its continuance (to determine which elections were to be held) it was to be suspended till a majority should otherwise decide. Like Chief Justice Booth in the Delaware case, he distinguishes between such a law and the excise law of which he was treating and which he regarded as but a transfer to the people at the polls of the power to enact a penal statute under which the citizen might be indicted and punished. The authority of this case even on the question which it decides, is however much shaken by the subsequent cases of the Commonwealth v. The Judges of Quarter Sessions and the Commonwealth v. Painter (above cited), although it may not have been directly and in terms overruled. In these cases the court has plainly receded from the ground attempted to be maintained in Parker v. Commonwealth, and both are strong authorities in support of the validity of the act in question here.

The doctrine of Rice v. Foster appears to have been applied to laws concerning free schools in two cases in New York. They are Thome v. Cramer, 15 Barb. R. 112, and Bradley v. Baxter, Ibid. 122. I will not stop to distinguish the law in question in those cases from our act, because whatever respect may be due them, I yet think in point of authority they are far outweighed by the cases establishing a different doctrine. The reasoning of the judges tends rather to demonstrate the inexpediency of this provisional legislation than its unconstitutionality, and to my mind it is far less cogent and convincing as to the latter 98 than that which prevailed *in Johnson v. Rich, in which the same law was sustained by the same court although with a different bench of judges.

As to the wisdom and expediency of this kind of legislation, this is not the place to express an opinion. To say that it is liable to be abused is but to affirm what is equally true of every mode of legislation. Whilst there may be occasions on which it may be adopted with advantage to the public interest, it may also be resorted to upon others to enable the representative to escape from his just responsibilities. Yet however profoundly impressed the judicial mind may be in any given instance with its impropriety and inexpediency, it will not do to say that for that cause the law may be set aside. This would but be for the judiciary to set itself up as a revisory body upon the acts of the general assembly and would be a plain usurpation upon the powers conferred upon that body. Unlike a question of constitutionality proper which must depend upon fixed principles, this would fluctuate with the varying views of different minds. What one judge might deem most unwise and dangerous another might think highly proper and beneficial. How great soever the evil may be the security against it must be sought in the wisdom and integrity of the legislative body or failing these, the corrective will be found in the virtue and intelligence of the people.

The second ground of objection to the act is equally unsustainable. The maxim potestas delegata non potest delegari however true in the abstract can have no application here. The authority of the legislature to delegate to other bodies the power of taxation for certain purposes can no longer be considered an open question. As early as in the time of Judge Pendleton this court decided that the power of laying levies for county purposes might well be conferred upon the county courts. Case of the Fairfax County Levy, 5 Call 139. So the constitutionality of the act of the 13th February 1833 authorizing the common council of the city of Richmond to subscribe to the stock of the James river and Kanawha company and to levy taxes to provide for the subscription was maintained. Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh 120. Judge Brooke who dissented from the opinion of the majority of the court in that case, agreed however that the legislature might delegate its power to local authorities for local purposes: and this doctrine was again affirmed in the case of the Harrison Justices v. Holland, 3 Gratt. 247, and receives support from decisions elsewhere. Burgess v. Pue, 2 Gill R. 11; Livingston v. Mayor of New York, 8 Wend. R. 85; Thomas v. Leland, 24 Wend. R. 65; Lockhart v. Harrington, 1 Hawks' R. 408; Cheaney v. Hooser, 9 B. Mon. R. 330; Nichol v. Mayor, &c., of Nashville, 9 Humph. R. 252; Slack v. Lexington and Maysville R. C. 13 B. Mon. R. 1. And it may now be regarded as definitively settled. Nor can any distinction be successfully maintained between the local municipal purposes for which the power of taxation has thus been held to be duly delegated and the support of a district or county free school system. The board of commissioners is a purely local authority and the education of those entitled to admission may also be regarded as sufficiently local in it character to come within the strictest interpretation of the rule, and surely no purpose for which the power may be exercised can be more laudable or more conducive to the public weal.

99 *county courts.

100 *I feel therefore no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the act in question was perfectly within the constitutional competency of the legislature, and as it has been ascertained in the mode prescribed that the requisite number of votes was given for its acceptance, it is to be respected and enforced as any other act of the general assembly passed in conformity to the constitution.

Upon the construction of the act several questions have been made which I will now briefly consider.

It is insisted that no power is given to the commissioners to levy taxes for school-houses and that they have transcended their authority in so doing. It is true the act does not say in terms that the commissioners may levy a tax to pay for school-houses, but it authorizes them to establish schools and after ascertaining the amount necessary to defray the expense to levy taxes for the same. To establish schools, the first step must be to provide school-houses; and it cannot be supposed that the act contemplated these would be furnished by private contributions. Nor could it have been the intention of the act that the system should not take effect unless school-houses should be so furnished. Had such been the intention it would doubtless have been plainly expressed. There is no reason for supposing that the omission to provide in express terms the power to build or purchase school-houses was intentional with the view of withholding that of levying taxes for that purpose. It was doubtless not expressly conferred because it was thought to be embraced sufficiently in the general powers given to the board. And if it be conceded that the act should receive a strict construction, still it must be such as to enable the board to carry the intention of the legislature into effect. This was to establish free schools and to do this the power to provide school-houses was indispensable. Upon the familiar principle 101 *therefore that a power expressly granted carries with it by necessary implication all such as are required for its due and proper exercise, the power to provide the necessary school-houses may well be maintained.

It is also objected that the commissioners have adopted a mode of taxation unauthorized by the act. The capitation tax levied by them was upon the white male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years only: and the property tax was an ad valorem tax upon all the property in the district excepting slaves, and upon these was laid a tax of fifty cents for every hundred dollars worth of those above the age of twelve years, every such slave to be valued at three hundred dollars no tax at all being imposed on slaves under that age. These discriminations it is insisted the board had no power to make.

It must be supposed that it was the intention of the legislature the act should be perfect and complete in all its parts and capable of being executed without further legislation. Now while the ninth section provides for a capitation tax, nothing is any where said of the means by which the number and names of those who would be subject to it are to be ascertained. No provision is made for obtaining a list and no one authorized to require parents or heads of families to give the numbers of those who would answer the description of "white male inhabitants." And it can scarcely be supposed that it was the intention of the legislature the capitation tax which the act authorized should be levied on infants of what age soever, as well as upon adults. Certainly a doubt may well arise upon the construction of the ninth section as to the precise class intended to be embraced by the terms "white male inhabitants" upon whom this capitation tax was to be laid, and reference may properly be had to the constitution under which the law was enacted in aid of its interpretation.

By the twenty-fourth section of the 102 *fourth article of the constitution, a capitation tax, eo nomine, is required to be levied on every white male inhabitant who has attained the age of twenty-one years, one moiety of which is to be applied to education in primary and free schools. It may therefore reasonably be inferred that it was the intention of the legislature the capitation tax authorized by this act should conform to that required to be levied by the constitution and should be laid upon the same class of white male inhabitants, to wit, those of the age of twenty-one years and upwards. Thus the number and names of those who were subject to the capitation tax authorized by this act would be found upon the books of the commissioners of the revenue of the county as listed for the purpose of the capitation tax required to be imposed by the constitution: and to those books in the absence of any provision for making a list, reference may and must be had to enable the commissioners to ascertain the amount of liabilities incurred and fix the rate of the tax to be imposed. The names and number of the white male inhabitants resident within the district would perhaps be found in common with those resident throughout the whole commissioner's district; but it would be the duty of the commissioners to discriminate those resident within the limits of the district from those without.

So with regard to the tax to be laid on property. No provision is made for any assessment of property within the district nor any mode or means prescribed for ascertaining the amount and kinds liable to taxation. Resort therefore must be again had to the books of the commissioners of the revenue. But the constitution declares a particular class of slaves only to be subject to taxation, to wit, those of the age of twelve years and upwards and it also prescribes the ratio in respect to land in which they shall be assessed. So that the commissioner's books made out for state 103 purposes *would only exhibit the number of slaves to be assessed with taxes under the constitution: and it is therefore reasonably to be intended that the term "property" where it occurs in the ninth section is used as it respects slaves, in the sense affixed by the constitution and that the slaves embraced by it are those only who have attained the age of twelve years, each to be assessed with a tax equal to and not exceeding that imposed on land of the value of three hundred dollars. It has been made by the constitution a feature of state policy that the ad valorem property tax when applied to slaves should be in a fixed ratio and according to an assumed standard of value, and any act of assembly providing for levying taxes ought to be regarded as intending to respect this policy and not to enlarge the area of taxation unless the contrary be plainly and expressly declared.

The capitation tax provided for in the twenty-fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution is to be equal to the tax assessed on land of the value of two hundred dollars. But this is a tax which the legislature is required to levy. It may not be less than according to the ratio prescribed, but there is nothing to prevent the legislature from making it greater; and it can scarcely be doubted that it is strictly within the power of the legislature to increase this tax according to its discretion for the promotion of education and any other legitimate purpose: and this power it may delegate to the County courts or to a corporation such as that created by this act for the purposes of education to be by them exercised as it might be by the legislature, with such additional guards and restrictions as that body shall see proper to impose. Hence it was competent to the board to fix the capitation tax at a higher rate than that provided in the constitution, and as education is perhaps more fitly and appropriately the subject of a capitation tax than 104 of a tax on *property (although property also is undoubtedly interested and should contribute its just proportion) there may be good reason why the board in the exercise of its discretion advanced the capitation tax beyond the general ratio and made it relatively larger than the state tax prescribed by the constitution. And I do not feel prepared to say that in fixing its amount the board have abused their power or unduly exercised their discretion.

None of the objections which have been made should as it seems to me be sustained: and I am of opinion to affirm the order dissolving the injunction.

105 Chapman v. Campbell.

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.*)

1. Sale of Chattels—17 Sec. Statute of Frauds—Not in Force in Va.—The 17th section of 29 Charles 2, ch. 3, requiring that to make good a contract for the sale of goods, wares and merchandise, (for the price of £10 or upwards,) the buyer shall accept and actually receive in whole or in part the thing sold, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain or in part payment; or that some note or memorandum of the bargain be made and signed by the parties or their agents, has not been adopted in this state.
2. Same—When Complete.†—When there is a contract for an immediate sale, and nothing remains to be done by the vendor as between him and the vendee, the vendor immediately acquired a property in the price, and the vendee a property in the goods; and then all the consequences resulting from the vesting of the property follow, one of which is that if it be destroyed the loss falls upon the vendee.
3. Same—Same—Delivery Not Necessary.—Any words importing a bargain whereby the owner of a chattel signifies his willingness and consent to sell, and whereby another person shall signify his willingness and consent to buy it, in presenti, for a specified price, would be a sale and transfer of the right to the chattel: and neither the delivery or tender of the property, nor the payment or tender of the purchase money, is necessary to constitute the contract.
4. Same—Same—Loss of Property—Buyer's Loss.—A slave on trial for larceny before a County court, is sold; and before he is discharged he makes his escape and is not heard of again. The contract of sale being complete, the purchaser is bound for the price, though the slave was not and could not be delivered.

This was an action of assumpsit instituted in the Circuit court of Page county by Nancy Campbell against William A. Chapman, to recover the price of a slave alleged to have been sold by the former to the 106 *latter. The cause was removed to the Circuit court of Rappahannock county; and when it came on there to be tried the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for eight hundred dollars, with interest from the date of the contract; and the court rendered a judgment accordingly.

When the verdict was rendered the defendant Chapman applied to the court for a new trial, which was refused; and upon an exception being taken, the facts were certified as follows:

That at a County court held for the county of Page on the 25th of August 1851, a slave, owned by a Mr. Barbee, was tried for larceny, and found guilty, and the judgment of the court was that he should have ten stripes, lightly laid on. That thereafter, a slave named Gilbert, the property of the plaintiff, was tried as accessory, and found guilty; and before the court pronounced any judgment, the counsel for the slave applied to the court not to inflict a heavier punishment on the accessory than had been inflicted on the principal. To which the court replied, that the slave (the principal) had been sold and was to be taken from the commonwealth, and that fact was the inducement to the infliction of so light a punishment. The plaintiff, an old lady, the owner of the slave Gilbert, who was in court, was then applied to, to know if she would sell her slave, to which she assented, and authorized J. Y. Menefee to sell him. The defendant, who was in court, and who it was proved was a justice of the peace of the county of Page, though not a member of the court, and was cognizant of all that was passing, enquired what price she would take for the slave. To which her agent replied, that she would take eight hundred dollars. The defendant then replied, I will give it. The agent replied, the negro then is yours. To which the defendant replied, well I will take him.

107 *The court then remanded the slave to jail, without passing sentence on him; the plaintiff, by her agent and counsel, saying the negro was not to be remanded at the plaintiff's expense, and the defendant saying, the negro was not to be remanded at his expense. A bill of sale was thereafter prepared, and executed by the plaintiff, with an order to pay the money, the price of the slave, to the said agent, J. Y. Menefee, and delivered to Mr. Menefee, who applied to the defendant for payment. The defendant replied, that he had not the money in his pocket, and would like to have some two weeks to pay it in. The agent replied, that he could not give that time; that he should leave court for the county of Rappahannock (where he lived) in a day or two, and if he would pay the money before he left, it would answer his purposes. To which the defendant replied, that he would borrow the money, and would pay it to him before he left. With this understanding the parties separated.

It was further proved, that the defendant applied to the court to have the slave Gilbert confined in an apartment separate †Sale of Chattels—When Complete.—In Hobbs v. Interchange, 1 W. Va. 66, the court said: "The most satisfactory definition of a consummated contract for the sale of a personal chattel will be seen in 13 Grattan, page 109, Chapman v. Campbell; it is 'where there is a contract for an immediate sale of a chattel, and nothing remains to be done by the vendor, as between him and the vendee, the vendor immediately acquires a property in the price, and the vendee a property in the goods, and then all the consequences resulting from the vesting of the property follows, one of which is, if it be destroyed, the loss falls on the vendee.'" The principal case is also cited in Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 193, 23 S. E. Rep. 686, where it is held in accordance with the principal case that in such a case delivery is not necessary. The principal case is also cited in Haxall v. Willis, 15 Gratt. 448.

In addition to the above, see Morgan v. King, 28 W. Va. 1; Dixon v. Myers, 7 Gratt. 240; Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473.

from the slave who was the principal in the larceny, and who was still confined in jail for safe keeping by his purchaser. And it was also proved that Barbee, the former owner of the slave, who was the principal, made a similar request, for the reason that the slaves were hostile, and might injure each other. Which order was given by the court to the jailor, and the slaves were accordingly confined in separate apartments.

It was also proved that the defendant applied to the jailor, after the negro Gilbert was remanded to jail, to know whether there was any thing in the jail with which the negro could inflict an injury on himself; the witness proving that the defendant seemed to be apprehensive that the man might do some violence to himself.

108 *It was further proved, that the slave broke jail that night, and made his escape, and the next day, when the agent of the plaintiff was about to leave for Rappahannock, he applied to the defendant for payment of the purchase money, which he refused, and this action was thereupon instituted.

Chapman thereupon applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

Patton, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That the facts did not make out a contract of sale and purchase, and that Chapman did not consider himself the purchaser. And if there was a misunderstanding between the parties at the time on this point, that was good ground for refusing to hold either party liable. Story on Sales, § 150.

2d. That there was no delivery of the slave or offer to deliver on payment of the purchase money, which was necessary before the purchase money could be recovered. And moreover that the slave being in the custody of the court, was not in a condition to be delivered; and therefore the vendor could not recover. He referred to the opinions of Carr and Cabell, Js., in the case of Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, 495, 496, 503.

Morson, for the appellee, insisted:

1st. That the proof of the contract was sufficient. He said that the law of Virginia was unlike that of England in this question; that here where there is a contract of sale and nothing remains to be done, the contract is complete, and the title passes. Bell on Contracts of Sales, p. 82, 51 Law Libr.; Brown on Actions at Law 493, 45 Law Libr. And where the property is appropriated by the vendor to the vendee, the property passes although he may retain the possession until he is paid for it.

109 *2d. That if it was necessary to prove a delivery, a legal delivery was proved; and it was not a case, as was known to both parties, in which there could be an actual delivery. The legal delivery was the same in its effects as an actual delivery. Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, Carr, J.'s opinion. As to what was constructive delivery, he referred to Bell on Sales 61, 62; Story on Contracts, § 513; Jewett v. Warren, 12 Mass. R. 300.

DANIEL, J. The 17th section of 29 Charles 2, ch. 3, requiring that to make good a contract for the sale of goods, wares and merchandise, (for the price of ten pounds and upwards,) the buyer shall accept and actually receive, in whole or in part, the things sold, or give something, in earnest, to bind the bargain, or in part of payment; or that some note or memorandum of the bargain be made and signed by the parties or their agents, has not been adopted in this state. And we have only to enquire whether the case stated in the certificate of facts satisfies the rules regulating like contracts of bargain and sale at the common law. In the case of Tarling v. Baxter, 13 Eng. C. L. R. 199, we are told that where there is a contract for an immediate sale, and nothing remains to be done by the vendor as between him and the vendee, the vendor immediately acquires a property in the price, and the vendee a property in the goods, and then all the consequences resulting from the vesting of the property follow; one of which is, that if it be destroyed, the loss falls upon the vendee. For the same principle, see also 2 Kent Comm. 491; Willis v. Willis, 6 Dana's R. 47; Potter v. Coward, Meigs' R. 22; Ingersoll v. Kendall, 13 Smeads & Marsh. 615; Goodrum v. Smith, 3 Humph. R. 542; Miller v. Koger, 9 Humph. R. 231; Magee v. Billingsley, 3 Alab. R. 680; 2 Rob. Pr.

110 414, *415, 495, 497, 498, and cases there cited; and also DcFonclear v. Shottenkirk, 3 Johns. R. 170.

In the case last cited, decided by the Supreme court of New York, (where they have a statute with provisions like those of the 17th section of the English statute,) the court said, that independently of the statute, any words importing a bargain, whereby the owner of a chattel signifies his willingness and consent to sell, and whereby another person shall signify his willingness and consent to buy it, in presenti, for a specified price, would be a sale and transfer of the right to the chattel. The same view of the nature of such a contract is strongly and concisely stated by the Supreme court of Tennessee in the case of Potter v. Coward, above cited. It is not (say the court) the delivery or tender of the property, nor the payment or tender of the purchase money, which constitutes a sale. The sale is good and complete as soon as both parties have agreed to the terms, that is, as soon as the vendee says, "I will pay the price demanded," and the vendor says, "I will receive it," the rights of both are instantly fixed.

As soon as such a contract is made in respect to a chattel in the possession of the vendor, and ready for delivery, in the absence of contrary indication or agreement, the vendee has a right to demand the thing sold immediately, but must pay the consideration; and the vendor has the right to demand the consideration money, but must deliver the property. If the vendee tender the purchase money and demand the property, he may maintain detinue or trover if the delivery be refused; and if the vendor tender the delivery of the property and demand his purchase money, he may have his action of debt or assumpsit, if it be refused. Potter v. Coward and 2 Kent, as above.

The payment of the price and the 111 delivery of the *property, however, may have to be simultaneous and concurrent acts, or they may be performable at different times, according to the express agreement of the parties, or the obvious nature and indication of the contract. Bell on Sales, 41.

A sale may be just as binding if made on credit as if made for ready money. And in such case the vendee may have a right to maintain his action at once against the vendor for refusing to deliver the property, without making any tender of the price.

And on the other hand, the completeness and efficacy of a sale are not necessarily affected by the consideration that the property is not in the actual possession of the vendor, or if in his possession, is not to be immediately delivered. There is no principle of law which establishes that a sale of personal goods is invalid because they are not in the possession of the owner. The sale of a chattel in the possession of a third person (claiming no adverse title) is not the transfer of a right of action, but is the sale of the thing itself. The Brig Sarah Ann, 2 Sumner's R. 211.

Hence the vendee may be bound to pay presently, though there be no obligation on the vendor to deliver presently, or indeed at any time: For it may be obvious, from the nature of the contract, that the vendee is to look for the delivery to some third person, in whose custody the property may be at the time of the sale; or that he is himself to take possession of the property wherever it may be found; as in the case of the sale of a horse which is an estray, or of a slave who is a runaway.

And as where the sale is on credit, the vendee may bring his action for the property before he has paid or tendered the price, so where the sale is of property to be delivered at a future day, or not in the possession of the vendor, the latter may 112 have a right to his suit *for the price before he has made any tender of the property. The application of these principles to the facts stated in the certificate of the judge, will, I think, result in vindicating the propriety of the verdict and judgment rendered on them.

It appears that the slave, for the recovery of whose price the action was brought, was at the time of the contract in custody, and on trial, in the County court of Page, on a charge of larceny. The court had found him guilty, but had not pronounced its sentence; and to an appeal, made by the counsel of the slave, to the court to inflict but a light punishment upon him, urged on the ground that he was but an accessory, and that the principal, another slave, who had just before been found guilty, had been subjected only to a few stripes, the court replied, that the infliction of so light a punishment on the principal had been induced by the fact that he had been sold, and was to be taken from the commonwealth. The defendant in error, an old lady, the owner of Gilbert, (the slave for whose price the suit is brought,) who was in court, was then applied to, to know if she would sell her slave; to which she assented, and authorized J. Y. Menefee to sell him. The plaintiff in error, who was in court, and who, it was proved, was a justice of the peace of the county of Page, though not a member of the court, and was cognizant of all that was passing, enquired what price she would take for the slave. To which her agent replied that she would take eight hundred dollars. The defendant then said, I will give it. The agent replied, the negro, then, is yours. To which the plaintiff in error replied, well, I will take him.

Had this been all that passed between the parties, it is difficult to conceive how, by acts or words, they could have given a better definition or more appropriate illustration of a contract of an immediate 113 sale. *And there is nothing in the subsequent history of the transaction which can, in my opinion, create any serious doubt as to the true intent and effect of the understanding of the parties.

The certificate proceeds to state that the court then remanded the slave to jail, without passing sentence on him; the defendant in error, by her agent and counsel, saying the negro was not to be remanded at her expense, and the plaintiff in error saying the negro was not to be remanded at his expense. A bill of sale was thereafter (evidently on the same day, as appears from facts subsequently stated), prepared and executed by the defendant in error, with an order to pay the money, the price of the slave, to her said agent Menefee, and delivered to Menefee, who applied to the plaintiff in error for payment, who replied, that he had not the money in his pocket, and would like to have some two weeks to pay it in. The agent replied, that he could not give that time; that he should leave court for the county of Rappahannock (where he lived) in a day or two, and if he would pay the money before he left, it would answer his purposes. To which the plaintiff in error replied, that he would borrow the money, and would pay it to him before he left: And with this understanding the parties separated.

Even if the remark by the plaintiff in error, that the slave was not to be remanded at his expense, imported, by necessary implication, an understanding on his part that the sale was not complete, and that the slave was not yet at his risk, it could not detract from the legal force of the plain and unambiguous contract already made. It was not competent for either of the parties, after having fully assented to the terms of the bargain, to construe away its obligations or escape its consequences by acts done or declarations 114 *made without the concurrence or assent of the other. And as has been seen, the defendant in error, so far from making any concession in respect to the expenses of the future keeping of the slave, was first to protest against his being remanded at her expense. And that the plaintiff in error did not mean to insist on the payment by the defendant of the expenses of the further custody of the slave, as a condition precedent to the vesting of the property and the payment of the price, is fairly to be inferred from his subsequent conduct. When applied to, to pay the price, he did not intimate any incompleteness in the bargain, or insist or suggest that any thing was yet to be done by the vendor to entitle him to demand the price, but asked and obtained a temporary postponement of payment, on the exclusive score of his own ease and accommodation. The control, too, exercised by the plaintiff in error over the slave, in obtaining, on his own motion, an order of the court to the jailor to have the slave confined in an apartment separate from that in which the other slave, the principal in the larceny, was still confined, and the further concern about his safe keeping, manifested in afterwards applying to the jailor to know whether there was any thing in the jail with which the slave could do violence to himself, though susceptible of the explanation that the plaintiff regarded himself as having merely entered on a profitable treaty, which he hoped and expected to conclude, yet tend more strongly to the conviction that he regarded himself as having already acquired a title to the slave.

It is conceded in the argument of the plaintiff's counsel, that if the defendant had delivered to the plaintiff an order on the jailor for the slave, then the title would have passed; but he contends that some such act, a delivery or tender of some 115 symbol or evidence *of ownership, was essential to the passing of the title; and he relies on certain passages from Bell and Story on Sales, to sustain the position.

These citations do not, I think, furnish authority applicable here. They show not what is the common law rule, but what is now the English rule, as modified by the 17th section of the 29 Charles 2, before mentioned. And as, in the absence of such statutory provision, an actual delivery of property in the possession of the vendor, and which can be presently delivered by him, is not essential, so neither is a constructive or symbolical delivery of property out of his immediate possession, in the keeping of a third person, essential, as between vendor and vendee, to the vesting of the property. The virtual or symbolical delivery is the substitute for the actual delivery, and is necessary to be resorted to only where a change of possession (if practicable) would be essential to the validity of the transfer; as in cases of gifts inter vivos or causa mortis, or in cases of sales, to render them valid against the creditors of, or subsequent purchasers from, the vendor.

Whether ordinarily, in the case of a sale of property in the hands of a third person, holding it under an agreement to restore the possession to the vendor at the termination of the bailment, it is necessary for the vendor, in order to maintain his action for the price, to prove that he had delivered or tendered to the vendee an order on the bailee for the delivery of the property, or some other evidence of ownership, is a question which I do not deem it necessary to decide. For when the first application was made to the plaintiff to pay the price, he did not question the readiness of the defendant to perform any thing that by the terms of the contract she was to perform, but as we have seen, requested and obtained a postponement of the payment: And before the time for the payment arrived, the slave escaped. Thus, by his own act, as 116 he could *not have expected to receive an order before he was ready to pay the price, the delivery of the order (if necessary) was postponed to a period which had not arrived before the happening of the event (the escape) which rendered an order in the jailor for the delivery of the slave wholly nugatory. Besides, the slave was not in the possession of the jailor, under any agreement with or authority from the vendor, but was in his custody under the order and warrant of the court. As soon as the purposes of the prosecution were satisfied, the slave would have been discharged from the custody of the jailor by the order of the court, and it would have been for the party entitled to the possession to attend and take the possession of the slave. The payment or tender of the purchase money was all that was needed, under the circumstances, to enable the vendee rightfully to obtain possession of the slave when the order for his discharge should be made. It is, however, to be observed further, that the contract was made publicly in open court, and it is fairly to be inferred, from the evidence, was within the knowledge of the jailor. And were it conceded that there was a duty resting on the jailor not merely to discharge the slave on the termination of the confinement under the prosecution, but to deliver him over to the rightful owner, I should still hold that nothing was wanting in the proof to enable the vendor to maintain his action. A receipt for the price of the slave would, under the circumstances of the case, have been fully equivalent to the most formal order from the vendor to the jailor to deliver the slave to the vendee. Menefee's authority as agent was known to and recognized by Chapman, and his readiness to give a receipt for the price was obviously inferrible from the nature of the transaction and the demand of payment.

To the argument of an incompleteness of the sale which the counsel for the 117 plaintiff in error founds on *the improbability that the vendor contemplated parting with his control over the possession of the slave before the price should be paid, it is only necessary to refer to the authorities already cited to see that though the buyer has a right to retain and control the possession until the price is paid or tendered, the contract of sale casts the right of property on the vendee, and subjects him to all risk of accident.

And as to the further argument derived from the absence of a tender by the vendor, of some written evidence of warranty of the soundness of the slave, it is sufficient to observe that the parties did not, in the contract, stipulate for any such warranty.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

Judgment affirmed.

118 Davis' Adm'rs v. Mead.

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

Memorandum of Agent—Case at Bar.—A paper contains a statement of account of rents collected through a number of years by an agent for his principal. And at the foot of the account there is a written statement setting out the gross amount of the rents received, certain deductions for commissions and expenses, leaving the net sum of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents: and it concludes, "In the foregoing statement all errors to be corrected. As witness my hand and seal." And it is signed and sealed by the agent.

1. Same—Action of Debt on—Quære.—Quære: If this paper will sustain an action of debt.
2. Same—Same—Averments.—If the paper will sustain an action of debt, in declaring upon it if the plaintiff claims the sum stated in it as the net rents, it must be averred that there is no error in the bond. And if the plaintiff seeks to recover more or less than the sum stated, she should aver such error in the bond as will sustain her demand.

In February 1851, Hannah Mead instituted an action of debt in the Circuit court of Bedford county against the administrators of Thomas Davis deceased, for the sum of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents. The declaration contains four counts, but they are, as to the questions to be reported, substantially the same. The second count set out the cause of action as follows: For that whereas heretofore, to wit, on the 5th of March 1831, at the county aforesaid, the said Thomas Davis in his lifetime accounted with the plaintiff of and concerning divers sums of money received and collected by the said Thomas Davis in his lifetime, before that time to and for the use of the said plaintiff, and then in arrear and unpaid; and upon such a counting the 119 said *Thomas Davis in his lifetime was then and there found to be in arrear and indebted to the plaintiff in the said sum of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents; and being so indebted, the said Thomas Davis in his lifetime afterwards, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, by his certain writing obligatory sealed with his seal, the date whereof is the day and year aforesaid, acknowledged the receipt of the said sum of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents to and for the use of the plaintiff, whereby the said Thomas Davis in his lifetime became bound to pay to the plaintiff the said sum of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents then he should be thereunto afterwards requested.

The defendants craved oyer of the paper declared on, and demurred generally to the declaration, and each count thereof; and the plaintiff joined in the demurrer.

The paper set out on oyer, was headed as follows: "A list of rents for Hannah Mead from 1815 to end of 1830, made 27th of May 1829, and again on the 8th of March 1831." Then followed an account, in which there was a column for the years, another for the tenants' names, another for the rent per annum, another for money received, and another for balance of rents not collected. And at the foot of this account was the following writing:

In the foregoing list of rents for Hannah Mead, arising on the several tracts of land willed to Hannah Mead as noted in the foregoing lists, in the county of Bedford, the annual amount of rents from 1815 to the end of 1830, amount to the sum of one thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine dollars and ninety-eight cents, of which sum three hundred and ninety-nine dollars and ninety-two cents has not been collected, 120 *and the sum of one thousand four hundred and ninety dollars and six cents have been collected on account of said rents, from which sum of collections is taken seventy-four dollars and fifty cents for commissions, and two hundred and seventy-eight dollars and twenty-one cents for land taxes up to the end of the year 1830, lawyers' and clerks' fees, &c., as per account rendered, leaving the net sum of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents. In the foregoing statement all errors to be corrected. As witness my hand and seal.

Thomas Davis. (Seal.)

March 5, 1831.

Issues were also made up on a special plea of non est factum, and of payment by Davis in his lifetime.

The demurrer to the declaration and to each count thereof was overruled; and upon the trial of the cause there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, with interest from the 5th of March 1831 until paid. On the trial the defendant took several exceptions to opinions of the court, but it is unnecessary to state them, as they were not noticed by this court. On the application of the defendants, a supersedeas was awarded.

SAMUELS, J. The action of debt will lie only for a sum certain, or which may be rendered certain. Upon the argument of this case it seemed to me that the paper writing upon which the suit is brought cannot be construed into an admission of indebtedness in the sum of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, nor into an acknowledgment of being bound to the supposed 121 obligee in that *amount; nor into a promise or obligation to pay that amount. That all that is written therein is perfectly consistent with the fact that Davis was not indebted to Mead in any amount whatever. Subsequent reflection and investigation have confirmed my first impressions, and I am of opinion to reverse the judgment, and enter judgment for the plaintiff in error upon the demurrer, for that the writing set out upon oyer imposed no obligation upon Thomas Davis, the plaintiffs' intestate. The court here, of four members, being equally divided in opinion on this question, the judgment of the Circuit court thereon cannot be reversed for the supposed error in the decision thereof.

Holding, then, for the purposes of this case, that the action of debt is well brought on this paper, it remains to consider whether it is counted upon in the declaration according to its legal effect. In order to decide this, we must look to the whole paper, commencing with the words "A list of rents," &c., and ending with the word "Seal," and the scroll annexed to the name of Thomas Davis. The legal effect of all this, as the declaration alleges, is to bind Thomas Davis in his lifetime, and his administrators after his death, to pay Hannah Mead one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, as and for a debt of that amount; and to estop the obligor and his representatives from alleging that the debt was more or less; yet the paper on its face contains the reservation for the benefit of either party, that "in the foregoing statement all errors to be corrected." This seems to be an affirmation that errors did exist in the process by which the balance of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents was arrived at; or, at least, that errors might exist therein. If error did exist, by the terms of the obligation it was to be corrected; and this reservation applies to every entry upon the statement by 122 which the amount of one *thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents might be affected; for instance, to the first entry: "1816—Jeremiah Adams—Rent per annum, $80; money received, $80." If, in fact, the rent had been one hundred dollars, and had been received, the sum of twenty dollars should be added to the one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents; so, if money entered upon the statement had been paid over to the obligee, it is error to retain it in the statement so as to require it to be paid a second time. Thus the reservation may be made to enure to the benefit of the plaintiff, by averring in the declaration errors in the statement to her prejudice, and proving them at the trial; so the defendants, by pleas averring specific errors in the entries, or any of them, or any omissions to the prejudice of the obligor, and proving them on the trial, will secure the benefit of the reservation. A bond which contains a substantial provision for the relief of parties thereto, as above stated, is not identical in legal effect with a simple bond for payment of money absolutely, and by estoppel preventing any allegation from either party to vary the amount. There is such a variance between the bond declared on and that set out upon oyer, that the demurrer should, for that cause, have been sustained.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment, and remand the cause, with directions to the Circuit court to permit the plaintiff below, upon terms prescribed by law, to amend her declaration, by inserting averments either that no error requiring correction, or that error did exist to be specified in the averments; and giving the defendants below permission to plead specifically any errors to their prejudice, and any other proper pleas. And if the plaintiff shall not so amend her declaration, that the court give judgment for the defendants below upon the demurrer to the declaration.

123 *LEE, J. To constitute a good and valid obligation, the law does not require any particular set form of words to be employed. Any words which sufficiently declare the intention of the party and denote his being bound or which expressly or impliedly acknowledge a debt as due from him to another will constitute a good bond: because it is only in the nature of a contract or a security for the performance of a contract which should be construed according to the intention of the parties. 7 Bac. Ab. (Bouvier's ed.) 241; 1 Tuck. Comm. 275; 2 Thomas' Co., Litt. 566, n. S. And I think the paper writing set out in the declaration sufficiently complies with these requisites to constitute a valid obligation. It is headed "A list of rents for Hannah Mead from 1815 to 1830 made 27th of May 1829 and again on the 8th of March 1831." Then follow in parallel columns the different years, the names of the tenants, the rent per annum, the money received, the balance of rents not collected. These different sums are added up and the results stated in figures at the foot of each column. The paper then proceeds to state in words the amount of the whole rents thus ascertained, the amount not collected, and the amount that had been collected. From the amount of the collections, it states that the sum of seventy-four dollars and fifty cents is deducted for commissions and the sum of two hundred and seventy-eight dollars and twenty-one cents for land taxes, lawyers' and clerks' fees, &c., as per account rendered, leaving the net sum collected eleven hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents. A provision is then added that all errors in the foregoing statement were to be corrected, and the paper was signed and sealed by Davis and delivered to Hannah Mead. From the terms of the writing it seems to me that the necessary and unavoidable inference is that the money collected for Hannah Mead had been 124 collected by Davis, and *that the net balance stated remained in his hands unpaid. It was therefore an acknowledgment under his seal that so much was still due her and was therefore a subsisting debt to pay which a promise is raised by implication of law. I do not see how the terms of the paper can be reconciled with the hypothesis that Davis may have owed Hannah Mead nothing. That the moneys received were collected by some one as agent of Hannah Mead, is apparent, and if Davis were not the agent why would he make a statement of the business in such terms as would be appropriate only to the party who was the agent and give to it the solemnity not only of his signature but his seal also? And while a portion of the amount collected is accounted for as applied to commissions and clerks' and lawyers' fees, &c., no intimation is afforded that the net balance or any part of it had been paid over to Hannah Mead or any person for her. If it had been intended as a mere statement of his transactions as agent by Davis part of which consisted in the payment over by him of the large balance found in his hands, whilst he was accounting for the smaller sums applied to commissions and fees he would not have failed to state how that large balance was disposed of; nor if the paper was not intended as an acknowledgment of a subsisting debt could there have been any necessity or reason for the provision that errors were to be corrected.

I think therefore the paper set out in the declaration does constitute a good and valid obligation binding Davis to the payment of the balance stated and that it was properly so considered in the Circuit court.

Nor do I think the paper produced varies from the description given of the writing set out in the declaration. That it should be described according to its legal effect, is conceded, but I think it is so described so far as necessary on the part of the 125 plaintiff. It is *true in the paper produced there is a distinct provision with which it ends that all errors in the statement were to be corrected, and the declaration takes no notice of this provision. But it is plain that it is to be construed not as an affirmance that there were errors in the statement, but that if there were, they should be corrected; and in the absence of any allegation of the existence of errors to the prejudice of either party, the paper stands as a valid and binding obligation for the net sum collected of eleven hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, the same demanded in the declaration. To give it this effect it could not be necessary that the declaration should aver that there were no errors. If in fact there were errors to the prejudice of the defendant in the action, that would be matter of defense more proper to come from that side than to be the subject of negative averment on the part of the plaintiff; and what is matter more properly coming from the other side need not be stated by the pleader because it is not necessary he should anticipate the answer of his adversary which according to Hale, C. J., is "like leaping before one comes to the stile." See Sir Ralph Bovy's Case, Vent. 217; 2 Saund. 62, b; 1 Chit. Pl. (Phil. ed. 1828), p. 205; Steph. Pl. 354.

I do not perceive the force of the argument that as this paper contains upon its face a reservation for the benefit of both parties that all errors were to be corrected it varies materially from that described in the declaration because the latter imports a debt certain of eleven hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents and estops the obligor from alleging that it was more or less. But the party cannot be estopped when the right to show the debt to be less is expressly reserved by the paper itself, and to say there is a variance because this right is not referred to in the declaration and the existence of errors 126 negatived would *be to assail the well established mode of pleading on a bond with a condition where the declaration simply demands the penalty leaving the defendant to plead the condition and his performance of it.

I think therefore the declaration was good and that the demurrer was properly overruled.

Several other questions have been raised in this case but as the other judges are of opinion the declaration is defective in not negativing the existence of errors in the statement, it is unnecessary to express any opinion upon them.

MONCURE, J., concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

DANIEL, J., concurred in opinion with Lee, J., that the writing set out in the declaration was a valid and binding obligation, upon which debt would lie against Davis for the net balance therein stated: but he concurred with Samuels, J., in the opinion that the declaration was defective in not averring that there were no errors in the statement.

The following is the judgment of the court:

It seems to the court here, that the Circuit court erred in holding that the bond whereof the defendant in error made profert

in her declaration, and which is made part of the record by oyer, was a bond for the payment of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, neither more nor less. It further seems to the court here, that as the bond, in terms, reserved to the parties thereto the right to correct errors in the statement incorporated in the bond, the bond should be held to bind the obligor for so much money as might be found due after correcting all errors in the statement. That the defendant in error should have averred in her declaration that no error existed in the bond, if she 127 sought to *recover the sum above mentioned; or, if she sought to recover more or less, she should have averred such errors in the bond as would sustain her demand. Thus it seems to the court that the Circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer of the plaintiffs in error. Therefore it is considered that the said judgment be reversed and annulled, and that the plaintiffs in error recover of the defendant in error their costs in this court expended. And it is ordered that the jury's verdict be set aside and the cause remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer, unless the defendant in error shall amend her declaration by inserting an averment that no error existed in the bond, if she shall insist on recovering the principal sum of one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents; or, if she shall insist on recovering more or less than that sum by inserting averments to sustain her demand; and that the plaintiffs in error be permitted to file a plea or pleas alleging specific errors in the bond affecting the amount due thereon, and any other proper pleas to the action.

I. IN GENERAL.

The Action of Debt.—The action of debt is designed to recover a specific sum of money due by contract, sealed or unsealed, verbal or written, express or implied, where the amount is either ascertained, or from the nature of the demand is capable of being ascertained, whether due on legal liabilities (as penalties denounced by statute), on simple contracts, on specialties (or, obligations under seal), on records (as recognizances, judgments, etc.), or otherwise. [3 Bl. Com. 154, 155; 1 Chit. Pl. 123 et seq.; 3 Rob. Pr. (2d Ed.) 370 et seq.]; 4 Min. Inst. (3rd Ed.) 549. See also, Va. Code 1887 §§ 2852, 2853, and W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 99, §§ 10, 11.

The action has, as a natural consequence of the reforms in procedure, been more or less in disuse in modern practice, being entirely abolished in those states where code practice has been adopted.

The action of debt lies for the recovery of arrears of rent, but at common law no interest on rent was recoverable, unless expressly or by implication contracted for, or where justice required it. Cooke v. Wise, 3 H. & M. 463. But in Virginia and in West Virginia by statute interest is recovered "in any action for rent" as in other contracts. Va. Code 1187, §§ 2787, 3396; 4 Min. Inst. (3rd Ed.) 102; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 98, § 7.

For the general requisites and qualities of a declaration in debt, and the modes of stating the cause of action, reference is made to 4 Min. Inst. (3rd Ed.) 685 et seq., and 701 et seq., where these subjects are fully treated.

West Virginia Practice.—It is held in State, etc., v. Harmon, 15 W. Va. 115, in interpreting sec. 10 of ch. 99, of the Code of West Virginia of 1868, that so far as it applied to the action of assumpsit upon sealed instruments containing a promise, undertaking or obligation to pay money, the court did not feel at liberty to give a more enlarged or liberal interpretation to it, than bound to by the language or terms thereof applicable thereto, but that it regarded it to be the safer practice under the then state of legislation to declare in debt upon a sealed instrument for the payment of money rather than in assumpsit.

Necessity to Aver and Prove Consideration.—At common law, in an action to recover money due by promissory note, not negotiable (the action being founded not on the note, but on the contract of which the note is evidence), it is indispensable to aver and prove a valuable consideration, as it is in actions on all unsealed contracts. 4 Min. Inst. (3rd Ed.) 701.

In Va. by statute (Va. Code 1873, ch. 141, § 10; Va. Code 1887, § 2852) in case of notes for the payment of money, a valuable consideration is prima facie presumed, at least where an action of debt is brought on the writing (Peasley v. Boatwright, 2 Leigh 198), and by the Code of 1887, § 2853, the same doctrine is applicable to assumpsit. Crawford v. Daigh, 2 Va. Cas. 521; Jackson v. Jackson, 10 Leigh 453; 4 Min. Inst. (3rd Ed.) 31. But the defendant may go into evidence touching consideration. Jackson v. Jackson, 10 Leigh 453.

Joint and Several Causes of Action.—Debt on a single bill and on a mutuatus or other simple parol contract, may be joined in the same action of debt. Somerville v. Grim, 17 W. Va. 803. The action of debt lies to recover money lent, paid, had and received. Somerville v. Grim, 17 W. Va. 803.

On Speciality and Simple Contract—Joint Action.—An action of debt was brought on a bond for $207, on which was an endorsement by the obligor and obligee stating that a settlement had been made, and there was due on the bill $152. The declaration demanded $359, and contained two counts, 1st, on the single bill, and 2nd, on the simple contract. It is well established that debt may be brought on an obligation and on a mutuatus joined in the same action, though the former be under seal, and the latter a simple contract. The test of the propriety of such junction is that the accounts are of the same nature, and the same judgment may be given in all, though the pleas be different. The declaration in this case was free from objection, and the joint action was proper. Eib v. Pindall, 5 Leigh 109.

Appearance Bail—Bond with Conditions.—Appearance bail is not required in actions of debt on bonds with collateral conditions; and in such cases, it is error to enter a judgment by default against the sheriff for not requiring appearance bail. Ruffin v. Call, 2 Wash. 181; Nadenbush v. Lane, 4 Rand. 413.

Statutory Penalty.—Bail is not requirable in an action of debt, for the penalty of a statute. U. S. v. Mundel, 6 Call 245.

II. WHEN DEBT LIES.

A. SIMPLE CONTRACTS.

Note for Payment of Money or Tobacco.—The action of debt may be maintained on a note in writing, for the payment of money or tobacco, under our statute, and it is immaterial that the declaration should set out the consideration of the note, or that it was given for value received. Crawford v. Daigh, 2 Va. Cas. 521. And it was held in Hatcher v. Lewis, 4 Rand. 152, that debt lies against the endorsers of a note by a joint action.

Foreign Note Unstamped.—If the law of the State where a note is given only declares that it shall not be admissible as evidence unless stamped, an action of debt may nevertheless be maintained upon it in another state. Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 47.

Writing Acknowledging Debt.—When there is a writing, signed by the debtor, acknowledging his indebtedness in a certain amount, the real owner may bring an action of debt thereon. Cunningham v. Herndon, 2 Call 530; Murdock v. Herndon, 4 H. & M. 200. An acknowledgment of indebtedness between the parties to a deed, contained in its recitals is a sufficient acknowledgment of a debt to sustain an action of debt thereon. Newby v. Forsyth, 3 Gratt. 308.

Acceptor of an Order.—Under the 4th section of the Act, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 125, p. 484, the payee of an order can bring an action of debt against the acceptor of an order, because by his acceptance he obliges himself to pay the amount of the order to the payee by an absolute and unconditional obligation, and the subsequent treatment of the paper does not affect him. Hollingsworth v. Milton, 8 Leigh 50.

Bill of Exchange—Acceptor.—An action of debt will lie in the name of the drawer of a bill of exchange against the acceptor, independently of statute, and an action of debt will lie in the name of the endorsee of a bill of exchange against the acceptor under the Virginia Statute, Code 1860, ch. 144, § 10; Regnault v. Hunter, 4 W. Va. 257, overruling Smith v. Segar, 3 H. & M. 394, and Wilson v. Crowdhill, 2 Munf. 302.

Acceptor of Bill of Exchange—Payee—Drawer—Endorsee.—It was held in Regnault v. Hunter, 4 W. Va. 257, that an action of debt will lie in the name of the payee of a bill of exchange against the acceptor, under sec. 10, chap. 144, of the Code of Va. 1860, provided it be averred in the declaration that the acceptance is signed by the party who is to be charged thereby, or his agent. An action will therefore lie in the name of the drawer of a bill of exchange against the acceptor, independently of statute. An action will lie in the name of the endorsee of a bill of exchange against the acceptor under the statute.

Foreign Bill of Exchange.—The action of debt lies on a foreign bill of exchange, which was drawn in another state and endorsed in this State. Stott v. Alexander, 1 Wash. 331.

To Hold Maker and Endorsee Jointly Liable Protest and Notice Necessary.—To make an endorsee of a negotiable note liable, in debt, with the maker, it must appear that the note was duly and formally protested for non-payment, and that he was duly notified of such non-payment, and protest. See Code 1868, ch. 99, § 11. Shields v. Bank, 5 W. Va. 254.

B. BONDS.

Bonds Dischargeable in "Notes or Bonds."—An obligor bound himself to pay to the obligee or order on or before a certain day, a certain sum of money, with interest, "which sum may be discharged in notes and bonds due on good solvent men residing in the county of Randolph, Virginia." This is a bond for the payment of money and for which an action of debt will lie. When the obligation is to pay a sum of money, or some other article in the alternative, on or before a certain day; or to pay a certain sum of money, with a privilege to the obligor to pay it in some other article on or before a certain day, the obligor has his election to deliver the article on or before that day; but if he fail to do so, he is liable absolutely for the money in an action of debt for its recovery. Butcher v. Carlile, 13 Gratt. 520.

Bonds Payable in "Goods or Money."—An obligation was made for the payment of a certain sum of money in monthly installments, "either in goods at regular prices or current money." At the dates of payments neither the goods were delivered, nor the money paid. It was held that this was an obligation to pay money, with the privilege to the obligor to discharge the money obligation by the delivery of goods at regular prices in equal amount, on or before the time of payment; and the obligor having failed within that time either to pay the money or so to deliver the goods, was liable in an action of debt thereon. Minnick v. Williams, 77 Va. 758.

On Bond of Sheriff for Trespass.—An action of debt is the proper remedy when proceeding on the official bond of a sheriff who takes the property of A. under an attachment against the property of B. This was a violation of the duty of his office and the condition of his bond, and his sureties are liable therefor. Sangster v. Com., 17 Gratt. 124.

Bonds Payable in Confederate Notes.—A bond was given in 1862, novating several prior transactions between the parties. If the intention of the parties to the bond was that it was payable in Confederate States treasury notes, the defendant is entitled to recover in an action of debt the value of the amount of such notes, scaled according to the value of such notes with reference to gold. Dearing v. Rucker, 18 Gratt. 438.

Bonds Payable in "Gold or Silver."—An action of debt was brought on a bond promising to pay, "twenty-four hundred dollars, in gold or silver, or its equivalent." The court was of the opinion that this was an obligation to pay a certain sum, and "gold or silver" was named as the standard of value. The obligor was not obliged to pay in that coin, he could have paid its equivalent. Such an obligation is an absolute one for the payment of a sum certain of money, and as held in Butcher v. Carlile, 12 Gratt. 520, although there was a privilege to discharge it in its equivalent, the action of debt was properly maintainable on it. Turpin v. Sledd, 23 Gratt. 288.

Replevy Bond.—The executors may either maintain the statutory remedy of motion, or the common-law remedy of action of debt on a replevin bond, payable to their testator. Booker v. McRoberts, 1 Call 243; Early v. Owen, 6 Munf. 319.

Defective Forthcoming Bond.—Although a motion has been brought on a forthcoming bond, and dismissed because it was defective, this did not prevent the subsequent bringing of an action of debt upon the same bond, the said bond being taken by the sheriff, and the property was not delivered according to the condition of the bond and the motion on said bond dismissed because of its insufficiency. Hewlett v. Chamberlayne, 1 Wash. 367; Johnstons v. Meriwether, 3 Call 533. The fact that the bond was taken payable to the sheriff instead of to the creditor, does not prevent his bringing an action of debt on it. Beale v. Downman, 1 Call 249.

Act of 1813-14, ch. 13, § 2 Construed—Administration Bond.—M. H. adm'r of R. H. recovers a judgment against E. B. adm'x of R. B. for debt due plaintiff's intestate, and sues out a fi. fa. thereon, which is returned nulla bona; then, M. H. the plaintiff, dies; and administration de bonis non of R. H.'s estate is granted to A. Held, the action of debt on the administration bond of E. B. against her and her sureties, lies at the relation of A. the adm'r de bonis non of R. H. and not at the relation of the representative of M. H., he first adm'r of R. H., upon the construction of the statute of 1813-14, ch. 13, § 2; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 63; Allen v. Cunningham, 3 Leigh 395.

Bond to Ancestor—When Heir May Sue.—The heir may maintain an action of debt on a bond to his ancestor, conditioned for the quiet enjoyment of lands, when the breach has happened since the ancestor's death. Every decedent leaves two representatives, the executor, who represents his personal rights, and the heir, who represents his real rights. The executor is entitled to the collection and possession of the personal estate for the purposes of payment of debts and legacies, but the heir is entitled to the realty. The bond sued on constituted no part of the testator's personal estate, as no breach occurred during his lifetime, but belonged to the heir as appertaining to the inheritance, and it was proper for him to sue in debt for the breach. Eppes v. Demoville, 2 Call 23.

C. JUDGMENTS.

Joint Judgments—One Defendant Dead.—Where a joint judgment is obtained against two defendants, and one dies, an action of debt on the judgment lies against the representative of the deceased defendant: the law respecting partitions, joint rights and obligations. 1 Rev. Code, 359, being applicable to joint judgments. Roane v. Drummond, 6 Rand. 182.

On Judgment "if Assets."—It was held in Braxton v. Wood, 4 Gratt. 25, that the action of debt could be brought on a judgment, confessed by the administrator in a suit by a debtor of his testator, "if a sufficiency of the assets of the defendant's testator's estate shall remain after payment of debts of superior dignity."

Judgment—When Records Destroyed.—The action of debt may be maintained on a judgment, although the records of such judgment have been destroyed by fire, which also destroys the record of an appeal taken on said judgment. Newcomb v. Drummond, 4 Leigh 57.

D. ON STATUTES.

Statutory Penalty.—By the Supp. to Rev. Code, ch. 88, p. 112, it provides that if any officer of an election, who interferes in the election in any way by showing partiality for any candidate, he shall forfeit a certain sum, to be recovered by bill, plaint, or information in any court of record. In an action of debt brought under this statute it was contended that debt not being mentioned as a means of recovery, the action did not properly lie, but the court held it to be embraced in the words "bill" and "plaint." Sims v. Alderson, 8 Leigh 479.

E. PARTIALLY SEALED CONTRACTS.

Writing Sealed by a Part of Signers—Joint—Joint and Several.—An instrument in writing, binding all of the parties thereto, purporting to be under their hands and seals, is not sealed as to one of the parties. An action of debt is brought on the paper, and on demurrer it is held proper to sue all of the parties to such paper in one action of debt. In order to maintain the action the undertaking must be either joint and several, or joint; it was held to be plainly one joint undertaking. Rankin v. Roler, 8 Gratt. 68.

An action of debt was brought upon the following instrument, "On demand, I promise to pay to David Keller the just and full sum of $200.00, for value received, as witness my hand and seal the 1st day of March, 1862.

Thos. McHuffman, [Seal.]

Security:—David M. Riffe." This action was a joint one, and was brought by Keller's administrator against the obligor and the surety. The court held that this writing constituted a joint and several promise to pay, and that the action of debt was properly brought on it; it was held not necessary to sue in separate actions the obligor and surety. Keller v. McHuffman, 15 W. Va. 64.

III. WHEN DEBT DOES NOT LIE.

A. IN GENERAL.

Bond Payable in Installments.—When the obligation is to pay a sum of money in twenty-five annual installments, debt cannot be maintained on the bond, until the whole amount becomes due and payable. The proper remedy is an action of covenant for the recovery of the installments as they fall due. Peyton v. Harman, 22 Gratt. 643.

Statutory Bonds.—If an act of assembly directs that a bond shall be payable to the justices, and that the penalty shall be £1,000; if the bond be taken payable to the governor, and the penalty be £10,000, and a suit thereon is brought by a succeeding governor for the benefit of the party injured by an action of debt, it cannot be sustained. Stuart v. Lee, 3 Call 421.

Against Drawer and Endorsers of a Specialty.—A single bill, under seal, is not a note, but a specialty; and therefore the drawer and endorsers of such a note made negotiable and payable at the Farmers' Bank, cannot be sued jointly in an action of debt. Mann v. Sutton, 4 Rand. 253.

Digitized by Google

Single Bill under Seal.—Since the passage of the West Virginia Code of 1868, as before, a single bill under seal is not a note, but a specialty; and the drawer or endorsers of such a bill, although it be made payable and negotiable at a bank in West Virginia, cannot be sued jointly in an action of debt by virtue of the 11th sec. of ch. 99, of said Code. See Mann v. Sutton, 5 Rand. 253; Laidley v. Bright, 17 W. Va. 779. But see same section in the Code of 1899.

Beneficiary Not a Party.—Where there was an indenture between two parties, in which one of the parties covenanted to pay a certain sum to a third party, within a certain time and there was a breach of this covenant, the grantee or his personal representative only may proceed at law for its recovery, either by covenant for the breach or by debt for the money. The beneficiary cannot do so. So in a similar case when the contract was by parol, the beneficiary was not allowed to maintain debt or assumpsit for the money. The personal representative of the dead grantee alone being allowed to proceed at law. Ross v. Milne, 12 Leigh 204, 37 Am. Dec. 646.

Military Certificates.—It was held in Gibbon v. Jameson, 5 Call 294, that as debt could only be supported for money or tobacco, it did not lie for military certificates.

For Levying without Paying Year's Rent Due.—An action of debt was not sustained under an act which did not impose a penalty upon the officer for levying an execution on the property of the tenant, when a year's rent was due to the landlord, which the officer did not pay. The sheriff was liable in such case, but the remedy was an action on the case for consequential damages. Byrd v. Cocke, 1 Wash. 282.

Acceptor of Bill of Exchange.—An action of debt was held in Smith v. Segar, 3 H. & M. 394, and also in Wilson v. Crowdhill, 2 Munf. 302, not to lie against the acceptor of a bill of exchange. Otherwise by Va. Code of 1887, § 2853. See also, Regnault v. Hunter, 4 W. Va. 257, holding same way, that the action does lie.

B. BONDS NOT PAYABLE IN MONEY.

Bond "Payable in the Currency of Virginia and North Carolina Money."—On the 14th of September 1862, H bound himself by bond to pay to D twelve months after date eight hundred dollars for the purchase money of land, describing it, "payable in the currency of Virginia and North Carolina money." The obligation upon which this suit was brought, promised to pay eight hundred dollars "payable in the currency of Virginia and North Carolina money." Bank notes, though they pass generally by common consent as money, and answer the purpose of money, are not money in a legal sense unless they be made a legal tender in payment of debts. The action of debt will not lie where the amount of recovery in money must be ascertained by evidence of value and the intervention of a jury. The action of debt only lies for money and the plaintiff recovers the sum in numero, and not a compensation in damages. In this case the quantity of the Virginia and North Carolina currency was fixed, and the insertion of the words eight hundred dollars has no reference to current coin, but to the amount of bank notes which represents so much coin. In cases of indeterminate quantity there can be no other measure of damages than the named sum, and the intervention of a jury is unnecessary. The named sum must necessarily be the amount of the debt, which is then precisely ascertained. But where the named sum is to be paid in any determinate quantity of a collateral article subject to fluctuation in its market price, the value of that article is the thing due, and as it may be more or less than the named sum for which the creditor is willing to take the article, it must be estimated in damages by the jury. This was a promise to pay this sum in the currency named, and the action of debt cannot be maintained upon it. Dungan v. Henderlite, 21 Gratt. 149.

Bonds Payable in Bank Notes.—The obligor in a bond, promised to pay, on or before a certain specified day, the sum of "813 dollars and 79 cents, in notes of the United States Bank or either of the Virginia banks," and an action of debt is brought, on this writing. It is held that the action cannot be maintained. The action of debt will only lie upon a money or tobacco bond, and the plaintiff recovers the sum in numero, and not a compensation in damages. This is substantially a contract to pay bank notes to a certain specified amount, expressed in words as appropriate as any other, to signify how much bank paper was to be paid, and is equivalent to an engagement to pay bank notes amounting to 813 dollars and 79 cents, or so many bank notes as on their face will nominally make that sum. Paper may rise or depreciate in value before the day of payment, and if the day passes, when the contract is to be fulfilled, the measure of the obligee's right, and of the obligor's liabilities is the value of the notes on that day to be ascertained by the verdict of a jury, and awarded in damages. But where the promise is to pay a determinate sum in an article of fluctuating or uncertain value, if the quantity be fixed, so that at the day of payment it may fall short of the debt, there debt will not lie, because the essence of the contract was the delivery of the article and the creditor can only recover the value. As where there is an obligation to pay 500 dollars in wheat at a certain day, a failure is made to deliver the wheat on that day, debt will lie because the obligation was for 500 dollars, whether it be paid in coin or wheat. But if the obligation be to pay 500 dollars by the delivery of 500 bushels of wheat, there debt will not lie, although the day be past, for it is possible that the wheat on the day of payment will be worth less than 500 dollars. Beirne v. Dunlap, 8 Leigh 514.

IV. THE PLEADINGS.

A. THE DECLARATION.

1. IN GENERAL.

Omission of Obligor's Residence.—It is immaterial that the words, "of the county of Essex," the place of the obligor's residence, which is stated in the bond, are not stated in the declaration. Evans v. Smith, 1 Wash. 72.

Blank as to Sums, Date, etc.—Where an office judgment was entered for the plaintiff on a declaration in debt, which was blank as to the sum declared for, the date of the bond, the assignment to the plaintiff and the damage, it was incurably erroneous, and the judgment was reversed and the suit was dismissed with costs. Blane v. Sansum, 2 Call 495.

Declaration of Executor in Detinet—Judgment de Bonis Testatoris.—If an executor obtain a judgment against the administrator of the debtor, for a debt due to his testator, to be levied of the goods and chattels of the intestate, and he afterwards bring an action of debt against the administrator suggesting a devastavit and declare in detinet only, he cannot have judgment de bonis propriis of the administrator but only de bonis testatoris. To entitle the plaintiff to a judgment de bonis propriis he should declare in the debet and detinet. Spotswood v. Price, 3 H. & M. 123.

Executor's Bonds—How Action is Brought.—On a bond payable to "A. executor of B," the declaration technically should have been in the debet as well as the detinet, but it was only in the detinet. The plaintiff has the right to abridge his demand, and the omission to declare in the debet is such mere matter of form, that it will not be held regarded, even on special demurrer. Bailey v. Beckwith, 7 Leigh 604; Waller v. Ellis, 2 Munf. 88.

Declaring against Remote Heir.—In declaring in an action of debt against the heir of an heir on a bond in which such heirs are bound, he should be charged as heir of the heir of the obligor, or as heir of the obligor, with a videlicet, setting forth the intervening descent, but it is not necessary for the declaration to state how he is heir. Waller v. Ellis, 2 Munf. 88.

Husband Joined in Suit on Bond to Wife.—In an action of debt on a bond in the name of a married woman as assignee of the obligee the declaration stated that her husband had no interest in the subject matter of the suit but was joined with his wife by way of conformity. Held, the declaration was unobjectionable. Tate v. Perkins, 85 Va. 169, 7 S. E. Rep. 328; Hayes v. Va. Mut., etc., Ass'n, 76 Va. 225.

By Assignee on Balance Due.—It is a sufficient declaration in debt, which states that the defendant had acknowledged by his certain writing, the settlement of his account with W. R., and a certain amount due to him, which the said W. R. had by writing on the bill of settlement assigned to the plaintiffs, directing the same to be understood as belonging to the plaintiffs. This stated a sufficient cause of action. Cunningham v. Herndon, 2 Call 530.

On Administration Bond.—As administration bonds are for the use of others, and are specifically designated and provided for by law, it follows, that when such a bond is sued upon, and is to be exhibited as evidence, it ought clearly to appear from the declaration, that the bond declared on, is in its character an administration bond. It ought not to have to be inferable from the declaration that it is a mere private bond, which is the ground of action. When an official bond is the ground of action, it should be laid in the declaration to have been made to the obligee in his official capacity; that the declaration should manifest in what right the plaintiff sues is a general principle of law. The failure to state in a declaration in debt on an administration bond that the plaintiffs sued as justices of the court is a fatal variance, and the bond was inadmissible in evidence. Cabell v. Hardwick, 1 Call 345.

What Omissions in Declaration Fatal.—The declaration in an action of debt on a negotiable note, which fails to state that the plaintiff is the payee or endorsee or holder of the note, though the drawing of the note, and its endorsement by the payee in blank is alleged; which also fails to state that it was duly presented for payment at the place where it was payable, at the time when it became due and payable, that it was not paid, and that thereupon it was then duly protested for non-payment, of all of which the endorser had prompt notice, is fatally defective on general demurrer. Bank of Huntington v. Hysell, 22 W. Va. 142.

Against Heirs of Obligor.—In an action of debt on bond with collateral condition, the writ (which by the defendants' praying oyer was spread on the record) was against four persons, as heirs of the obligor, but the declaration only charged three as such heirs, the declaration was too defective for a judgment to be entered thereon, and such defect was not cured by verdict. Watson v. Lynch, 4 Munf. 94. See Va. Code 1887, § 2668.

2. THE DEBT.

On Joint Bond against One Obligor.—In an action of debt against one only of two joint obligors, where the declaration described the bond as joint, and did not state that the other obligor was dead, this was a fatal error, and though it was not pleaded in abatement, was not cured by verdict. Newman v. Graham, 3 Munf. 187. But it is held in Meredith v. Duval, 1 Munf. 76, that if the bond be spread on the record by oyer, and appear to be a joint and several bond, the defect in the declaration will be obviated. In neither case was the statute of jeofails adverted to. See Va. Code, 1887, § 3449.

When Interest Not Part of Debt.—The declaration in an action of debt on a judgment, which does not carry interest, demands the sum with interest. When the plaintiff, in an action in nothing extrinsic, but depending on a deed or other instrument, and pari ratione on a judgment, demands more than by his declaration he shows himself entitled to, the declaration is bad upon demurrer. Shelton v. Welsh, 7 Leigh 175.

On Maryland Judgment.—A Maryland judgment was rendered for a debt, damages and costs, with a memorandum at the foot that the plaintiff shall release the damages on payment of the interest due on the debt. In an action of debt brought on this judgment in Virginia, the declaration demanded the debt with interest, and not the damages. The demand of the plaintiff was substantially for the debt with interest, and hence there was no error in the declaration, which was held to be good in Kemp v. Mundell, 9 Leigh 12.

Acknowledgment of Indebtedness in a Deed.—In a declaration in debt on a deed, which contains the acknowledgment of the debt, it was held unnecessary to set out any more of the deed than that which contains the acknowledgment; and that only according to its legal effect. Newby v. Forsyth, 3 Gratt. 308.

On Statement of Agent.—An action of debt was instituted on a paper, which contained a statement of account of rents collected through a number of years by an agent for his principal. There was a statement at the foot of the account setting out the gross amount received, certain deductions, leaving the net sum due, concluding, "In the foregoing statement all errors to be corrected. As witness my hand and seal." This was signed and sealed by the agent. If this paper will sustain an action of debt, the declaration should declare that there are no errors in the bond; if plaintiff claims the net sum, and if she claims more or less, she should aver such error as will sustain her demand. Davis v. Mead, 13 Gratt. 118.

Defective Declaration—Statute of Jeofails.—The declaration in an action of debt on a judgment for a certain sum to be discharged by a lesser, demanded a wrong sum, and no special demurrer was filed. The error was cured by the statute of jeofails, there being enough in the declaration to show the true amount of the judgment. Roane v. Drummond, 6 Rand. 182.

Amendment of Declaration.—An action of debt was brought upon a judgment for a certain sum. In the declaration the sum declared for was slightly different from the judgment. The plea of no such record was filed. Upon the trial of the cause, the plaintiff moved to amend the declaration by inserting the true sum, which was allowed. There was no error in permitting the amendment. Anderson v. Dudley, 5 Call 529.

Date of Bond Blank in Declaration.—An action of debt was brought on two bonds, which were described in the declaration as dated on the — day of —— 1859, and the — day of —— 1860. The objection on general demurrer to these counts was not held sound, the bonds being fully described. Simmons v. Trumbo, 9 W. Va. 358.

Omission of Sum.—In an action of debt upon a protested negotiable note against the makers and endorsers, the accidental omission of the sum for which the note was given, in the description of it in the declaration, where it appears from other parts of the declaration, is not ground of demurrer. Archer v. Ward, 9 Gratt. 622.

Demand Less Than Amount of Note Sued on.—If the demand in the declaration in an action of debt be for less than the right of recovery shown by the note described in it, it would be disregarded on demurrer by reason of sec. 29, ch. 125 of the Code, and as the variance does not aggrieve the defendant, but is to his benefit; and also, in the absence of a demurrer, it is cured after judgment by sec. 3, ch. 134 of the Code of W. Va. Long v. Campbell, 37 W. Va. 665, 17 S. E. Rep. 197 (1893).

Variance—Several—Joint and Several.—If a declaration describe a note of several parties as several, while the note is joint and several, and no objection is made on account of the variance before judgment, though it be rendered on demurrer to evidence, it is unavailing to reverse the judgment by reason of sec. 3, ch. 134 of the Code of W. Va. Long v. Campbell, 37 W. Va. 665, 17 S. E. Rep. 197 (1893).

Declaration Defective.—A judgment was rendered in favor of testator of the defendant, against the plaintiff for 64£, 8s, 4d, to be discharged by the payment of 32£, 4s, 2d. The declaration in an action of debt, brought upon the above judgment, claimed only the latter sum, and a verdict was given to the plaintiff, and judgment entered. On appeal the judgment was reversed, because by the declaration it is manifest that the suit should have been for 64£, 8s, 4d, instead of 32£, 4s, 2d. Ragsdale v. Balte, 2 Wash. 201.

Interest Not Claimed.—An action of debt was brought upon a promissory note, bearing interest from date. The declaration stated the principal sum right, but omitted to state the amount of interest. Judgment for the principal sum without interest must be entered upon non sum informatus. Hubbard v. Blow, 1 Wash. 70. See also, Brooke v. Gordon, 2 Call 212. But now under the act which took effect April 1805, the clerk issues executions for interest, though not mentioned in the writing, nor demanded in the declaration. Wallace v. Baker, 2 Munf. 334; Baird v. Peter, 4 Munf. 76. See Va. Code, §§ 3390, 3391.

A judgment entered upon nil dicit or non sum informatus, in an action of debt in a penal bill, will not be reversed because the declaration, although describing the bill penal correctly as to the principal, penalty, and date, omitted to mention that the debt was payable "with interest from a day prior to the date," and judgment, in conformity with the penal bill was entered for the penalty, to be discharged by the principal, with such interest and costs. Harper v. Smith, 6 Munf. 389.

Variance between Bond and Declaration.—In an action of debt on a bond, the latter was recited in the declaration as bearing date in 1811; the bond produced, and made part of the declaration upon oyer was dated in 1810. This variance was held to be a matter of substance, and fatal to the case. Bennett v. Loyd, 6 Leigh 316.

On Judgment for Penalty Dischargeable by Smaller Sum.—In an action of debt on a judgment for the penalty of a bond, "to be discharged by a smaller sum with interest," the declaration ought not to demand "the smaller sum with interest till paid," but "the penalty to be discharged thereby." On the ground of this defect the court was of opinion that the error was a fatal one, even after verdict. Anderson v. Price, 4 Munf. 307.

Penalty and Not Aggregate of Bonds Sued on Demanded—Not Error.—The queritur in an action of debt brought upon an injunction bond should demand the aggregate of all the injunction bonds named in the declaration, where there are several counts, and there are apparently several bonds. But if the queritur demands only the penalty and not the aggregate it will not be so material an error as to be available on general demurrer. Bank v. Fleshman, 22 W. Va. 317.

3. THE BREACH.

Demurrer—Joining Causes of Action.—A declaration in debt contained but one count for the sum of $569 made up of the aggregate amounts due by two single bills, one of which alleged the defendant had bound himself to pay $100 in cash and $65.00 in good cash notes, the other that he bound himself to pay $385. The breach laid was that "the defendant has not paid the said several parcels of the said sum of $569, or any, or either of them, or any part thereof, in money or good cash notes." The defendant demurred because (1) the declaration was double in blending debt with covenant; (2) debt cannot be maintained on money to be paid in cash notes; (3) debt and covenant cannot be joined in the same action, and (4) debt is an entirety and indivisible. These objections cannot be considered on a demurrer to the whole declaration. The demurrer cannot be sustained. Henderson v. Stringer, 6 Gratt. 180.

Official Bond—From Whom Money Received—Injury from Breach—Damage.—In an action of debt on a bond conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of an office, the declaration need not set forth the particular persons from whom money was received, nor the sums received from each, nor the time when the breaches were committed, if it appears that they occurred during the continuance of defendant in his office; nor is it necessary to state the damages occasioned by the breaches. It is not necessary for the declaration, after the assignment of breaches, to allege that the plaintiffs have been injured by the breaches, but it is sufficient if it is stated that an action has accrued to the plaintiffs to demand and have the penalty of the bond. In an action for the penalty of a bond, it is not necessary to state that in consequence of the refusal of the defendant to pay, the plaintiff sustained damage. Allison v. Bank, 6 Rand. 204.

Bond by Distributees to Indemnify Administrator.—In an action of debt on a bond given by distributees to indemnify an administrator for dividing the estate among them, the condition being, "that they should pay him their respective proportions of all debts which he should be compelled to pay, that should thereafter come against said estate," it was a sufficient assignment of the breach for the declaration to say, "that the plaintiff on a day subsequent to the date of the bond, had paid, by the consent of the defendants, a debt which was then due from the estate aforesaid, and which, as administrator he was bound to pay, and that the defendants had not paid him their respective parts nor any proportion thereof, but the same had refused, although often requested." Moss v. Moss, 4 H. & M. 298.

Insufficient Assignment of Breach.—An assignment of a breach of a bond with collateral condition, in the declaration which commenced "and whereas, etc.," and continued in this way of recital to the end, and which did not contain any direct averment, was held insufficient, and the error was fatal on general demurrer. Syme v. Griffin, 4 H. & M. 277. See Va. Code 1887, § 3272.

Bond with Collateral Condition.—It is sufficient in declaring on a bond with collateral condition, if the declaration in debt on such bond assign the breach in the very words of the condition. Craghill v. Page, 2 H. & M. 446. Judgment was sustained although no damages were laid in the declaration in an action of debt on bond with a collateral condition. Craghill v. Page, 2 H. & M. 446.

In an action of debt on a bond with collateral condition, if the breach be assigned in as general terms as those of the condition, this is sufficient. In such cases, the plaintiff may recover more damages than he has laid in the declaration. Winslow v. Com., 2 H. & M. 459.

On Bond with Interest.—The declaration in an action of debt described it as being for a certain sum of money, with interest from a certain day. The breach laid was that the defendant had not paid "the aforesaid sum of money," without alleging the non-payment of interest. The defendant was not allowed to object to errors which were for his benefit, and the defect was cured by the verdict for the principal sum, together with damages and costs. Hammitt v. Bullett, 1 Call 567.

Counts in Declaration—General Conclusion—Breaches.—Where an action of debt is based upon a single bill and simple contracts for money lent, money received, or money paid, and the aggregate of all the counts is demanded, the usual conclusion need not be added to each count, and if the general conclusion of the declaration is in the proper form and good, it will be considered as applying to each count, as well as to all collectively. And when the breach in the count on the single bill is alleged to have been defective, and the breach at the end of the declaration is sufficient, the breach to the count of the single bill will be cured by the breach at the end of the declaration. Somerville v. Grim, 17 W. Va. 803.

Variance Cured after Verdict.—The defendant gave a bond, with condition, that he would collect certain debts due to obligee, make return of amounts collected, and surrender all bonds not paid, except such as might be lodged with lawyers for collection, agreeing to perform the duty of collector for the obligee to the best of his skill. An action of debt was brought on this bond, and the breach was laid on the defendant's neglecting to bring suits for the recovery of the debts, etc. This variance was held immaterial, particularly after verdict. Hawkins v. Berkley, 1 Wash. 204.

4. THE AVERMENTS.

Sheriff's Bonds—Bad Averment.—When the action of debt was brought on a sheriff's bond, and the declaration averred that the deputy sheriff acknowledged that he had received the amount of the execution, not that he had received it, this was a bad averment. For though it may be true, that the deputy made the acknowledgment, it may be false that he received the money. The receipt of the money was the gist of the action, and it should have been directly averred, that the defendant might put in an issue. The acknowledgment of the receipt of it did not offer proper matter upon which an issue could be made up. An issue made up on it would have been immaterial. Bennett v. Loyd, 6 Leigh 316.

Officer of Election—Statutory Penalty—Recitals.—In an action of debt under a statute imposing a penalty on the sheriff for partiality in conducting an election, the declaration was objected to because it contained mere recitals and not express averments; because it did not aver that there was an election, nor that defendant conducted it, the words "being, etc.," were mere recital. The court held that while the facts of the election, of the plaintiff being a candidate, and that the defendant was the sheriff, were set forth by way of recital, the fact that the defendant "did interfere and show partiality," which was the gist of the action, was set forth directly and not by way of recital, and that the declaration was good on general demurrer. Sims v. Alderson, 8 Leigh 479.

On Sheriff's Bond—Fatal Omission.—A declaration in an action of debt upon a sheriff's official bond, for the use of the county court of his county, for failing to pay over moneys received by him in his official capacity for the use of such county, which fails to aver that before such action was commenced, the county court had, by its order entered of record, or by a draft made in pursuance thereof, ordered him to pay such moneys to his successor in office, or to some other person, and that said sheriff had notice thereof, is, upon general demurrer, fatally defective. State v. Hays, 30 W. Va. 107, 3 S. E. Rep. 177.

Averment of Penalty in Penal Bond.—A declaration in debt on a penal bond executed to an individual must contain an averment of the non-payment of the penalty; and if it does not, the defect will be fatal on general demurrer. Rigg v. Parsons, 29 W. Va. 522, 2 S. E. Rep. 81.

On Executor's Bond—Averment of Assets Necessary.—In an action of debt on an executor's bond, the declaration must aver that assets sufficient to pay the debt came to the executor's hands, or the amount of assets that came to his hands, and the devastavit thereof; and if the declaration contain no such averment, it is bad on general demurrer. Burnett v. Harwell, 3 Leigh 89.

Attachment Bond—Insufficient Allegation.—In an action of debt upon an attachment bond, the condition of which was that the defendant should pay all costs and damages that might accrue from wrongfully suing out the attachment, the declaration averred that the defendant "did not pay all such costs and damages as have accrued, etc." But there was no averment that the attachment was wrongfully sued out, or that costs and damages had been sustained. This was not a sufficient declaration; a direct averment was essential. Dickinson v. M'Craw, 4 Rand. 158.

Executor's and Commissioner's Bond—Declaration Sufficient.—A bond is executed to an executor and commissioner under decree of court, with conditions reciting that the obligor has borrowed of the executor and commissioner a certain sum of his testator's estate, which by said decree he is authorized to put at interest, on real estate security and to take bonds in his own name as executor, the interest to be paid semi-annually, and the principal when he may so require. The declaration in debt on this bond did not aver any order of the court authorizing the collection of the money. On demurrer the declaration was held sufficient. Cabell v. Cox, 27 Gratt. 182.

By Administrator of Assignee.—On general demurrer the declaration, in an action of debt by the administrator of the assignee of the obligee against the administrator of the obligor, was held to be essentially defective, because it did not aver that the defendant had not paid the assignor, before notice of assignment, nor the plaintiff's intestate in his lifetime afterwards. Mitchell v. Thompson, 2 P. & H. 424.

Statute of Limitations Pleaded.—The plaintiff in an action of debt, if he wishes to take his case out of the statute of limitations by relying on a subsequent acknowledgment of the debt by the defendant within the period of limitation, must count on such subsequent acknowledgment in his declaration; it is otherwise in an action of assumpsit. Butcher v. Hixton, 4 Leigh 519.

Promissory Note—Presentment.—In an action of debt on a promissory note, brought by an indorsee against the maker, the declaration stated the note as one made negotiable at the Bank of Va. at Petersburg, and averred that the note was presented at the bank at maturity and protested for non-payment; the note offered in evidence, was made negotiable at the bank; there was no proof that it was presented at the bank for payment. The note was not made payable at any particular place, it was only made negotiable at the bank at Petersburg, and was not necessarily payable there. The averment of presentation at the bank is mere surplusage and immaterial, and need not be proved. Barrett v. Wills, 4 Leigh 114.

Penal Bill—Demand.—In an action of debt on a penal bill payable on demand, the declaration contained no averment of a special demand. An obligation to pay money on demand is evidence of a present debt payable instanter, and the writ is a demand, which entitles the plaintiff to the penalty. Payne v. Britton, 6 Rand. 101.

Consideration—Value Received.—It is an unnecessary averment in the declaration of an action of debt in a writing for the payment of money, that there was any consideration, or that it was for value received. The plea is nil debet, which calls for proof of note, and allows evidence to be given that the consideration is bad or lacking. Crawford v. Daigh, 2 Va. Cas. 521; Peasley v. Boatwright, 3 Leigh 195. See Va. Code 1887, § 2852.

On Debt Due Testator.—In an action of debt brought by the surviving executor for a debt due to the testator in his lifetime, the declaration charged that the debt was not paid to the plaintiff, but did not charge also that it was not paid to the testator, nor that it was not paid to either of the co-executors. This was a fatal defect, and was not cured by verdict. Buckner v. Blair, 2 Munf. 336.

On Assigned Promissory Note.—A declaration in debt on an assigned promissory note, which did not state that the defendant had failed to pay the money to the drawee, as well as to the plaintiff, was held to be too defective to maintain the action. Norvell v. Hudgins, 4 Munf. 496.

Sheriff's Bond.—In an action of debt on the bond of a sheriff, with collateral condition, it was held that where the declaration charged that he failed to pay the taxes on demand, instead of at the time appointed by law, that this was sufficient after verdict. Winslow v. Com., 2 H. & M. 459.

On Assigned Bond.—In an action of debt upon an assigned bond, the declaration did not aver that neither the defendant, nor her testator, in his lifetime, paid the debt to the obligee, or to either of the assignees of the said bond, but only averred that neither of them paid the same to the plaintiff. The declaration should state a failure to pay to the obligee, and each of the assignees, as well as to the plaintiff, and a failure to do so is too great a defect to permit the action to be maintained, and such defect is not cured by verdict. Braxton v. Lipscomb, 2 Munf. 282; Green v. Dulany, 2 Munf. 518; Nicholson v. Dixon, 5 Munf. 198.

And in a similar case although the partner, who did not sign the debt, put in a plea of payment, and verdict and judgment is given against him in the lower court, still this is too defective to support a judgment against him, in the absence of other averments binding him, and the judgment was reversed. Garland v. Davidson, 3 Munf. 189.

On Bond of Partner for Firm.—In an action of debt against a partnership, on a bond signed by only one partner for the firm, the declaration charged that "W." for "W. G." bound himself, his heirs, executors and assigns to pay, etc. This was adjudged insufficient in law to maintain the action against the firm in the absence of other averments binding them. Shelton v. Pollock, 1 H. & M. 423.

5. THE DAMAGES.

Bond with Collateral Condition—Assessment of Damages—Penalty.—In an action of debt upon a bond with a collateral condition, the jury may assess damages beyond those laid in the declaration, if the penalty be sufficient to cover them. Payne v. Elizey, 2 Wash. 143.

Damages Omitted in Declaration.—The omission to lay damages in the declaration in an action of debt although in an action sounding in damages was cured after verdict by the statute of jeofails. Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. 203.

Recovery on Collateral Bond Limited to Breaches Assigned.—In an action of debt on a bond with collateral condition, the plaintiff cannot recover any costs or damages, which he did not demand in the assignment of breaches in the declaration. Woodson v. Johns, 3 Munf. 230.

Variance between Writ and Declaration—Interest—Protest Charges.—An action of debt was brought upon a protested negotiable note. The writ demanded the principal sum, but did not demand interest, nor the costs of protest. The declaration contained demands for the principal sum, together with interest and the protest charges. The demand for interest in the declaration, which is not claimed in the writ, is no objection, since by the statute in that case provided, the interest follows the principal as the shadow does the substance. It is error to claim charges of protest not claimed in the writ. Where judgment is by default this error may be taken advantage of. Hatcher v. Lewis, 4 Rand. 152.

B. THE PLEAS.

1. IN GENERAL.

Wrong Plea—Amendment.—Where the plea of payment was filed by the attorney, through inadvertence, and for want of information, to a declaration in debt on joint bond against the executors of one obligor, instead of the plea of discharge, which was proper (the death of one obligor on a joint bond, prior to the Act of 1786, discharged his executors), the plea was allowed to be amended, after trial and verdict for plaintiff. Richardson v. Johnson, 2 Call 327. See Va. Code 1887, § 2855.

Attachment before Notice.—In debt by the assignee of a bond, it is not a sufficient plea, that, before notice of the assignment, the effects of the assignor were attached in the defendant's hands, and a decree entered that he should pay the debt to the attaching creditor, etc.; and that, accordingly, he had made such payment;—it appearing by the pleadings, that the bond was assigned before the attachment was instituted, and suit brought upon it by the assignee before the payment made. Wilson v. Davisson, 5 Munf. 178.

Plea of Statute of Limitations—Acknowledgment of Debt.—In an action of debt upon a promissory note against principal and surety, the surety plead the statute of limitations, and to which the plaintiff replied generally. It was held that proof of the acknowledgment of the debt by the principal, within five years next before the action was brought, did not sustain the issue on the part of the plaintiff. Butcher v. Hixton, 4 Leigh 519.

Demurrer to Plea.—An action of debt was brought on the official bond of a sheriff in the name of G. successor of T., governor of Virginia, to whom the bond was given. A plea was filed that G. was not, and that M. was the successor of T. A demurrer was filed to the plea. The plea although filed to entrap, cannot be pronounced bad in substance on demurrer, for that merely decides whether the plea is a good one, not whether the defendant should be permitted to file it. Bennett v. Loyd, 6 Leigh 316.

Upon a demurrer to a plea, the court goes back to the first fault, and if plaintiff's declaration is defective, gives judgment for defendant on the demurrer, nor is defect cured by the defendant pleading over. Bennett v. Loyd, 6 Leigh 316.

Issuable Plea.—In an action of debt against an executor, the defendant pleaded that the testator in his lifetime was the guardian of an infant, that his account as guardian had been settled by the commissioners of court, which showed a large balance due to the ward, and that this was a debt of higher dignity than that claimed by the plaintiff. This was held not to be an issuable plea. Wyatt v. Woodlief, 1 Leigh 473.

Plea of Covenants Performed.—Where an action was brought on a bond, the condition of which was that the obligor should make a title to a tract of land, when thereunto lawfully required, and the defendant plead covenants performed, the plaintiff was not bound to prove on his part any demand of a deed. Pate v. Spotts, 6 Munf. 394.

Repleader Awarded—Not Prayed for.—An action of debt is brought against M as heir and devisee of his father, upon a bond entered into by the father for the payment of money. The defendant pleaded "nothing by descent," and issue was joined. A repleader was awarded, though not asked for in lower court, because the issue only tried the right as to the descent, but not as to the devise. Baird v. Mattox, 1 Call 257.

2. EVIDENCE UNDER.

Parol Evidence under Plea of Payment.—This was an action of debt brought on a bond, to which the defendant filed a plea of payment. On the trial the defendant introduced a witness, who stated that he heard the plaintiff, before the institution of the suit, tell the defendant that $35 only of the bond remained unpaid. The plaintiff's counsel moved to exclude this evidence from the jury on the ground that no such payment as that was stated in the account of payments filed with the plea. But as by the act of assembly, 1 Rev. Code 487, ch. 127, it was provided, that in an action of debt due by judgment, bond, bill or otherwise, the defendant shall have liberty, upon the trial thereof, to make all the discount he can against such debt; and upon proof thereof the same shall be allowed in court; it is competent under the plea of payment to give in evidence parol admissions of the plaintiff, that but a portion of the debt claimed was really due. Rice v. Annatt, 8 Gratt. 557.

Proof under Specific Plea in General Terms.—In an action of debt brought on a bond given for the price of a slave, a special plea under the act of 1831 is good, which avers in general terms, that the slave was unsound at the time of the sale, and that the plaintiff knew the fact and fraudulently concealed it from the defendant; and that upon discovering the fact the defendant offered to return the slave and demand a rescission of the contract, which was refused, laying damages to the whole amount of the price, or not laying any damages, and praying for judgment in bar of the action. If such a special plea avers in general terms the unsoundness of the slave, and then adds a specific unsoundness, the defendant may prove any unsoundness under this plea, and is not confined to the specific unsoundness named in the plea. Fleming v. Toler, 7 Gratt. 310.

Lost Bond—Copy Admissible in Evidence.—An action of debt was brought upon a bond, with profert, the defendant craved oyer, which was given, but the bond shown was a copy, and the defendant plead payment, by doing which he waived the necessity of producing the original, and a copy may be given in evidence at the trial, upon due proof of the loss or destruction of the original. Taylor v. Peyton, 1 Wash. 252.

3. IN BAR.

Plea in Bar of Action on Bond with Collateral Condition.—In an action of debt on a bond with collateral condition the declaration was in the usual form. The defendant prayed oyer of the condition of the said bond which was as follows: "Whereas the obligor did lend to J. W. $2,500 of the obligee's money, and the said J. W. having failed, but before he failed he paid $500, and whereas the said obligor hath instituted a suit against said J. W. for the recovery of said money; now, if the said obligor shall pay the whole sum so lent, if it can be recovered from the said J. W. or, in case it cannot be wholly recovered, will lose the one-half of that sum which cannot be recovered, then the above obligation shall be void, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue:"—a plea was filed stating "that he, the said obligor, could not recover of J. W. or his endorser the sum of money in the said condition mentioned, or any part thereof, and that he paid to the obligee one-half of the sum which could not be so recovered, and the further sum of five hundred dollars." This was held a good and sufficient plea in bar to an action upon the bond, without any further averment that the said obligor has used due diligence in prosecuting the suit, and without stating what measures he had taken to recover the money, or who the endorser was. Cooke v. Graham, 5 Munf. 172.

Issue Refused—Rejection of Pleas.—In an action of debt against an executor, judgment by default having been regularly entered and confirmed, the defendant tendered four good pleas in bar, to which the plaintiff immediately put in replications tendering issues. The defendant refused to join in the issues, rejoin or demur. The court thereupon rejected the pleas of the defendant, and proceeded to judgment. Wyatt v. Woodlief, 1 Leigh 478.

Plea to Action on Injunction Bond.—This was an action of debt on an injunction bond in a penalty. The declaration stated that the injunction was dissolved whereby the action had accrued. A plea was filed, stating, "that the injunction was not dissolved unconditionally; but upon terms, that the plaintiff at law should execute a bond for securing the title to a tract of land," but did not aver that such bond had not been given. This was a defective plea and should not have been received to set aside an office judgment. Gray v. Campbell, 3 Munf. 251.

Conditions Performed.—In an action of debt upon a sheriff's official bond, the plea of conditions performed, properly pleaded, is an answer to the whole cause of action in the declaration mentioned, and controverts the plaintiff's right to any recovery whatever. State v. Hays, 30 W. Va. 107, 3 S. E. Rep. 177.

Unchartered Banking Company.—To an action of debt on a note alleged to have been made and discounted by the plaintiffs in Virginia, but made payable at a bank out of the state, a plea that the plaintiffs are an unchartered banking company, issuing and circulating their own paper notes or bills as currency, contrary to law and public policy; and that they as a banking company discounted the said note, contrary to law and public policy, sets up a good defense to the action. Hamtramck v. Selden, 12 Gratt. 28.

4. NIL DEBET.

Plea of Nil Debet.—In an action of debt upon a negotiable note, the defence that the plaintiffs are not holders for value of the note, may be made under the plea of nil debet. Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 47.

For a general discussion of what may be proved under the plea of nil debet, reference is made to 4 Min. Inst. (3rd Ed.) 770.

In the recent case of Richmond City & S. P. Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 90 Va. 775, 20 S. E. Rep. 148, it was held that in order to prove payments under the plea of nil debet, he must file with his plea such a descriptive account as is required by sec. 3298 of the Va. Code of 1887, citing 1 Bart. Law Pr. (2d Ed.) 492, 498.

Foreign Judgment—Nil Debet—Special Plea.—To an action of debt brought in Virginia upon a judgment entered in the District of Columbia, the defendants tendered a plea of nil debet, and a special plea, alleging that the said judgment was recovered on a bill of exchange given while in a state of intoxication for money won at gaming. The judgment of the court of the District of Columbia is a foreign judgment, the "full faith and credit" clause of the Constitution only applying to "States," and the plea of nil debet is admissible, but the special plea should be rejected, as the defendant cannot bring into question the merits of the original judgment. Draper v. Gorman, 8 Leigh 628.

Improper Plea Set Aside.—An action of debt was brought in Virginia on a Maryland judgment. The defendant pleaded no such record, on which issue was joined. He afterwards tendered a plea of nil debet, which was allowed, and issue was joined on it. At the next term as on general demurrer to the plea of nil debet, judgment was entered for the plaintiff on both pleas. It was error to receive the improper plea of nil debet (Clarke v. Day, 3 Leigh 172), and the court might properly have corrected this by subsequently setting aside the issue and the plea. This was substantially done by entering a judgment as if there had been a demurrer. The proceedings were not reversed for the irregularity. Kemp v. Mundell, 9 Leigh 12.

Foreign Judgments—Plea of Nil Debet.—This was an action of debt brought in the state of Virginia on a judgment rendered in Kentucky. The Constitution and Acts of Congress of the United States have placed the judgments of the courts of other states, when sued on here, on the same ground and as having the same effect, as they would have if sued on in the state where they were obtained. The plea filed was nil debet, which assumes that the judgment is not conclusive evidence. Such judgment was affirmed on appeal to the Supreme Court of Kentucky, and was conclusive on the parties in that state. The plea was held bad. Clarke v. Day, 2 Leigh 172; Kemp v. Mundell, 9 Leigh 12.

Plea of Nil Debet—Apportionment of Rent.—In action of debt for rent, the defendant, on a plea of nil debet, may give in evidence any special circumstance showing that the rent ought to be apportioned. Newton v. Wilson, 3 H. & M. 470.

Accord and Satisfaction Must Be Pleaded.—Several smaller promissory notes were given for a large one, and suit was brought on the large one. The plea was nil debet. The smaller notes were held not to be a discharge, but at most an accord and satisfaction, which would have to be pleaded. It could not be admitted under the general issue. McGuire v. Gadsby, 3 Call 234.

5. NON EST FACTUM.

Plea of Non Est Factum after Plea of Payment—Affidavit to Plea.—In an action of debt upon a single bill under seal, the defendant pleaded payment and the office judgment was set aside. On trial the defendant moved for leave to file the plea of non est factum, with affidavit annexed that said plea was true "to the best of the defendant's knowledge and belief." The lower court rejected the plea. The plea, being one which goes to the merits, should have been received, especially so, when it was not offered for the purpose of delay. An objection that the affidavit was not positive was not sustained. No man can swear positively to legal inferences, and the words of the affidavit do not render it defective. Jackson v. Webster, 6 Munf. 462.

Non Est Factum—Execution—Fraud.—In an action of debt founded on a bond or other deed, the defendant may put in issue the execution of the instrument by pleading non est factum generally and in the common form. In a court of common law, fraud may be given in evidence to vacate a deed on the plea of non est factum, if such fraud relates to the execution of the instrument; as the essential element of delivery. American, etc., Co. v. Burlack, 35 W. Va. 647, 14 S. E. Rep. 319.

6. PAYMENT.

Plea of Payment—Part of Debt Due.—When an action of debt was brought on a bond with a condition, which was made a part of the declaration by over, and that condition only showed that a part of the money secured was due at the time of the institution of the suit, the plea of payment put in by the defendant only extended to such sums, and not to those which afterwards became due. Thatcher v. Taylor, 3 Munf. 249.

Plea of Payment—Set-Off.—In an action of debt on a bond, the defendant plead, as a set-off, the obligation of the plaintiff assigned to him by a third person, and also put in the general plea of payment. The writing when produced proved not to be an obligation, but a promissory note executed by the plaintiff. This was held to be evidence under the second plea of payment, but not under the first. Anderson v. Bullock, 4 Munf. 442.

Plea of Payment—When General Issue.—The plea of payment is responsive to the negation of non-payment in the declaration. The act of assembly, by allowing a general plea of payment in all cases, with a right to prove all anterior payments, makes it a general issue in this country. Henderson v. Southall, 4 Call 371.

Condition Performed Equivalent to Payment.—The plea of condition performed, to an action of debt for money, is equivalent to the plea of payment. Defendant was not allowed to object to errors in pleadings which are for his benefit. Hammitt v. Bullett, 1 Call 567.

Misjoinder of Issue—Cured by Statute of Jeofails.—In an action of debt on bond, the defendant files as his plea, this, "that he has well and truly paid the debts in the declaration mentioned, and the statute of limitations; and of this he puts himself upon the country, and the plaintiff likewise, and issue was joined." The pleas of the statute of limitations and payment should have concluded with a verification, and issue could not have been joined upon them by adding a similiter, but only after replication. This was a misjoinder of issue and improper, but was cured after verdict by the statute of jeofails. Simmons v. Trumbo, 9 W. Va. 358.

7. OF FRAUD.

Action at Law—Special Plea of Fraud.—The action of debt was brought on a specialty, and the defendant sought to avoid it by a plea, which stated that the bond had been obtained by fraudulent misrepresentations made by the plaintiffs. The circumstances relied on did not relate to the execution, only to the consideration of the bond. A specialty cannot be avoided in a court of law on this ground. Wyche v. Macklin, 2 Rand. 426. Since 1831 this rule has been changed by statutory provision. See Va. Code 1887, § 3299; Code of W. Va. ch. 126, § 5.

Plea of Misrepresentation—Estoppel—Waiver.—In an action of debt on bond, the defendant plead that it was obtained by false representations and suggestions by the plaintiff, "as per preamble in the said bond." The plaintiff joined issue as to the fact, and the jury found against him. If there had been any estoppel to such plea it was thereby waived, and judgment ought to have been for the defendant. Chew v. Moffett, 6 Munf. 120.

In Tomlinson v. Mason, 6 Rand. 169, it was held to be immaterial in a plea to an action of debt on a bond, that the bond was obtained by fraud and covin, without saying whether the fraud was in the consideration of the bond or in its execution.

C. THE REPLICATION.

Special Replication—Rejoinder.—A bond was given with condition to perform an award to be made by certain arbitrators. In an action of debt on this bond, the condition was made a part of the record by oyer, and the defendant pleaded "conditions performed." The plaintiff may set forth the award, and aver a breach of condition, by a special replication, not having done so in his declaration. But if he neglect to do this, and reply generally, the judgment ought to be arrested, after a verdict in his favor. The proceedings subsequent to the plea should be set aside, and a repleader awarded. Green v. Bailey, 5 Munf. 246.

Replication Defective in Setting Forth Condition of Bond.—In an action of debt on a bond in a penalty, with a condition for the payment of a less sum by installments, upon certain prescribed conditions, the plaintiff in his declaration claimed the penalty, but made no mention of the conditions. The defendant pleaded payment. The plaintiff in his replication set forth the condition of the bond, and averred non-payment of the sum mentioned in the condition at the times therein specified. This replication was held bad on general demurrer. Mitchell v. Thompson, 2 P. & H. 424.

Replication to Plea of Feme Covert.—In an action of debt on bond, the defendant pleaded in bar that she was, at the time of executing the bond and yet remained, a feme covert. The replication of the plaintiff was, that the defendant's husband had abjured the commonwealth and was not then or now a citizen thereof. To this replication a general demurrer was filed and the replication was held to be wholly defective. If it was intended that the common-law abjuration of the realm was to be relied upon, that never existed here. If it was intended that the expatriation of the husband under our statute was to be relied upon, it should have been shown how he expatriated himself, by a recorded declaration by deed, or in open court and that he had departed from the commonwealth. Even this would not have been sufficient, without the further allegation that he resided abroad at the time of the execution of the bond by his wife. The replication was held defective. Branch v. Bowman, 2 Leigh 170.

Peremptory Judgment—When Rendered on Plea.—If in an action of debt against an heir, he pleads "no assets by descent, nor at the time the writ issued, nor at any time since, except a tract of 107 acres of land;" and issue is joined on the replication, that he had sufficient other lands by descent; and the jury find for the plaintiff, peremptory judgment will be rendered thereon. Cohoons v. Purdie, 3 Call 431.

Defective Replication—Repleader Awarded.—In an action of debt against the executors of one obligor, on a bond given by the testator and one John Pattie, the defendant, without taking oyer, pleaded in bar, "that the said John Thornton was jointly bound with a certain John Pattie, and the said John Pattie survived him." To this plea the replication was "that it is not expressed in the bond that the said John Thornton was jointly bound with the said John Pattie, as alleged in the plea, and if they were jointly bound, that by Act of 1786 it is declared that the representative of one jointly bound with another, may be sued as well as the surviving obligor himself." The plea was held good, the replication faulty and a repleader awarded. Stevens v. Taliaferro, 1 Wash. 155.

Plea of Payment—General Replication.—An action of debt was brought against the defendant on a note. The defendant plead payment, to which plea a general replication was filed, and issue joined. At the trial the defendant moved for an amendment to set aside the proceedings subsequent to the replication, and proved that issue was joined by the clerk without his consent and against his wish. The general replication to the plea of payment did not constitute an issue. The defendant should have been permitted to prove that the similiter entered was against his consent. The proceedings should have been corrected by giving him a rule to take other measures to the replication. Nadenbousch v. McRea, Gilmer 228.

For statutory provisions regarding the similiter, see Va. Code 1887, §§ 3268, 3449; Code of W. Va., ch. 125, § 25; ch. 34, § 8.

V. VERDICT.

A. WHEN VALID.

Aggregate of Principal and Interest.—In an action of debt upon a bond, with a penalty, for the payment of money, the jury may make their verdict of the aggregate of principal and interest. The defendant will not be allowed to appeal for that cause, since that mode of finding the verdict was for his benefit. Smith v. Harmanson, 1 Wash. 6.

Verdict for Erroneous Sum—When Immaterial.—In an action of debt on a judgment for a certain sum, to be discharged by a lesser, when the declaration demands a wrong sum, a verdict which finds an erroneous sum, "that being the debt in the declaration mentioned," is substantially good, the sum being surplusage, and the conclusion of the verdict being, of itself, sufficient to show the real sum demanded. Roane v. Drummond, 6 Rand. 182.

Above Amount Claimed in Declaration.—In an action of debt on a bond with a collateral condition, the penalty is that for which the plaintiff sues, and any sum given below that is within the sum declared for. The jury may assess damages beyond those laid in the declaration. Payne v. Elizey, 2 Wash. 134; Johnstons v. Meriwether, 3 Call 523; Winslow v. Com., 2 H. & M. 459.

Against Part of Obligors.—In an action of debt on a bond against five obligors, the sixth was omitted; it appeared from the declaration that the former were securities for him. It was not alleged that he had sealed the bond, and no plea in abatement having been filed, the court gave verdict for the plaintiff. The presumption was that the unnamed obligor was dead, although not so stated in the declaration, and the judgment will be sustained. Winslow v. Com., 2 H. & M. 459.

Sufficiently Certain.—A verdict and judgment for a debt claimed in the declaration with interest, subject to a credit for a specified sum, paid at a specified date, is certain enough. Barrett v. Wills, 4 Leigh 114, 26 Am. Dec. 315.

Plea of Fraud—Sufficient Verdict.—In an action of debt issue was joined on a plea that the bond which was sued upon was obtained by fraud. A verdict "for the defendant, because the jury believed the bond was obtained by fraudulent means" was held to be sufficiently positive and certain. Chew v. Moffett, 6 Munf. 120.

Bond for Tobacco with Pecuniary Penalty.—A executes a writing obligatory to B for the payment of tobacco, under a pecuniary penalty, with a condition annexed, that it shall be void if G shall pay the tobacco, or its value to A. In an action of debt brought on this writing the declaration assigns a breach of the condition, and the defendant pleads payment. The verdict and judgment ought to be for the penalty, to be discharged by payment, not of the tobacco with interest thereupon, but of damages, for breach of the condition. Overstreet v. Marshall, 1 H. & M. 381.

B. WHEN DEFECTIVE.

Verdict on "Fully Administered"—Insufficient.—In an action of debt on bonds brought by the executor of the creditor against the administrator of the debtor, issues were joined on the pleas of payment and fully administered. Verdict was given for the plaintiff on the first issue, and on the last, "that assets more than sufficient to pay the debt came to the defendant's hands to be administered." CARR, J., reviewed the cases cited and said: "It seems clear to me, from the whole tenor of these decisions, and the reason on which they stand, that the verdict before us must be pronounced insufficient. All the cases decide substantially, I think, that it must appear from the verdict, that at the institution of the action, there were in the hands of the representative, assets not bound by superior claims, sufficient to discharge the debt due the plaintiff: or if not sufficient, that the amount of such assets must be found. Here it is found that assets more than enough to pay the debt came to the defendant's hands; but whether he had them at the institution of this suit; or whether before he had not properly disbursed them, or whether if he still held them, they were not bound by prior judgments, does not appear. There is therefore, all that uncertainty and insufficiency, for which in the other cases, the verdicts were set aside; and I think this must share the same fate." Sturdivant v. Raines, 1 Leigh 481.

Verdict against Administratrix Insufficient—Judgment de Bonis Testatoris.—An action of debt was brought against an administratrix on a bond of her intestate. The defendant plead fully administered. A verdict was given in general terms that the defendant had not fully administered, and judgment thereupon for the debt was demanded to be levied de bonis testatoris. The verdict was held insufficient to warrant the judgment. Brizendine v. Tisdale, 5 Leigh 51.

Against Survivor.—Where an action of debt was brought against two persons on a bond executed by both and it abated as to one by his death, a verdict which only found that the surviving defendant had not paid the debt, is bad in that it does not negative the payment of the money by the deceased defendant. Triplett v. Micou, 1 Rand. 269.

Defective Verdict on Plea of Payment.—An action of debt was brought against the appellant upon a bond of his testator. Issue was joined on the pleas of payment and fully administered, and the jury found "for the defendant, he having fully administered all the assets which came to his hands." This verdict was held defective in not being responsive to the issue joined on the plea of payment, and the judgment will be reversed by the appellate court, although no objection was taken in the court below: and a venire facias de novo will be directed as to both the issues. Brown v. Hendersons, 4 Munf. 492.

Defective Verdict on Plea of "No Assets."—On the plea of "no assets" to an action of debt brought against the administrators of their intestate, a verdict which found that the administrator had in his hands assets belonging to the estate of his intestate, without saying of what amount, was held defective and a new trial directed. Eppes v. Smith, 4 Munf. 466.

Insufficient Verdict on Plea of Plene Administravit.—The defendant to an action of debt brought upon a bond given by the testator, pleaded a special plene administravit, and that he hath not, nor had any goods except to a certain value, which were not sufficient to satisfy the judgments mentioned in the plea. To this special plea a replication was filed that the defendant hath, and had goods more than sufficient to satisfy the said judgments, whereof he could have satisfied the plaintiff. The verdict was "for the debt in the declaration mentioned." This was insufficient; the verdict should have found that the defendant had goods more than sufficient to satisfy the judgments, whereof he could have satisfied the plaintiff, or the value of the assets, if they were not sufficient. Booth v. Armstrong, 2 Wash. 301.

An action of debt was brought against an administrator on a penal bill, said to have been executed by the testator in his lifetime. Among other pleas the defendant filed the plea of fully administered. The jury found a verdict "that the writing obligatory in the declaration mentioned, is the deed of the defendant's intestate; that the debt in the declaration mentioned hath not been paid, and that assets sufficient hath come to the hands of the administrator to pay the same: that he hath not fully administered the said assets." The court gave judgment for the amount of the penalty in the declaration mentioned. On appeal the court held that the verdict in this case was clearly insufficient in respect to the plea of fully administered. A verdict upon that plea should have ascertained the amount of the assets in the hands of the defendant at the commencement of the suit, and at the time of the plea pleaded, to enable the court to pronounce the proper judgment. It ought not only to have found the amount of assets in the hands of the defendants at the commencement of the suit or that they were sufficient to pay the plaintiff's demands; but also the amount in his hands at the time of pleading, or that they were sufficient to pay the plaintiff's demands; since the defendant might have received or duly disbursed assets between the commencement of the action and the time of pleading. The verdict should also have found the time when the assets came to the defendant's hands. For these reasons the judgment was reversed, the verdict set aside and a new trial awarded. Gardner v. Vidal, 6 Rand. 106.

VI. THE JUDGMENT.

A. WHEN SUFFICIENT.

Bond for Payment of Debt by Instalments.—A judgment to an action of debt on a bond, for the payment of a debt by instalments, should be, "for the debt in the declaration mentioned, to be discharged by the sum due at the time of the institution of the suit; reserving liberty to the plaintiff to resort to a scire facias to recover such other damages as might thereafter arise under the condition of the bond." Thatcher v. Taylor, 3 Munf. 249. See Code of Va. 1887, § 3504.

Judgment Beneficial to Defendant Will Not Be Reversed at His Instance.—A bond was given for making a title to a tract of land, and an action of debt was brought thereon. The defendant plead "covenants performed." Verdict and judgment were rendered for damages for non-performance, but said nothing of the penalty of the bond. Such judgment should not be reversed at the instance of the defendant, as such irregularity cannot be injurious to him, because the true ground of action appears by the declaration, and the satisfaction thereby demanded extending to the whole injury, the action can in no form be repeated. Pate v. Spotts, 6 Munf. 394.

Judgment on Bond Conditioned—Surplusage.—In an action of debt for rent, the verdict was for a certain sum, the debt in the declaration mentioned, and for a certain sum as damages. Judgment for the same to be discharged by the payment of a different sum. This latter sum is no part of the judgment, but is merely surplusage and is to be considered as a release of the difference. Ross v. Gill, 1 Wash. 87.

Against an Administrator—Estoppel.—If a judgment be rendered against an administrator for a debt of his intestate, and after his death, an action of debt, suggesting a devastavit to have been committed by him in his lifetime, be brought against his administrator, such defendant is estopped by the judgment from pleading that no assets of the estate of the original intestate ever came to the hands of the administrator. Eppes v. Smith, 4 Munf. 466.

Joint Judgment—Where One Made Default and Other Pleaded.—A joint promissory note was given by M and P. An action of debt was brought on this, and judgment by default was entered against M. P appeared and pleaded nil debet, and verdict was given against him. There should be given one and the same joint judgment against both. Peasley v. Boatwright, 2 Leigh 195.

On Note of Executor for Debt of Testator.—The executor of the intestate executed his note as executor for a debt of his testator. An action of debt was brought on this note, and he was declared against as executor. The count was in the debet and detinet, and the breach was laid in his failure to pay. Upon a judgment by default; Quære, If it should be de bonis testatoris or de bonis propriis. If it was error to enter judgment de bonis propriis, it was a clerical error, which should be amended on motion, and was no ground for an appeal. Snead v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 300, 56 Am. Dec. 112.

Judgment on Bond in Penalty and Condition in Same Sum.—The penalty and condition of a bond for the payment of money is in the same sum, and it is proper to treat it as a single bill. Proper judgment on such a bond in an action of debt is for the amount of the bond with interest from time of payment. Fleming v. Toler, 7 Gratt. 310.

Separate Judgments Separately Confessed.—The administratrix and other defendant gave separate confessions of judgment to an action of debt against them, where the suit had been revived against the administratrix. It was not error to enter separate judgments against each. Richardson v. Jones, 12 Gratt. 53.

Verdict for "Amount Named in Declaration"—Judgment Including Interest Valid.—The verdict in an action of debt on a protested inland bill of exchange was simply for "the amount of the debt in the declaration mentioned," which, as stated in the declaration, was "the sum of $1,102.60, with interest thereon from the 14th of October, 1890, until paid," and there was judgment accordingly, with costs. § 2853 of the Va. Code provides that in a case of this sort judgment may be given "for the principal and charges of protest, with interest thereon from the date of such protest." The legal effect of the verdict was a finding for the principal sum mentioned in the declaration, with interest, as therein claimed; so that the judgment is in conformity both with the verdict and the statute. Lake v. Tyree, 90 Va. 719, 19 S. E. Rep. 787.

It was held in Metcalfe v. Battaile, Gilmer 191, that a negotiable note as to the indorser, was not a note for the payment of money within the meaning of the Act of 1804, ch. 8, and that therefore neither interest, nor final judgment for the principal sum, could be given upon it in an action of debt without the intervention of a jury, as could have been done if it had come within that act, as was decided by the cases of Wallace v. Baker, 2 Munf. 334, and Baird v. Peter, 4 Munf. 76.

A judgment which has been entered upon nil dicit or non sum informatus, to an action of debt upon a bill penal, which omits to mention interest, ought not to be reversed because it was entered as in conformity with the bill penal, and was to be discharged by the payment of principal, with such interest and costs. Harper v. Smith, 6 Munf. 389.

Judgment Confessed for Interest on a Declaration Which Omitted It is Valid.—The declaration in debt against joint obligors on a single bill was in the usual form, but said nothing about interest. A common order was entered and confirmed against the obligors and their appearance bail. On motion of the appearance bail at the next term this was set aside and he pleaded payment; but he subsequently waived his plea and acknowledged the debt, with interest. Judgment was properly entered against the principal, as well as the bail. Wallace v. Baker, 2 Munf. 334. Decision was based on Act of 1805, and the case was distinguished from Brooke v. Gordon, 2 Call 212. Approved in Baird v. Peter, 4 Munf. 76.

On Injunction Bond with Condition.—The declaration in an action of debt brought upon an injunction bond demanded the aggregate of all the injunction bonds named, where there were several counts, and there were apparently several bonds. The bond was for $940, to be discharged by the payment of the damages assessed by the jury, the judgment was entered up in the old form for $940, the penalty of the bond to be discharged by the payment of $920.76, the damages assessed by the jury. The Code of W. Va., ch. 131, § 17, says that in such suits "judgment shall be entered up for what is so ascertained to be due by the jury." If this statute was regarded as requiring, not simply permitting, the judgment to be entered in this new form, the defendant would not be prejudiced by the old form, the judgment would not be reversed for such error, if any. Bank v. Fleshman, 23 W. Va. 317.

Penalty in Current Money, Condition in Sterling.—The penalty of a bond was in current money, with condition to pay so much sterling money. After verdict for the plaintiff in an action of debt upon the bond, the judgment should be for the current money mentioned in the penal part of the bond, to be discharged by the sterling money in the condition. Terrell v. Ladd, 2 Wash. 150.

Against a Convict—Process Served before Sentence.—The process to institute an action of debt was served upon the defendant on the day on which he was convicted of a felony, but before sentence was pronounced. The court under these circumstances fairly acquired jurisdiction of the cause and parties, which continued notwithstanding the subsequent disability of the defendant. The utmost that could have been exacted of the plaintiff was a suspension of all proceedings until the disability was removed, or the appointment of a committee to defend the suit for the convict. The plaintiff did not pursue either course, but prosecuted the suit to a judgment. If this be conceded to be an error, it was not such an error as would invalidate the judgment, for the reason that jurisdiction having been once properly acquired over the person and the subject matter of controversy, no error in its exercise or irregularity in the proceedings can make the judgment void. The authority to decide being once shown, it can never be divested by being improperly or erroneously employed. The fact that the judgment was by default does not affect this principle, for whether the judgment be the act of the court or be entered up by the clerk under the statute, the effect is the same. In either case it is the act of law and until reversed by the court which rendered it or by a superior tribunal, it imports absolute verity, and is as effectual and binding as if pronounced upon a trial of the merits. The judgment cannot be collaterally assailed in a court of equity or elsewhere, and is valid until reversed by the court which pronounced it or by a superior tribunal. Neale v. Utz, 75 Va. 480.

Judgment "When Assets."—Where an executor has confessed judgment in favor of the creditors of his intestate, "when assets" or "if assets," and an action of debt has been brought thereon, the executor pleaded plene administravit. The issue was found for the executor, but the plaintiff may take another judgment "when assets." Braxton v. Wood, 4 Gratt. 25.

Judgment Quando Acciderint—Statute of Limitations.—When a plaintiff in an action against an executor or administrator takes judgment of assets quando acciderint, it is well settled that he cannot at any future time proceed to execution on the judgment, without first suing out a scire facias to state that assets have come to hand, and to warn the defendant, should he be able to allege anything against such execution. These judgments are not barred by the statute, until the lapse of that period after assets have come in the hands of the executor or administrator, and not from the date of the judgment. Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

B. WHEN INSUFFICIENT.

Sheriff's Bond.—In an action of debt upon a sheriff's bond in the name of the commonwealth, for the benefit of a person aggrieved by the misconduct of the sheriff, the judgment should be entered for the penalty, to be discharged by the payment of the damages assessed and costs, "and such other damages as may be hereafter assessed upon suing out a scire facias, and assigning new breaches, by the said C or any other person or persons injured." It was error in the judgment, in attaching the recovery to C as to future injuries, excluding all others. Bibb v. Cauthorne, 1 Wash. 91.

Bond Subject to Credit—Writ of Inquiry.—A judgment ought not to be entered in an action of debt on a bond for a sum of money, "subject to a credit for a hogshead of tobacco," without ascertaining its value. The amount of such credit should, in the first place, be ascertained by a writ of inquiry, and judgment should be entered for the balance. Early v. Moore, 4 Munf. 262.

If the jury find a verdict for the amount mentioned in the declaration in an action of debt, and the plaintiff, in court, release so much thereof as is equal to the credits endorsed on the bond, judgment ought not to be rendered, to be discharged by the payment of the sum stated in the condition of the bond, subject to a deduction of the credits endorsed. Such deduction ought to be made, and judgment rendered for the real balance due. Grays v. Hines, 4 Munf. 437.

On Pleadings—No Bar.—A judgment for the defendant to an action of debt on a bond, which was given upon the pleadings, does not go to the foundation of the action, and is no bar to the plaintiff's bringing another action for the same cause. Lane v. Harrison, 6 Munf. 573.

Judgment upon All the Pleadings Erroneous, if They Do Not Go to Foundation of Action.—In an action of debt on the bond of a deputy sheriff, with a collateral condition, the defendant filed, among others, the plea of conditions performed. The plaintiff by replication to this plea charged the breach defectively, but fully avoided by other replications the other pleas of the defendant, which went to the foundation of the action, to which replication demurrers were improperly filed. A judgment entered for the defendant generally upon all the pleadings was erroneous, as it barred any future action on the bond. It should be limited to the replication of the plaintiff to the plea of conditions performed. Lane v. Harrison, 6 Munf. 573.

Judgment on Declaration Blank as to Sums, etc., Erroneous.—The assignee of the obligee brought suit against the obligor in a bond. The writ was in debt, and the declaration was also in debt, but was blank as to the sum declared for, the date of the bond, the assignment to the plaintiff, and as to the damage. A judgment entered thereon was held erroneous and reversed in Blane v. Sansum, 2 Call 495.

Office Judgment without Writ of Enquiry.—In an action of debt on a decree for money, a conditional judgment was entered in the office, without awarding a writ of enquiry of damages, and the judgment not being set aside, became final at the next term, and execution was sued out on the judgment. At the ensuing term the judgment was set aside as irregularly entered, and defendants were given leave to plead. It was held error to enter judgment in the office without awarding an enquiry of damages, that this was a clerical error, which was properly corrected at a subsequent term. Shelton v. Welsh, 7 Leigh 175.

Judgment for Interest Not Demanded in Declaration Invalid.—If the plaintiff does not demand interest in his declaration in debt on a promissory note, and the defendant waives his plea of payment, judgment cannot be given for the interest on the note, not claimed in the declaration. Brooke v. Gordon, 2 Call 212.

On Debt Due in Sterling Money.—On an action of debt brought upon a protested bill of exchange, drawn for sterling money, if the declaration is for the current money value of the sum for which the bill was drawn, the judgment, being for the sum so demanded, will be reversed on a writ of error. The suit should have been for the sterling money. Scott v. Call, 1 Wash. 115.

A sterling debt may be sued for without laying the value in current money; if it be laid it is merely surplusage, and will not vitiate; but in such case, the damages should be laid in sterling money; the verdict and judgment should be for sterling money, and the court is to fix the rate of exchange. Skipwith v. Baird, 2 Wash. 165.

Judgment Exceeds Penalty—Defendant Elects.—The judgment is always entered for the penalty, in an action of debt on a bond with collateral condition, to be discharged by the principal and interest, and if that exceed the penalty, the defendant has his election, and may satisfy it by paying the penalty. Atwell v. Towles, 1 Munf. 175.

No Breach Assigned on Administration Bond.—In a suit on an administration bond, if no breach of the condition of the bond be stated in the declaration, or by an assignment of breaches in some other part of the record, a judgment upon it is erroneous, and must be reversed. Ward v. Fairfax, 4 Munf. 494.

128 Raines v. Barker & als.

[67 Am. Dec. 762.]

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

1. Will Made Prior to Code 1849—Law Controlling.—Testator made his will in 1842, purchased a tract of land in 1849, and died in 1852. His will, in respect to this land, is to be construed as the law was prior to the Code of 1849.
2. Wills—After-Acquired Lands—Statutes—Construction of.—The construction given to the act of 1785 authorizing the devise of after-acquired lands, in the case of Allen v. Harrison, 3 Call 289, adhered to.
3. Wills—Case at Bar.—Testator by his will made in 1842 emancipates his slaves; and directs his executor to sell the land on which he lives and another tract which he specifies, and also certain stocks which he names, all his household and kitchen furniture, all his stocks of all kind, plantation tools, with every article of property belonging to him, except his wearing apparel; and after directing that when there is money enough collected from the proceeds of the sale, the negroes shall be sent to Africa and furnished plentifully with every thing necessary for their comfort, he gives five hundred dollars to a nephew, and the balance of his estate, after paying all expenses, he wished to go to furnish the expense of carrying the negroes away and furnishing them in a situation to live. A tract of land purchased after making the will, does not pass under the devise.

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of Sussex county, by Alexander Barker and others, nephews and heirs at law of John Barker deceased, against Nathaniel Raines. The object of the action was to recover a tract of land of which John Barker had died seized, and which, since his death, had been sold by his executor, John R. Mason, to the defendant Raines; and the only question was, whether it passed under the testator's will; it having been purchased by him after the making of the will.

On the trial the jury found a special verdict, in which, in addition to the facts above stated, they set out the will of Barker. By his will he emancipated
129 *his slaves. Another clause is as follows: "My will and desire is, that my executor sell the land whereon I now reside, after having it surveyed and divided into two or more parts, as he may think best; also a tract of land in Surry, known by the name of the Indian Island, on the north side of Black water swamp, and containing, I think, one hundred and sixty-three acres; also ten shares in the Merchants cotton factory, in the town of Petersburg, and two shares in the Petersburg and Roanoke rail road company, with all my household and kitchen furniture, all my stocks of all kind, plantation tools and implements, with every article of property belonging to me, except the wearing apparel that may be in the house at the time of my death; that I wish divided among the servants belonging to the estate."

He then directs that the people may be continued on the plantation until the money from the sale can be collected. And when

Wills—After-Acquired Lands—Statutes—Construction of.—For the proposition that a testator may devise after-acquired lands under Virginia statute of 1785, but not unless an intent to do so appears from the language of his will, the principal case is cited and followed in Gibson v. Carrell, 13 Gratt. 136.

there is money enough collected to purchase what may be necessary to fit them out for the trip, and to pay their passage there, he directs his executor to send them to Africa, after furnishing them plentifully with every thing which is necessary for their comfort and convenience. He then gives to his nephew John Barker, jr., five hundred dollars; and "the balance of" his "estate, after paying all expenses," he wished "to go to furnish the expense of carrying them away, and furnish them in a situation to live."

The jury further found that the will was altogether in the handwriting of the testator, and that the name of Henry E. Scott was originally written in the will as the executor; and that subsequently, as was indicated by the appearance of the paper and the color of the ink, that name had been erased and that of John R. Mason inserted. That the testator was on terms of great intimacy and friendship with Scott 130 up to the *time of Scott's death in 1847. That the will was made on the 15th of October 1842; and the land in controversy, about two hundred acres, was purchased in March 1849; and after the death of Barker, in January 1852, had been sold by his executor to the defendant Raines.

Upon this special verdict the court gave a judgment for the plaintiffs; and Raines obtained a supersedeas from this court.

Collier, for the appellant, endeavored to maintain that the land passed under the will, upon the evident intention that his emancipated slaves should have the whole estate except the legacy of five hundred dollars to John Barker, jr.; and upon the language of the last clause, which he insisted authorized the executor to sell the lands acquired after the date of the will.

D. May, for the appellees, after referring to the date of the will and the 22d section of ch. 122 of the Code, p. 517, to show that this will was to be construed by the law existing prior to the Code; to show that the land did not pass under the will, referred to Smith v. Edrington, 8 Cranch's R. 66; Allen v. Harrison, 3 Call 289; Kendall v. Kendall, 5 Munf. 272; Lomax on Ex'ors 2.

DANIEL, J. By the eleventh section of chapter one hundred and twenty-two of the Code of 1849, it is declared that a will shall be construed, with reference to real estate and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will. And as the will, on the construction of which the right to the land in controversy depends, was admitted to probate in 1852, some question might 131 have arisen as *to whether we should apply to the will the rules prevailing at its date, (1842,) or the statutory rule just cited, were it not for the provisions of the 22d section of the same chapter (122) declaring that the preceding sections of the hapter shall not extend to any will made before the act should be in force, but that the validity and effect of such will shall be determined by the laws in force on the day before this chapter should take effect in like manner as if those laws, so far as they relate to the subject, were therein enacted in place of such sections.

The English rule, that as to lands the testator speaks at the date of his will, and as to personals, at his death, had not been subjected here, prior to the adoption of the Code, to any legislative change other than that made by the act of 1785. That act directs, "that every person, &c., shall have power, &c., to devise all the estate, &c., which he hath, or at the time of his death shall have, of in, or to lands, &c." In the case of Allen v. Harrison, 3 Call 289, the extent of the change, in the old rule, contemplated by that act, was the subject of a very full examination; and the court were unanimous in the opinion that the act only gave a power to devise after acquired lands, leaving it to the discretion of the testator to dispose of them or not: That in order to produce that effect, there should be something indicating an intention to exercise the power; and that where there was nothing in the language of the will to show that the testator evidently contemplated a disposition of his after acquired lands, a devise of his lands should be held to refer to the lands owned by him at the date of his will. The same interpretation of the act must have also prevailed in the case of Bagwell v. Elliott, 2 Rand. 190; and was fully recognized by the Supreme court of the United States in the case of Smith v. Edrington, 8 Cranch's R. 66.

132 *It is true that in several of our sister states, where statutes have been enacted similar in their provisions to our act of 1785, a strong disposition has been manifested so to construe those statutes as to assimilate much more closely the rule in question to the rule which applies to wills of personals. Thus, in the case of Loveren v. Lamprey, 2 Foster's R. 434, (New Hamp.) where the words of the bequest on which the case turned were, "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife Ruth Loveren all the residue and remainder of my estate wherever it may be found, to her, and her heirs and assigns, &c.," it was held that it was the intention of the testator to pass to his wife all his property owned by him at the time of his decease, after paying his debts, &c., and that the premises in controversy, purchased by the testator after the making of his will, passed by it. So in the case of Cushing v. Aylwyn, 12 Metc. R. 169, like views prevailed, and the court announced the broad proposition that where a will purports to dispose of the testator's whole estate or property, the intention is to dispose of all the estate or property of which the testator may be the owner at the time of his death; and that such intent would be inferred unless something in the will should be opposed to such an inference. And so again a similar decision was made in the case of Willis v. Watson, 4 Scam. R. 64. In the state of Kentucky, however, where our act of 1785 has been adopted, the interpretation of the act given in the case of Allen v. Harrison has been closely adhered to. Warner's ex'ors v. Swearingen & wife, 6 Dana's R. 196; Ross v. Ross, 12 B. Monr. R. 437. In the first of these cases, the reasons for the adoption of this interpretation of the act are fully and clearly stated, and the main argument in favor of the competing construction successfully met. That argument was, that the English doctrine declaring that as to land or other real or im-133 movable *estate, a testator speaks at the date of his will, was founded mainly on the terms of the statute of wills of Henry 8, empowering all persons having legal titles to lands held in free and common socage, to dispose of such lands by will, and all persons having such titles to lands held in chivalry, to dispose of two-thirds thereof by will, &c.; and that as now by the act of 1785 a testator has a power to dispose not only of the lands which he hath, but also those which at his death he shall have, there was no longer any sufficient legal reason left for intending that in a general devise of his lands a testator speaks only of the lands which he has at the date of his will. The chief justice (Robertson) in delivering his opinion in Warner's ex'ors v. Swearingen & wife, fully meets this view, by showing, from the English cases, that "the civil law rule of making a testator speak at his death and not at the date of his will, not only was never applied to immovable property, but never would have been applied to land or any interest therein, even had a prospective freehold, as well as leasehold interest therein, been always devisable in England; for it seems (he proceeds) not to have been applied to general bequests of chattel interests in land, even though a testator might always in England have effectually bequeathed such interest afterward to be acquired by him. And the principal reasons of this exception from the rule of the civil law are, first, that such an arbitrary rule of construction frequently operates inconsistently with a testator's intentions; and secondly, that as even a chattel interest in land is not so mutable or fugative, either in itself or in the proprietorship of it, as that kind of property which is perishable, and in fact movable, neither policy nor convenience required that a general bequest of it should be construed as speaking at the testator's death, when, in most cases, he intended to speak only when he pub-134 lished his will." And he came *to the conclusion that under the operation of the act of 1785 the true doctrine was, "As to a general devise of lands, like that of England respecting the like testamentary dispositions of leasehold interests in land: that is, that prima facie the testator contemplated only such interests as he owned when he published his will. But that if he manifested an intention to devise whatever interests he might own at his death, then and then only his will should be understood as speaking at his death as to land as well as any other property; because then and only then such is made to appear to have been, in fact, his will, and here he has a legal right to effectuate such a will." And the court accordingly held that a devise by the testator of "the residue of his estate" did not pass lands acquired by him subsequently to the date of his will.

Though it be conceded, therefore, (as I believe it must,) that in a majority of the states whose statutes of wills are, in the particular in question, like our act of 1785, the decisions have gone far towards abolishing the old English rule, and though now, by statute, in England, (1 Vict. ch. 26,) as well as here, a devise of lands, like a bequest of personals, is made to speak as if executed immediately before the death of the testator; Yet as the authority of Allen v. Harrison has not, (so far as I have seen,) been ever questioned, but, on the contrary, stands supported by the decisions of a sister state, where our act of 1785 has been, in terms, adopted, I feel no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the will in this case must be interpreted under the rule which holds the testator, no contrary intention appearing, as speaking in respect to his lands at the date of the will.

Applying to the will this test, I have been unable to discover, in its terms, any thing to raise a serious doubt as to the propriety of the interpretation which the Circuit court has given to it. The 135 words "every *article of property belonging to me," were used, no doubt, as suggested by the counsel of the appellees, to carry any article of personal property which the testator supposed might, perchance, be held not to be embraced in the description immediately preceding, of "household and kitchen furniture, stocks, plantation tools and implements." And the words "the balance of my estate," if held as intended to embrace lands at all, must, under the requirements of the rule by which the construction of the will is governed, be referred to the balance of the testator's lands which he owned at the date of his will.

It does not seem to me that the fact that the testator, subsequently at the date of his will, erased the name of Henry E. Scott, and substituted that of John R. Mason, as his executor, is of any value in the controversy. The date of this alteration is not fixed by the verdict; it is only found to be "subsequent to the original writing of the will." And as the verdict finds that the testator was on terms of intimacy with Scott up to the time of his (Scott's) death, which occurred in February 1847, the probability is that the change was made soon after Scott's death, and before either the adoption of the Code or the purchase of the land, which occurred in March 1849.

136 *Gibson v. Carrell & als.

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

Wills—After-Acquired Land—Case at Bar.—Testatrix by her will made in 1837 when she possessed no real estate, gave two slaves to her daughter M and six to her son S, and then says, "All the balance of my property of every description, real and personal, I give and bequeath to my son S;" but if her daughter had a child or children, three of the slaves given to S should go to them. Land afterwards acquired by the testatrix does not pass by the devise to S.

This was a bill in the Circuit court of Jefferson county, by Eli H. Carrell and Margaret his wife against Samuel Gibson and others. And the only question was, whether certain real estate of which Margaret Gibson died seized, passed by her will to Samuel Gibson, or descended to her heirs, of whom Samuel Gibson and the female plaintiff were two. The will was made in October 1873, when the testatrix was possessed of no real estate. After giving two slaves to her daughter Margaret Carrell, and six to her son Samuel Gibson, she says, "All the balance of my property of every sort or description, real or personal, I give and bequeath to my said son Samuel Gibson, and his legal representatives, except that in case my said daughter should have child or children, then, and in that case, Irena, William John and Mary Jane, (three slaves she had before given to Samuel,) shall be the property of said child or children, and his, her or their legal representatives; but if no child or children should be born unto my said daughter, then the said Irena, William John and Mary Jane are to be the property of my said son.

After the making of her will, Mrs. Gibson acquired, by purchase, the real 137 estate which was the subject of *this controversy, and died in 1845, when her will was duly admitted to probat.

On the hearing of the cause, the Circuit court held that the land did not pass under the will; and made a decree for the partition thereof among the heirs of Margaret Gibson; whereupon Samuel Gibson applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

J. M. Mason; for the appellant.
There was no counsel for the appellees.

DANIEL, J. It seems to me that this case must be governed by the rules and principles declared in Raines v. Barker, just decided by this court. There is nothing in the language of the will from which to infer an intention on the part of the testatrix to dispose of lands to be acquired after the date of her will. It is proved, however, that the testatrix owned no lands or real estate at the date of her will, and as by a residuary clause she gives the balance of her property "of every sort or description, real or personal," to the appellant, it is argued that the testatrix must have contemplated the future acquisition of real estate, and intended it should pass by this clause, as otherwise the word "real" is left without meaning, and superfluous: and that the court ought not to presume that the testatrix used a word of such important meaning without a purpose. The argument is not without show of force; Yet when we see that the testatrix has used no language referring in terms to any land she might thereafter acquire, but on the contrary, in the commencement of the will, declares her purpose simply of disposing of what worldly effects she then owned, and that she was ignorant and illiterate, and consequently not apt to assign exact meaning and value to the language she might 138 use, it seems *that there is no such manifestation of the purpose of the testatrix to dispose of after acquired lands, as would justify us in making this case an exception to the general rule.

I am for affirming the decree.

139 *Davis v. The Commonwealth for Leon.

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

1. Attachment Bonds—Who Can Sue upon.—The bond authorized by the act, Code, ch. 151, § 8, p. 602, in relation to attachments, is not a general indemnifying bond; but where the attachment issues against the effects of the defendant generally, he alone can sue upon the bond; and where the attachment is issued against specific property, only the defendant or the owner of such specific property can sue upon the bond.*

*Attachment Bonds—Who Can Sue upon.—The principal case is cited and approved in Offterdinger v. Ford, 92 Va. 649, 24 S. E. Rep. 246; Mitchell v. Chancellor, 14 W. Va. 29, as to the damages covered by an attachment bond.

In Holliday v. Myers, 11 W. Va. 288, 290, the doctrine laid down in the principal case is approved, but distinguished from the case at bar.

*Code, ch. 151, § 8, p. 602. "But if the plaintiff shall, at the time of suing out such attachment, or afterwards, give bond with security approved by the clerk or justice issuing the attachment, in a penalty of at least double the amount of the claim sworn to or sued for, with condition to pay all costs and damages which may be awarded against him or sustained by any person, by reason of his suing out the attachment, the said officer shall take possession of the property specified in the attachment, or where no such property is specified, of any estate or effects of the defendant, or so much thereof as is sufficient to pay the plaintiff's claim. When such bond is given." &c.

2. Same—Same.—When the attachment is issued against the effects of the defendant generally, and is levied upon the property of a third person, such third person has no remedy upon the attachment bond.

This was an action of debt in the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, in which the Commonwealth for the benefit of Israel Leon, was plaintiff, and William F. Davis was defendant. The action was founded on a bond executed under the attachment law found in the Code, ch. 151, § 8, p. 602, by Charles R. Hawes as principal, and Davis as his surety, upon an attachment issued against the effects of C. D. Arnsthall, a debtor of Hawes. Upon the trial of the cause various questions were made and exceptions taken by the defendant Davis to the decisions of the court; and there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for the penalty of the bond to be discharged by the payment 140 *of nine hundred and twenty-seven dollars. From this judgment Davis obtained a supersedeas from this court. The only question decided by this court, was as to the right of the relator Leon to maintain an action on the bond; and upon that question the facts are stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion.

A. Johnston and Morson, for the appellant.

Randolph and Lyons, for the appellee.

MONCURE, J. This is a supersedeas to a judgment obtained in the name of the Commonwealth of Virginia, suing for the benefit and at the cost of Israel Leon, against William F. Davis, surety of Charles R. Hawes in an attachment bond executed in pursuance of the Code, p. 602, ch. 151, § 8. The case was twice argued in this court; and many questions were discussed in the argument. But in my view of the case it will be necessary to consider and decide only one of them; which is, Whether the relator Leon can maintain an action on the attachment bond?

The condition of the bond is set out in the declaration as follows: "That whereas the said Charles R. Hawes, plaintiff in a certain suit instituted in the Circuit court of the city of Richmond against C. D. Arnsthall, defendant, did, upon the affidavit of him the said plaintiff, filed in the clerk's office of the said court, obtain from the clerk of the said court an attachment against the estate of the said C. D. Arnsthall for the sum of two thousand and forty-five dollars claimed by the said plaintiff. Therefore, if the said Charles R. Hawes should pay all costs and damages which might be awarded against him, or sustained by any persons by reason of his suing out the said attachment, then the said obligation was to be void; otherwise to remain in full force."

It is then averred in the declaration
141 that the said *Hawes, as plaintiff in the said suit against Arnsthall, did thereupon sue out an attachment against the estate of the said Arnsthall, and did cause the same to be levied upon a large quantity of cigars, the property of the said Leon, the said Hawes pretending that the said cigars were the property of the said Arnsthall.

And it is then further averred that the said cigars were not the property of the said Arnsthall, but were the property of the said Leon, and that the said Leon had sustained great damage by the suing out of the said attachment, to wit, to the value of four thousand and ninety dollars.

Thus it appears that the attachment was against the defendant's estate generally; and not against specific property. And the question resolves itself simply into this, Whether, if such an attachment be levied on the property of a stranger, he can maintain an action therefor on the attachment bond?

The attachment was not levied by a seizure of the property, but by a service of a copy of the attachment on the persons in whose hands the property was, who were summoned to appear as garnishees. And it was contended, on the one hand, by the counsel of the plaintiff in error, that the bond is of no force or effect if there be no seizure of property under the attachment; and, on the other, by the counsel of the defendant in error, that the obligors in the bond are bound for all damages sustained by reason of suing out the attachment, whether it be levied in the one way or the other. Without expressing any opinion on this point, I will consider the question as if the attachment had been levied by a seizure of the property: which will present the case as strongly as possible for the defendant in error.

Then the question recurs, Can a stranger, whose property is taken under an at-142 tachment against the *defendant's estate, maintain an action therefor on the attachment bond? I am of opinion that he cannot. Generally, a sheriff is bound to execute, according to its mandate, a writ which comes to his hands for execution from a lawful source; and he may therefore justify any act done by him in pursuance of the writ. But he can justify no act which the writ does not authorize, though it be done under color of the writ. Such an act is a trespass, for which he is liable like any other trespasser. If, therefore, he arrest the body of A under a writ against the body of B, or take the goods of A under a writ against the goods of B, he is guilty of a trespass. The plaintiff in the writ will also be involved in the trespass if he direct the act to be done; but not merely by reason of his suing out the writ. Generally, the plaintiff is not liable for any thing done in pursuance of the writ, unless it be sued out maliciously and without probable cause.

These were universal rules at common law; but they have been modified to some extent by statute; and are therefore now stated as general rules. For instance, in regard to the liability of the sheriff for levying an execution or warrant of distress on property, as to which a doubt may arise, whether it is liable to such levy; the statute authorizes him to require of the plaintiff an indemnifying bond; which, if given, will protect the sheriff against any action for the seizure or sale of the property, provided the security in the bond be good at the time of taking it. Code, p. 609, ch. 152, § 4, 5 and 6. And, in regard to the liability to the plaintiff for acts done in pursuance of the writ; the statute requires the plaintiff in an attachment, if he wishes the officer to take possession of the property against which the attachment issues, to give bond with security conditioned to pay all costs and damages which may be awarded against him or sustained by any person by 143 reason of his suing *out the attachment. Id. p. 602, ch. 151, § 8. If he does not wish the officer to take possession of the property, but is content with a mere lien upon it, he is not required to give any bond, and his liability remains as at common law: that is, he is not liable for damages arising from suing out the writ, unless it be sued out maliciously and without probable cause.

The statute in regard to indemnifying bonds does not embrace attachments; but is confined to executions and distress warrants. Why the legislature did not extend it to attachments may not be an easy question to answer. The most that can be said of it is, that it is a casus omissus in legislation: but a casus omissus of which the sheriff may have cause to complain, but not the adverse claimant of the property. The indemnifying bond law was made for the ease of the officer; and exonerates him, to a certain extent, from his common law liability in case of illegal seizures, and from the measures previously necessary to be resorted to, to ascertain the title to the property. But if the bond be not duly required by him, his common law liability is supposed to continue. See Stone v. Pointer, 5 Munf. 290; and Roane, J., in Cole v. Fenwick, 1 Gilm. 134. At first, the law only embraced executions, and did not protect the officer, if the obligors in the bond, though solvent when taken, should thereafter become insolvent. Afterwards, it was extended to distress warrants; and made to protect the officer, if the surety in the bond was good at the time of taking it. It has not yet, as we have seen, been extended to attachments. The adverse claimant of property seized under an attachment has ample remedies, without giving him the benefit of an indemnifying bond. Besides his summary remedy by interpleader, which is generally sufficient, he may resort for his indemnity to an action of trespass against the sheriff who makes the levy and all persons who aid in 144 *making it or direct it to be made; or to an action of debt on the official bond of the sheriff. There can be no reason, then, so far, at least, as he is concerned, for extending the law to attachments.

But it may be said that it is necessary for the protection of the officer making the levy. And it was contended by the counsel for the defendant in error that there is as much reason for requiring an indemnifying bond in the case of an attachment, as in the case of an execution or a warrant of distress; and that the legislature, having expressly provided for such a bond in the two latter cases, would have made a similar provision in the former, if it had not intended the attachment bond to effect the same object. If they had intended to extend the provisions of the indemnifying bond law to the case of attachments, they would have done so expressly, and not by obscure implication. To give the attachment bond such an effect as this would be to convert it into a general indemnifying bond, applying to all property which might thereafter be taken under color of the attachment: which would be very unreasonable. In the case of executions and distress warrants, the officer can require an indemnifying bond, only when a doubt arises whether property is liable to be levied on. And the plaintiff, when so required, can give it or not, at his discretion. But in the case of attachments, on the construction contended for, the officer might, of his own mere motion, and without the knowledge of the plaintiff, seize property plainly not liable to the attachment, and thereby render the obligors in the attachment bond liable for all damages arising from such seizure.

But the law which provides for the execution of that bond will, I think, admit of no such construction. It was enacted diverso intuitu. It was not made for the ease of the officer, and to indemnify him against the consequences of his unauthorized 145 act; but was made *for the benefit of the owner of the property against which the attachment issues, and to indemnify him against the consequence of acts which are authorized by the attachment. The indemnifying bond applies to acts outside of the writ; the attachment bond to acts inside of it, or done in pursuance thereof. These latter acts the officer is bound to perform; and they cannot be lawfully resisted, no matter what damage they may inflict. The common law liability of a plaintiff for damages arising from the suit, was not considered by the legislature sufficient indemnity against the consequences of a wrongful seizure of property in pursuance of an attachment. The execution of an attachment bond with security has, therefore, been required.

That this is the true construction of the attachment law is obvious, both from the terms of the law itself, and the circumstances under which it was enacted. As to the terms of the law; the condition of the bond as therein prescribed has already been set forth. It covers no damages for taking property which the attachment does not command to be taken. Such damages are not sustained by reason of suing out the attachment; but are sustained by reason of an unauthorized act of the officer. The undertaking of the obligors is, that the attachment is properly sued out, and the claim of the plaintiff well founded. They do not undertake that the officer will commit no trespass in its execution. They do not authorize him to levy it on any property which he may think proper, or the plaintiff may direct him to levy it on. A person may be willing to become security in an attachment bond, knowing the debt to be due, and that the debtor is a nonresident or absconding debtor, but very unwilling to become security that the officer will do no wrongful acts under color of the attachment. The bond was not intended to enlarge the attachment, but to run on all fours with it.

The attachment may be against the 146 *defendant's estate, or against specific property. If it be against the defendant's estate, the bond applies only to that estate, and enures to the benefit of the defendant only. If it be against specific property, the bond applies to the owner of that property, whoever he may be, whether the defendant or any other person, and enures only to the benefit of such owner. The attachment may be against specific property when the suit is to recover such property, (Code, p. 601, § 2,) or in certain cases, when it is against the commander or owner of any steamboat or other vessel, or the owner of any raft or river craft navigating the Ohio river or any of its tributaries within the jurisdiction of this state. (Id. p. 602, § 5.) The law prescribes but one form of attachment bond, and therefore prescribes such form as will suit both cases, as well an attachment against specific property, as an attachment against the defendant's estate generally. If the latter had been the only kind of attachment to be provided for, the bond might have been made payable to the defendant, and conditioned only for his indemnity. But it being necessary to provide for both kinds, the bond is required to be in such form as will apply to both or either. The defendant is the only person who can sustain any damage by reason of suing out an attachment against his estate; but others may sustain damage by reason of suing out an attachment against specific property. In providing for the execution of a bond conditioned to pay all damages sustained by any person by reason of suing out the attachment, both cases are provided for. If the plaintiff shall give the bond, the officer is required to "take possession of the property specified in the attachment, or when no such property is specified, of any estate or effects of the defendant, or so much thereof as is sufficient to pay the plaintiff's claim:" in other words, of the property against which the attachment issues, and no other.

147 *Id. § 8. By giving the bond he acquires a right to have that property taken; but that only. If no bond be given; and perhaps whether a bond be given or not, he may, in writing, designate to the officer the names of persons to be summoned as garnishees. Sections 7 and 9. But this summons applies to no specific or particular estate; but only the estate generally of the defendant in the hands of the garnishees; and not to the estate of any other person in their hands. The garnishees are not authorized, by reason of the summons, to detain the estate of any other person in their hands. And therefore no other person can have any cause of action on the attachment bond for damages arising from the detention of property in the hands of garnishees. Whether the defendant can have such cause of action, is a question which it is unnecessary to decide.

As to the circumstances under which the law was enacted. Until recently, an attachment could only be issued against the estate of the defendant generally, and not against specific property. 1 Rev. Code, p. 476, § 6. The bond provided for by that section was required to be payable to the defendant; and to be conditioned for satisfying all costs which should be awarded to the defendant in case the plaintiff should be cast in his suit, and also all damages which should be recovered against the plaintiff for his suing out the attachment. There can be no doubt but that that bond enured only to the benefit of the defendant; and could not be resorted to for the indemnity of a person on whose property the officer had unlawfully levied the attachment. The damages were recoverable against the plaintiff, only "for his suing out the attachment;" and of course not for a trespass committed by the officer in levying it contrary to the mandate of the writ. This manifest construction was not altered by the words of the statute giving a right

148 of action *on the bond to "the party entitled to such costs or damages," who could only be the defendant in the attachment or his representatives. By the act of February 24, 1827, Supp. R. C. p. 239, ch. 182, § 1, an attachment was, I believe, for the first time given against specific property. It authorized an attachmnet to be issued against a ship, steamboat or other vessel, &c., under the circumstances therein mentioned. But provided that no such attachment should issue until bond should be given, payable to the person against whom the suit was brought, conditioned to indemnify the obligee in such bond, and the owner of such ship, steamboat or other vessel against any loss which they or either of them might sustain by reason of such attachment, in case the defendant should prevail in the suit. Here we see that the bond was properly adapted to this new case, and made to provide for the indemnity, not only of the defendant, but of the owner of the property attached, who might be a different person from the defendant. It was still, however, made payable to the defendant, the plan of requiring such bonds to be payable to the commonwealth not having then been devised. This bond, certainly, did not enure to the benefit of any other person than the defendant or the owner of the property against which the attachment issued; for it was, by its terms, expressly confined to them. By the act of March 4, 1846, Sess.

Digitized by Google

Acts, p. 73, ch. 105, an attachment was given against specific property in another case. It authorized an attachment to be issued against a steamboat, raft, or other water craft navigating the Ohio river or any of its tributaries within the jurisdiction of this state, under the circumstances therein mentioned. No bond was required by that act. But it provided, (§ 7,) that if any attachment should be sued out by virtue of the act without reasonable or proper cause, the person suing it out should be liable to the owner of the property
149 *attached for any damage sustained by reason of the seizure and detention thereof; and such owner, if he appeared to the suit, might file a special plea therein, alleging that such attachment was sued out without reasonable or proper cause, and the damages sustained by reason thereof; and if, upon the trial, the jury should find that such attachment was in fact sued out without reasonable or proper cause, such jury should assess the damages sustained by reason thereof, and judgment should be entered in favor of the party injured. These acts, giving the right of attachment against specific property, were substantially incorporated in the Code: And there was also incorporated therein a new and important right of attachment against specific property, where the suit is to recover such property: in other words, in an action of detinue. This new provision was a consequence of the abolition, by the Code, of the right to require bail. Revisor's Report, p. 838. In providing for the execution of an attachment bond to suit all the cases in which it was necessary, as well the ordinary case of a general attachment against the defendant's estate, as the cases of specific attachment before mentioned, terms were used which would suit all of them: and conditions which had been prescribed for general and specific attachments respectively by former laws, were substantially embodied into one form of condition in the Code. It was obviously not designed by the legislature to make any material change in the condition of the bond. All these bonds, as well those prescribed by former laws as that prescribed by the Code, have substantially the same condition, mutatis mutandis. The words "for suing out such attachment," in the bond, prescribed by 1 Rev. Code 477, § 7; the words "by reason of such attachment," in that prescribed by the act of February 24, 1827, Supp. R. C. p. 240, § 1, and the words "by reason of his 150 suing out of the attachment," *in the Code, p. 602, § 8, are the same in meaning and effect; and all alike apply only to damages which legitimately result from the execution of the writ in pursuance of its mandate. The revisors plainly showed that they intended to propose no change in this respect, not only by their using substantially the same language that was used in the old law, but by their taking no notice of any such intention, as they certainly would have done if they had contemplated so important a change. The changes which they did intend to propose are stated and explained at length in a note to their report, p. 756. Their chief object was to produce uniformity in the attachment laws; and among other things, in regard to attachment bonds, which had been required in some and not in other laws, without any apparent reason for the difference. They accordingly proposed to make the laws "more harmonious and consistent, by requiring security when the plaintiff thinks it necessary for his safety that the property should be taken by the officer, but to require none for any attachment when he is content with the lien on the property in the hands of home defendants." Id. p. 757–58. Security for what? For the same thing, in substance, for which security had been required by some, but not by other of the former laws. The legislature adopted this recommendation of the revisors.

It is believed that while attachment laws exist in most, if not all, of the other states of the Union, the plaintiff has, in none of them, been required to give an attachment bond in such form as to provide for indemnity against the unlawful acts of the officer under the writ. Much less has it, in any of them, been held, that a bond conditioned, in the ordinary form, for indemnity against damage sustained "by reason of suing out the attachment," or the like, has the effect of a bond of indemnity against such unlawful acts.

I have now fully expressed my views
151 of the principles *which, in my opinion, must govern this case. I would not have felt justified in saying so much, had I not thought that the novelty and importance of the question considered, and the extent and ability of the argument of counsel, required me to do so. It now only remains to apply these principles to the case; which can be done in very few words. The attachment in this case was against the defendant's estate generally. The bond strictly conformed to the directions of the Code. An action can be sustained upon it, according to what I have said, only at the relation of the defendant in the attachment. This action was brought at the relation, not of the defendant, but of a stranger, and for a cause not within the terms of the bond. The defect is not in the form, but in the foundation of the action: and is no more cured by the Code, ch. 181, § 3, than it would have been by the statute of jeofails, 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 128, § 103. It follows, on the authority of Ross v. Milne & wife, 12 Leigh 204, and Boyle's adm'r v. Overby, 11 Gratt. 202, that the judgment of the Circuit court must be reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff in error, non obstante veredicto.

ALLEN, P., and DANIEL and LEE, Js., concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

SAMUELS, J., dissented.

152 *Baylor's Lessee v. Dejarnette.

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

Wills—Case at Bar.—A dies indebted to K, and by his will gives large estates to his three sons B, C and D, and directs that B shall pay one-half of his debts, and that C and D shall each pay one-fourth. B qualifies as executor of C and dies, and by his will gives an estate to E for life, and at his death to the eldest son of E living at his death, E not having a son at the death of B. K had sued B in equity to recover his debt, and after B's death and before E had a son, the suit is revived against the executor of B and against E, and after the birth of E's son there is a decree for a sale of a part of the land devised by B for the payment of B's half and C's fourth of the debt, and the land is sold and conveyed to the purchaser, the son of E not being a party to the suit. On the death of E his son brings ejectment to recover the land sold, against a party claiming under the purchaser under the decree. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Contingent Remainder.—The son of E took a contingent remainder in fee in the estate devised by B, dependent upon his being alive at the death of E.

2. Chancery Practice—Virtual Representation.—The son of E not having been in being when the suit was revived against E, and having no certain interest in the estate, was not a necessary party, but is concluded by the decree against E, the tenant for life.

3. Same—Devise of Lands for Payment of Debts—Effect on Statute of Limitations.†—The debt due to K not having been barred at the death of A, his will created a charge upon the lands devised to his three sons B, C and D, for the payment of his debts in the proportions named therein; and this charge would prevent the bar of the statute of limitations as to the real estate taken by the sons under the devise to them.

4. Same—Same—Acceptance of Devises—Effect.—By accepting the devises the devisees became personally liable in respect to the subject devised to them respectively, each for his share of the debts; and the creditors were under no obligation to look to the general estate of A before asserting their claims against the devisees and the subject devised.

5. Same—Same—Case at Bar.—B having received assets as executor of C and having executed a bond as executor, C's fourth of the debts of A were charged upon the real estate of B (if not otherwise) by his executorial bond.

153 *6. Same—Collateral Attack of Decree.‡—But if the decree was erroneous in this respect, or if it was conclusive as between the creditor and E, these subjects cannot be examined into in this collateral proceeding, but the decree is conclusive in this cause, upon the matters thereby adjudicated, and has the effect to devest the title out of E and his son claiming in remainder after him.

7. Same—Record in Chancery Cause—Muniment of Title.§—The record in the chancery cause is legal evidence for the defendant as a link in his chain of title, though the plaintiff was not a party to the cause.

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of Caroline county by the lessee of John N. Baylor against Daniel Dejarnette in his lifetime, and on his death revived against his devisee John H. Dejarnette. The matters in controversy were submitted to the court on a case agreed, in which it was agreed that the court in giving judgment upon the case should be at liberty to draw all fair inferences which a jury might draw from the statement of facts and evidence; and a record and deed were made a part of the case to which the plaintiff excepted, and his exceptions were to be considered as a part of the case submitted to the court. The following are the material facts in the case:

John Baylor 1st, of New Market in the county of Caroline, died previous to the 14th of May 1772. By his will he gave to his son John Baylor 2d, his New Market estate as well as other property. He also gave a large property to his sons George and Robert; and after providing a fund for the payment of debts, which proved inadequate, he directed that the balance of his debts not satisfied out of the fund should be paid one-half by his son John 2d, and one-fourth each by George and Robert. John Baylor 2d and John Armistead the son in law of the testator, were appointed executors of the will, and

*Chancery Practice—Virtual Representation.—For the proposition that, upon the principle of virtual representation, it is in general unnecessary to make parties of persons entitled to a remainder, such as an estate tail, coming after the first estate of inheritance, and yet such parties are bound by the decree, the principal case is cited and followed in the following cases: Faulkner v. Davis, 18 Gratt. 689; Harrison v. Wallton, 95 Va. 725, 30 S. E. Rep. 372; Gray v. Smith, 76 Fed. Rep. 532, and cases cited. Hawthorne v. Beckwith, 89 Va. 790, 17 S. E. Rep. 241; McArthur v. both of them qualified as such; though John Baylor 2d did not qualify for some time after the qualification of Armistead.

During the lifetime of John Baylor
154 1st he seems to *have dealt with the firm of Dunlops & Crosse, merchants of Scotland, who by their agent carried on a store in the town of Port Royal in the county of Caroline; and after his death, a bond prepared to be executed by both the executors, was executed by Armistead alone, to Dunlops & Crosse for the sum of five hundred and twenty-six pounds seven shillings and three pence, for the amount of their account. This bond bears date on the 24th of July 1795; and was given for the balance due on their account, which commenced in 1764 and continued down to 1773, embracing articles furnished to the estate after the death of John Baylor 1st.

John Baylor 2d died about the early part of the year 1808. The first four clauses of his will are as follows:

1st. I give to my well beloved wife Frances Baylor, for and during her natural life, the New Market mansion-house and garden, and all houses therewith conveniently connected; also one-fourth part of all the rents now arising and which may hereafter arise from that part of my estate hereinafter devised to my eldest son John; and likewise one-fourth part of all rents now arising or which may hereafter arise from that part of my estate hereinafter devised to my son George, which shall be in lieu of all dower in and claim to my estate.

2d. I lend to my eldest son John one-half of my New Market landed estate, which shall be so divided that my said son John may take and have the mansion-house and brick improvements which I had commenced, one-half of the high land and one-half of the low land, with an equal moiety of all improvements, conveniences and advantages appurtenant, and one-half of the water and mill seat. I also lend to my said son John one-half of all my farming utensils and one-half of my library, consisting of from twelve to thirteen 155 *hundred volumes; one-half of my interest in all my Loyal company lands, and one-half of all those lands, for which I have brought suit in the county of Orange, if recovered, except three hundred acres thereof, which I intend for my daughter Courtney Orange Fox.

All which estate above mentioned I lend as aforesaid to my said son John during his natural life, and after his death I give and devise the same absolutely and in fee simple to his eldest son lawfully begotten then living; but if my said son John should die leaving no male child lawfully begotten, then my will is, that my son George have and hold, during his natural life, all the said estate lent to my son John; and at the death of my son George, I give and devise the same absolutely and in fee simple to the eldest son of the said George lawfully begotten then living; and if my son John should survive my son George, and die leaving no male child, then my will is that the eldest son of the said George lawfully begotten, shall have and receive absolutely and in fee simple all the said estate at the death of my son John. And in this case it is my will and I do direct that the said George and his son, who shall take the said estate above mentioned under this devise, shall pay to the daughter or daughters of my son John, if any, an annuity of one hundred pounds current money, for her or their natural life or lives.

3dly. I lend to my son George the other half of all my New Market landed estate, including one-half of the high land and one-half of the low land, and an equal moiety of all improvements, conveniences and advantages appurtenant, (except the mansion-house and brick improvements above mentioned,) one-half of my mill, or one-half of the water and mill seat. I also lend to my said son George one-half of all my farming utensils, one-half of my 156 library, consisting of *the aforesaid number of volumes, and my gold watch; likewise one-half of all my interest in all my Loyal company lands, and one-half of all those lands for which I have brought suit in the county of Orange, except three hundred acres thereof, which I intend for my daughter Courtney Orange Fox, as before mentioned. All which estate I lend to my said son George, during his natural life, and at his death I devise and give the same in fee simple and absolutely to his eldest son lawfully begotten then living; but if my son George should die leaving no male child, then my will is that my son John have and hold all the estate (lent to my son George) during his natural life, and at the death of my son John, I devise and give the same in fee simple and absolutely to the eldest son of the said John lawfully begotten then living; and if my son George should survive my son John, and die leaving no male child, then my will is that the eldest son of the said John then living shall have and receive in fee simple and absolutely all the said estate at the death of my son George. And in this case it is my will, and I do direct that the said John and his son who shall take the said estate as above mentioned under this devise, shall pay to the daughter or daughters of the said George, if any, an annuity of one hundred pounds current money during her or their natural life or lives.

4thly. I direct that no division of my estate be made between my sons John and George until the latter attains to twenty-one years of age, when the same shall be done in such manner as they shall agree upon, or in case of their disagreement, by one or more disinterested persons, who shall be mutually chosen by them for that purpose; and the division so made shall be final and obligatory.

sufficient to pay George Baylor's fourth part of his father's debts.

After the death of John Baylor 2d his sons John Baylor 3d and George D. Baylor entered upon and became possessed of the said New Market tract of land, subject to the provisions of their father's will in favor of their mother Frances Baylor; and after George D. Baylor attained the age of twenty-one years, and about the year 1814, and prior to the birth of the plaintiff, who is the son of George D. Baylor, a parol division of the New Market estate was made between the brothers John Baylor 3d and George D. Baylor, by a line adopted by them agreeably to the provisions of the will of their father; by which division the land in controversy in this suit fell to George D. Baylor; and the land continued to be held by them in severalty, according to said division, George D. Baylor holding the land in controversy as a part of his moiety until 1826, when it was sold, as will be hereinafter stated.

In 1848 George D. Baylor died, leaving the plaintiff John N. Baylor, his eldest son, who was born on the 19th of August 1816, and leaving other sons. John Baylor 3d is still alive, having one son.

In 1796, Dunlops & Crosse instituted a suit in equity in the Circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, against John Baylor 2d as executor of his father John Baylor 1st; and in their bill they set out that John Baylor 1st was indebted to them in his lifetime in the sum of five hundred and twenty-six pounds, seven shillings and three pence; that after his death his executors John Baylor 2d and Armistead came to an account with the plaintiffs, on which accounting it was ascertained that the said sum was due; and that they, well knowing that 158 *they had assets sufficient to pay it, but wanting time, they agreed with the plaintiffs that in consideration of forbearance they would give their own bond for the amount; and accordingly a bond was prepared, and was executed by Armistead, but owing to some accidental circumstance it never was executed by John Baylor 2d. And they prayed for a discovery of assets, and for payment of their debt.

John Baylor 2d answered the bill, denying that he had ever heard of the execution of the bond. He said he was very intimate with one of the plaintiffs from 1772 to October 1775, and that no demand had been made on him for a balance due from his father's estate to the plaintiffs.

In 1801 the plaintiffs filed an amended bill, in which they allege that a certain Edmund Pendleton was present when the accounts were settled between themselves and the executors of John Baylor 1st, or one of them; and they file a copy of their account. No process seems to have issued upon this amended bill; but in 1803, on the motion of the plaintiffs, the suit was remanded to the rules; and it was ordered that one of the commissioners of the court should examine, state and settle all matters and accounts between the parties, and report to the court.

In 1805 the commissioner reported that the affidavit of Edmund Pendleton, not taken on notice, had been filed with him; and if the court should admit this testimony, the commissioner would have no account to settle between the parties; because he proved that the bond of one of the executors, which was entered into at the instance of Pendleton, then the agent for the executors, closed the mercantile account.

John Baylor 2d having died in 1807 or 1808, and Thomas R. Rootes having qualified as his administrator with the will annexed, in July 1808 a bill of revivor and supplement was filed by the plaintiffs;
159 *and Rootes, the administrator of John Baylor 2d, and his widow and two sons, John and George D. were made defendants. Rootes answered, saying he knew nothing of the transactions stated in the bill; and requiring proof. John and George D. Baylor also answered, denying strenuously the liability of their father's estate for the debt, and relying upon the statute of limitations.

In 1819 the deposition of Edmund Pendleton was taken upon proof of notice to John and George D. Baylor; and he proved the justice of the plaintiffs' debt, and that the bond had been executed by Armistead in pursuance of an agreement by which the executors promised to execute a writing to ascertain the claim of the plaintiffs upon the estate of John Baylor 1st; and why John Baylor 2d had not executed it witness could assign no reason, as he never did object to any item in the account.

On the 1st of June 1820 the cause came on to be heard by consent of the plaintiffs and of the defendants John and George D. Baylor, upon the bills, their answer and exhibits, and the deposition of a witness, and upon the admissions of these defendants, that the New Market estate in their possession was liable for the debts of John Baylor 1st, and that John Baylor 2d was liable as executor of George Baylor for his portion of these debts; that said defendants had settled with Rootes, administrator with the will annexed of John Baylor 2d; and that the estate called New Market, held by them, was liable in the first place, to pay the debts of John Baylor 1st, and those by specialty binding the heirs of John Baylor 2d, and that John Baylor 1st was indebted to the plaintiffs, as proved by the deposition of Edmund Pendleton, on the 3d of May 1772, in the sum of five hundred and sixteen pounds, three shillings and eight pence, which had not been paid; and 160 for three-fourths of which the *said land, was mediately or immediately responsible. On consideration whereof, the court, with the assent of the plaintiffs and the defendants John and George D. Baylor, decreed the said land to be charged with the payment of two thousand three hundred and seventy-one dollars and thirty-seven cents, that being three-fourths of the principal and interest of the debt due to the plaintiffs; and that unless the defendants John and George D. Baylor should pay that sum, with interest, at certain specified periods in 1821 and 1822, the marshal of the court should proceed, in the mode prescribed in the decree, to sell so much of the said land, from any part thereof that he might think proper, as would satisfy the decree, with the costs and expenses attending the sale.

The money not having been paid, the marshal proceeded to sell under the decree; and he reported that he had sold to John Roy one hundred and eighty-eight acres of the land at fifteen dollars per acre; and that Roy had complied with the terms of sale. In December 1826 the cause came on to be finally heard, when the sale was confirmed, and the marshal was directed to convey the land to the purchaser. This was the land in controversy, and it was taken from that part of the New Market tract which had been allotted to George D. Baylor in the division made by himself and his brother John Baylor 3d. The defendant deduced his title by regular conveyances from the marshal.

In April 1846 John and George D. Baylor executed a deed, by which they confirmed the parol division of the land made by them in 1814. This deed, after setting out the division lines, says, that they believe this to have been a just division at the time it was made, though at the time of making the deed it was unequal as to quantity, arising from the fact that the land sold to satisfy the decree aforesaid had been taken from George D. Baylor's moiety.
161 And that this was done *in consequence of George D. Baylor's having appropriated a certain debt named, due to both of them. The plaintiff objected to this deed, as also to proof of the parol division between John and George D. Baylor; and he likewise objected to the introduction of the record of the suit before mentioned as evidence.

Upon the special verdict the Circuit court rendered a judgment for the defendant; whereupon the plaintiff applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

R. T. Daniel, for the appellant, after premising that the case turned upon the validity and effect of the decree of June 1820 in the Circuit court of the United States, insisted:

1st. That the decree was fraudulent in fact, and intended to devest the estate in remainder of the children of John and George D. Baylor: And he reviewed the facts of the case for the purpose of establishing that proposition.

2d. That the plaintiff, though he was in being at the time of the decree, was not made a party to the suit; and therefore was not bound by the decree. That this was the general rule would not be questioned. Then was this case an exception on the ground that he was a privy? That to be a privy he must be not only a privy in blood, but a privy in estate; and in this case the plaintiff claimed not under George D. Baylor, the tenant for life, but under John Baylor 2d. He referred to 2 Thom. Coke 597, 606, 717-18, note 2; 4 Comy. Dig. 338, title Fine.

He insisted further, that the doctrine of equitable representation did not extend to the case of the plaintiff. That George D. Baylor took but a life estate, with a contingent remainder in fee to his eldest son; and that as the fee was never in abeyance, it descended to the right heirs of the testator John Baylor 2d. He 162 *referred to Fearne on Cont. Remainders, ch. 6; Calvert on Parties 189, 17 Law Libr. That the cases in which the doctrine of representation was allowed, were cases of estates tail, in which the first tenant in tail was allowed to represent all the succeeding interests; but that persons entitled to an estate of inheritance must be before the court. That the furthest the courts have gone is to permit a tenant for life to represent the fee where his issue was to be entitled to the fee and had not come into existence. Calvert on Parties 48, 17 Law Libr. And he insisted that whatever was the rule in England, in Virginia under our statute the contingent remainderman was a necessary party, and his interest was to be sedulously guarded. 1 Rev. Code of 1819, p. 368-9, § 20, 21, 26, 28; Id. 462.

Morson, for the appellee, insisted:

That there was no fraud in the decree of 1820; but if there was, it could not be enquired into in this suit.

He admitted the general rule as to parties; but said there were exceptions as well established as the rule. And one of these exceptions was, that where the fee is cut up, it is sufficient to bring before the court those who make up the first fee, if they are in existence; and if they are not in existence, then the life tenant alone. Calvert on Parties 49, 189, 192, 17 Law Libr.

He insisted further, that persons having contingent interests were not proper parties, and if made parties might demur to the bill. Calvert, supra; Story's Equ. Pl. 145; Gaskell v. Gaskell, 9 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 448.

LEE, J. As the lessor of the plaintiff exactly fills the description given of the devisee in remainder after the expiration of the life estate devised to George 163 D. *Baylor in the half of the New Market estate embracing the premises now in controversy, by the will of his father John Baylor 2d, being the oldest son of George D. Baylor and having survived his father, and as he brought his suit in a short time (less than three years) after the death of his father, he must recover unless the title which he was to take upon the death of George D. Baylor was intercepted by the decree in the case of the Dunlops against the representatives of John Baylor 2d, and was by virtue of that decree and the sale and conveyance made under it, transferred to and vested in the purchaser. Thus the decision of this cause must depend upon the operation and effect to be assigned to this decree in its bearing upon the estate in remainder devised to the lessor of the plaintiff, and this is resolved into the enquiry how far and to what extent he although no party was bound by it. That it was legitimate and proper evidence cannot be questioned, for a judgment or decree is always evidence of the fact that such judgment or decree was rendered and of the legal consequences of that fact, whoever were the parties to the suit in which it was rendered; and where a title is derived under a decree, it is necessary to establish its existence in order to show the legal validity of the deed made under its authority; and the admissibility of the record for that purpose as a fact introductory to a link in the chain of the title and constituting a part of the muniments of the party's estate is a matter of familiar recognition and constant practice. 1 Stark. Ev. 187, et seq.; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 538; Barr v. Gratz's heirs, 4 Wheat. R. 213. But although admissible in evidence, how far this decree serves to defeat the plaintiff's title, is a matter of different consideration, and it is insisted on his part that he ought not to be held bound by it to any extent or for any purpose whatever, because he was no party to the cause in which it was pronounced 164 and claims not under *any party but under the devise in the will of his grand father John Baylor 2d, by whom an estate for life was devised to his father with remainder to him in fee.

The general rule certainly is that none are bound by a judgment or decree except those who were parties or standing in privity with others who were. But there are exceptions to the rule of equal authority with the rule itself.

It is clear that the limitation in the will of John Baylor 2d to the eldest son of George D. Baylor, lawfully begotten, who should be living at the death of his father was neither a vested remainder nor an executory devise but must be construed to be a contingent remainder. At the time the will was made, George D. Baylor had no son, and the limitation was of a freehold for life with remainder to a person not in esse. Such a limitation is a contingent remainder. Keyes on Future Interests § 222, p. 104; 1 Lom. Dig. 411; Fearne on Cont. Rem. 9. Nor was its character changed by the subsequent birth of the lessor of the plaintiff in 1816, some eight years after the death of the testator. Whether a condition upon which a devise is made to depend is to be regarded as a precedent or subsequent condition must be determined by the apparent intent of the testator. Here it was plainly the intention that the remainderman should fill all the conditions of the devise before he could take. He must be the eldest son of George, lawfully begotten, and he must survive his father. Until all these things concurred, no estate was to vest. The language is "I devise and give the same in fee simple and absolutely to his eldest son lawfully begotten then living." Whenever the remainderman took he took an absolute, unconditional, unqualified fee simple estate. It could not be an estate vested upon his birth but liable to be defeated by his subsequent death during the lifetime of his father. If that 165 had occurred *no interest would have descended to his heirs, otherwise the ulterior limitation over to John Baylor 3d for life with remainder in fee to his oldest son would have been defeated. For there can be no such limitation over after a fee except by way of alternative or conditional limitation. And the distinction is between the cases where a fee is given to the first taker and those in which he has but a freehold. Where by a will a fee is given and afterwards an estate in fee is limited to some other person, the latter will be construed to be an executory devise provided it be limited to take effect within the time prescribed by the rules of law: but where a freehold only is given to the first taker and afterwards a fee is limited upon a contingency the subsequent devise is in the nature of a remainder and being capable of being supported by the precedent freehold estate as a contingent remainder it shall not be deemed an executory devise. For where a limitation may take effect as a contingent remainder it shall never be construed to be an executory devise. Here the estate limited to the first taker was an estate for life and the remainder over was therefore not to be construed an executory devise, but a contingent remainder which retained that character until the death of the tenant for life and which conferred upon the remainderman, no interest but a mere possibility. And these views will I think be found sufficiently supported by authority. See Keyes, § 82, p. 48; 1 Lom. Dig. 417; Fearne on Rem. 394; Plunket v. Holmes, 1 Sid. R. 47, 1 Lev. 11; Doe ex dem. Planner et ux. v. Scudamore, 2 Bos. & Pul. 288; Doe ex dem. Mussell v. Morgan, 3 T. R. 763; Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Saund. R. 380; Carter v. Barnadiston, 1 P. Wms. 505; Luddington v. Kime, 1 Ld. Raym. 203; 3 Lom. Dig. 281; Fearne 373; Taylor and Biddall's Case, 2 Mod. R. 289.

Assuming then that the lessor of 166 the plaintiff took *a mere contingent or possible interest under the will of his grand father which would only become vested upon the death of the father, we are to enquire how far this interest was bound by the decree in the chancery suit, and whether the purchaser under it took only the interest of the tenant for life or the whole estate discharged of the limitations by way of remainder.

It would certainly be very unreasonable and unjust that a party having a charge upon an estate affecting the whole fee should be delayed or embarrassed in enforcing it by reasons of limitations by way of remainder to persons whom it might be impossible or improper to make parties to the cause. To obviate the difficulty in such cases the doctrine of virtual representation has been introduced, according to which certain parties before the court are regarded as representing those coming after them with contingent interests, who therefore it is not required should be made parties. Accordingly it is well settled that it is not necessary that remaindermen after the first estate of inheritance should be made parties: and where real estate is in controversy which is subject to an entail it is sufficient to make the first tenant in tail in esse in whom an estate of inheritance is vested a party with those claiming prior interests without making those parties who may claim in reversion or remainder after such estate of inheritance. And a decree against such tenant in tail will bind those in reversion or remainder although by the failure of all the previous estates, the estates in remainder or reversion might afterwards become vested. Reynoldson v. Perkins, Ambler's R. 564; Lloyd v. Johnes, 9 Ves. R. 37, 56; Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. R. 321, 326; Hopkins v. Hopkins, 1 Atk. R. 581, 590; Giffard v. Hort, 1 Scho. & Lef. 386; Finch v. Finch, 1 Ves. jr. R. 534; Mit. Pl. 140, 141; Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Jac. & 167 Walk. 133. But *the courts have not stopped here; for under certain circumstances, the first tenant for life has been regarded as representing the entire fee, and the decree rendered against him been held binding upon those coming in after him in remainder. In Giffard v. Hort, ubi. sup. Lord Redesdale says, "where all the parties are brought before the court that can be brought before it and the court acts on the property according to the rights that appear, without fraud, its decision must of necessity be final and conclusive. It has been repeatedly determined that if there be tenant for life remainder to his first son in tail, remainder over, and he is brought before the court before he has issue, the contingent remaindermen are barred." And in the same case, this learned judge remarked that "courts of equity have determined on grounds of high expediency that it is sufficient to bring before the court the first tenant in tail in being, and if there be no tenant in tail in being, the first person entitled to the inheritance, and if no such person, then the tenant for life." In Leonard v. Lord Sussex, 2 Vern. R. 527, there was a tenant for life of a trust remainder to his sons. The tenant for life before he had a son born brings a bill against the trustees and an account is decreed which is afterwards taken: Held that the account should stand and be binding upon the sons. In Allen v. Papworth, 1 Ves. sen. 163, there was a bill by husband and wife and an account taken. Lord Hardwicke said the account should be held binding on any contingent remainderman when his title should afterwards vest nor should he open it unless fraud or errors are shown therein. He said it "often happens on settlements where there is tenant for life with limitations in remainder, upon a bill for an account where none but tenant for life is in being, a child afterwards coming in esse shall only have liberty to surcharge and falsify if no fraud." In this case it appears that in point of 168 fact the son was in *being at the commencement of the proceeding and there appears to be a mistake in the report which assumes that at that time no other person was entitled. See note of the editor and Supplement, p. 92. The case of Finch v. Finch, 2 Ves. sen. 491, was a bill by tenants for life for the execution of the trust of an act of parliament and the will of Lord Nottingham; and one of the questions was whom it was necessary for the plaintiff to bring before the court. Lord Hardwicke said "it is admitted to be necessary to bring the first person entitled to the remainder and inheritance if such is in being. It is true if there is none such in whom the remainder of the inheritance is vested in being (as if none of the sons had issue male), then it is impossible to say the creditors are to remain unpaid and the trust not to be executed until a son is born. If there is no first son in being the court must take the facts as they stand. It would be a very good decree and no son born afterwards could dispute it unless he could show fraud collusion or misbehavior in the performance of these trusts: otherwise he would be bound by it." It will be observed that in this case the tenant for life was plaintiff and the remainderman who it was said should be brought before the court was one who had a vested and not a mere contingent remainder. So a bill by tenant for life with remainder to his unborn sons in tail, for partition, had been maintained and the decree held binding on the sons when in esse: and the vice chancellor said the court frequently decreed partition where the tenant for life was defendant: that the manner in which the parties were arranged could make no difference and therefore that in this case the partition might very well be carried into effect. Gaskell v. Gaskell, 6 Sim. R. 643, 9 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 448.

Now when the original, amended and supplemental bills in this case were 169 filed, there was no son of *George D. Baylor in esse, the lessor of the plaintiff, who was the oldest son, not having been born till August 1816; it was therefore sufficient according to the rule to make George D. Baylor the tenant for life, defendant, and the decree against him would bind all contingent remaindermen coming in after him. And the only question is whether upon the birth of the lessor of the plaintiff pending the suit it was necessary in order to bind him that he should have been made a party by an amended or supplemental bill. I think not. No estate vested in him upon his birth and none could vest unless he fulfilled also the condition of surviving his father. Until then he could have no title to the inheritance, but a mere contingent interest or possibility that he would take on the death of his father, by reason of his outliving him. The only vested estate was that of the tenant for life, his father, and he was the proper party to bring before the court as representing the whole estate and all those who are to come in after him by way of contingent remainder. Those who might be entitled to future uncertain and contingent interests it was neither necessary nor proper to make parties although they might be in life. This is the doctrine asserted in Pelham v. Gregory, 1 Eden's R. 518; S. C. 3 Bro. P. C. 204. Lord Northington speaking of the defendants Lord Vane and Lord Darlington, said: "Now the rights of these two defendants in the condition in which this lease is at present, are legal rights and yet being contingent and future, they are not attended till they come into possession with a legal remedy. And I have no apprehension that any person can have a right to call another into this court to make him contest here by anticipation a future legal right: I have as little conception that this court when such a right is brought hither has any jurisdiction to take 170 cognizance of it." *1 Eden's R. 520.

This case was regarded by Lord Redesdale as a decisive authority and he expressed the opinion that many cases might be found where bills had been dismissed upon this ground. And he accordingly held upon a similar principle that a remainderman could not be held to litigate a title which might never be beneficial to him. Devonsher v. Newenham, 2 Sch. & Lef. 197. If it was not necessary to call in the contingent remainderman in those cases, still less would it be so where, as here, he was not born till after the suit was commenced.

In the excellent treatise of Mr. Calvert on Parties to Suits in Equity, the general principle of representation established by the cases is thus expressed: "In respect of the first estate of inheritance and of all interests depending upon it, it is sufficient to bring before the court the person entitled to that first estate: and if there be no such person then the tenant for life." Calvert, p. 52. It is stated in terms very similar or to the same effect by other learned authors. Story Eq. Pl. § 145, 792; Coop. Eq. Pl. 36, 77 to 83. Mr. Calvert however suggests that there should be a qualification as to the tenant for life and that except under very particular circumstances, the tenant for life who should be regarded as representing the whole estate must be one whose child if he have one, will become entitled to the inheritance. The idea is that there would be thus afforded a guaranty for a proper defense according to the dictum in Dayrell v. Champness, 1 Eq. Cas. Ab. 400, that the tenant for life is to take care of the inheritance for his children. He admits however there is no direct authority for the suggestion though he thinks it is countenanced by expressions to be found in several of the cases. Calvert on Parties, p. 52, 53, 192. The condition required by this suggestion is however fully met in this case as 171 *the lessor of the plaintiff who would take the remainder in fee if he survived his father is the son of the tenant for life who was made defendant.

Upon the merits of the chancery case I shall remark very briefly.

I think the debt claimed was sufficiently established by the testimony of Pendleton, and though it might have been barred by the statute of limitations in an action upon the account at law, yet I conceive that the amount for which the decree was rendered was not barred at the death of John Baylor 1st in 1772, and that by his will a charge was created upon the lands devised to his three sons John 2d, George and Robert for the payment of his debts in the proportions named in the will: and this charge would prevent the statute from running against the proceeds of the sale of the land upon the principles of Fergus' ex'ors v. Gore, 1 Sch. & Lef. 107; Burke v. Jones, 2 Ves. & Beame 275; Ault v. Goodrich, 4 Russ. R. 430, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 740; Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 John. Ch. R. 90, 129. That there was such a charge seems to be very clear. Both parties in this action claim title from John Baylor 1st as the common source. The devisees under his will took the estates devised to them upon the terms of the will which epxressly required that John should pay one-half of the debts not otherwise satisfied and George and Robert should pay the other half. By accepting the devises, the devisees became personally liable in respect of the subjects devised to them, respectively, to their shares of the debts and the creditors were under no necessity to look to the general estate of John Baylor 1st before asserting their claims against the devisees and the subjects devised. John Baylor 2d who took the New Market estate was in Europe at the date of the will and at the testator's death in 1772. When he returned to Virginia does not distinctly appear, but he states in 172 *his answer that he went back to Europe in 1775 so that he probably returned from his first visit shortly after his father's death: and there is no reason to suppose that the profits of the property during the interval were sufficient to pay the debts or that they were paid otherwise. Nor was the bond given by Armistead a discharge of the debt. It purports to be the bond of John Baylor as well as of Armistead and never having been executed by the former it may be questioned whether it was binding even on Armistead upon the principles of King v. Smith, 2 Leigh 157, and Hicks v. Goode, 12 Leigh 479, 490. But however this may be, in the absence of proof that it was intended at the time to discharge the original debt, it ought not to be deemed to have that effect. I refer to the cases of Sale v. Dishman's ex'ors, 3 Leigh 548, and Weaver v. Tapscott, 9 Leigh 424, the principles of which will apply to the question here. That the decree was for three-fourths of the debt instead of the moiety only charged on the estate of John Baylor 2d by his father's will constitutes no objection. John Baylor 2d was the executor of his brother George and doubtless gave bond as such, and having received assets, he should have paid George's fourth part. Failing to do this, this fourth was a debt from his estate and was charged upon his real estate (if not otherwise) by his executorial bond.

But with regard to these and the other supposed errors in the proceedings it is sufficient to say that they cannot be examined into when the decree is offered in evidence in a court of law. And so with regard to the charge of collusion. If there was any improper arrangement between those parties to subject the property to a debt with which it was not chargeable in whole or in part, or if any wrong were done in throwing the whole burden upon that part of the land held by George D. Baylor, the 173 remedy is not *to be sought in the exclusion of the decree which was the basis of the defendant's title. All these are matters purely of equitable cognizance with which the court of law has no concern. To undertake to reverse the proceedings would be to usurp the province of the court of chancery, and to do what even that court would not do in this collateral way. For that court would not without proper proceedings to present the subject directly, disregard this decree or reject it as evidence. So long as it remains unreversed it must have the force and effect of an adjudication upon the entire estate and must be considered to devest the title out of the defendant and those claiming in remainder after him. Although it is a decree in chancery and not a judgment at law, yet our courts of chancery being courts of record, their decrees may be the basis of title in a court of law, the same as a judgment of recovery in a real action. And the deed of the marshal made in conformity to its decree operates to transfer the entire title in fee simple to the purchaser and must so stand and be accepted as long as the decree on which it rests remains in force. If there be errors to the prejudice of the remainderman for which the decree is liable to be reversed he may, it would seem, make himself a party to the original suit by filing a supplemental bill to have the benefit of the proceedings for the purpose of appealing. 3 Dan. Ch. P. 1604; Giffard v. Hort, ubi sup.; Osborne v. Usher, 6 Bro. P. C. 20; Lloyd v. Johnes, 9 Ves. R. 37, 55; Calvert on Parties 193; Sto. Eq. Pl. § 144. Whether however an appeal would avail the party in this case, or whether he can maintain a bill to impeach the decree for fraud or whether he can have contribution or a new partition are questions not arising in this case and upon which I mean to express no opinion. All that I mean to say is that as the case now stands, the doctrine of equitable representation by the fa-
174 ther, tenant *for life, of his sons claiming a contingent remainder in fee, must apply; and that although the remainder might afterwards if not hindered have become a vested estate, yet that the remainderman is still bound by the decree and must so remain as long as it continues in force and unreversed.

I have not thought it necessary to examine the analogous case of a recovery at law in a real action and its effect in defeating subsequent estates in remainder: nor to consider how far that effect would be avoided by showing that the recovery was by default or collusion under the provisions of our act taken from the statute of Westm. 2. The court of law must give to this decree the same force and effect which it would have in the court of equity when brought incidentally to its consideration in another suit. In the latter it must be regarded as binding upon all those coming in by way of contingent remainder after the tenant for life, and it must therefore be regarded as binding upon the lessor of the plaintiff in this action.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Judgment affirmed.

175 Pratt v. Wright & als.

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

[67 Am. Dec. 767.]

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

1. Official Bonds—Guardians—Failure to Note Appointment—Effect.—The official bond of a guardian is not invalidated by the omission to recite in it the fact of his appointment as guardian.

2. Same—Same—Covenants Not Required by Statute—Effect.—A guardian's bond contains a covenant to indemnify the justices constituting the court at the time it is taken. Although this is not required by the statute, and therefore is not obligatory, it does not avoid the bond.

3. Same—Same—Condition of Bond Omitted—Effect.—Although the condition in a guardian's bond is not as extensive as the statute requires, yet as it relates to a part of the duty of the guardian, the bond is not void, but binds the obligors to the extent of the condition.

4. Same—Same—Illegal Conditions at Common Law—By Statute—Effect Where Statute Avoids.—There is no solid distinction between bonds and other deeds containing conditions, covenants and grants not malum in se but illegal at the common law, and those containing conditions, covenants or grants illegal by the express prohibition of statutes. In each case the bonds or other deeds are void as to the conditions, covenants or grants that are illegal, and are good as to all others which are legal and unexceptionable in their purport. The only exception is where the statute has avoided the whole instrument to all intents and purposes.

5. Same—Same.—A condition of a guardian's bond having been in general use for many years, Quære, if the court would not sustain it though it was not in conformity to the statute.

4. Chancery Practice—Settlement of Guardian's Accounts.—A court of equity has jurisdiction to hold a guardian to account, and his sureties with him, to the payment of any balance found due to the ward; though the guardian lives out of the state and has no property within it.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Madison county, instituted by John J. Pratt against his late guardian Uriel Wright and his sureties, for an account of his guardianship and satisfaction of the amount which might be ascertained 176 to be due. Wright *had removed from the state of Virginia, and was proceeded against as an absent defendant. One of the sureties and the representative of another demurred to the bill, and also answered, insisting that the bond executed by Wright and his sureties was void and of no effect for defects apparent on its face.

The bond in the penal part of it does not in any way recognize Wright as guardian, or indicate that it was executed by him and his sureties as a guardian's bond. The condition is as follows:

"The condition of the above obligation is such, that if the above bound Uriel Wright, his executors and administrators, shall well and truly pay and deliver or cause to be paid and delivered unto John J. Pratt and Betsy P. Pratt, infant children of Edwin G. Pratt and Frances his wife, late Frances Wright, all such estate or estates as now is or are, or hereafter shall appear to be due to the said infants when and as soon as they shall attain to lawful age, or when thereto required by the justices of the court, as also keep harmless the above named justices, their and every of their heirs, executors and administrators, from all trouble and damages that shall or may arise about the said estate, then the above obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force."

The cause came on to be heard in May 1853, when the court, being of opinion that the bond was null and void, dismissed the bill as to the sureties on that ground; and being of opinion that the court had no jurisdiction of the cause as to Wright the guardian, who was an absent defendant upon whom process had not been served, and who had no property within the jurisdiction of the court, the bill was also dismissed as to him. Whereupon the plaintiff applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

John M. Patton, Jr., for the appel-
177 lant, referred to *Call v. Ruffin, 1 Call 333, and insisted that the bond which was sustained in that case, was in every substantial particular and almost in words, the same as the one in the case before the court. He referred to the forms which had been in use ever since the decision in Call v. Ruffin, as following the form of the bond in that case; and insisted upon the very serious consequences which must follow a decision avoiding such bonds.

Patton, for the appellee, endeavored to sustain the decree, on the ground of the want of jurisdiction in the court to call a nonresident guardian to account, or to require his sureties to settle the account. He also referred to the statements of the bill to show that no account was necessary.

DANIEL, J. The appellees Millar and Humphreys insist, respectively, in their several answers, that the bond on which the suit is founded is not binding on the securities because of faults apparent on its face. They do not, however, (either of them,) point to the particular feature or features of the bond in which the supposed faults are to be found; and the Circuit court simply responds to this ground of their defense by declaring the bond null and void. We are thus left to conjecture the reasons on which the objections to the validity of the bond were rested and sustained.

The act in force at the time of the execution of the bond, (the act of 1819,) requires that every guardian shall give bond to the justices, with sufficient security, conditioned "for the faithful execution of his office." And it will be seen that the condition of the bond in question varies from that required by the act in two particulars: Instead of requiring simply "the faithful execution of his office," it requires the guardian to pay and deliver to his wards all such estate as now is or 178 *hereafter shall appear to be due to them, when and as soon as they shall attain to lawful age or when thereto required by the justices of the said court; and also further requires, that the guardian shall keep harmless the justices from all trouble and damages that shall or may arise about the said estate. And it is in one or both of these departures from the terms of the act that the defects, if any, in the bond are supposed to reside. It must be conceded that these departures involve variances not only in form, but also to some extent in substance, from the bond which the law directs to be given; the first clause in the condition stopping short of the full requirement of the act, and the last superadding a new and independent condition, which the act does not mention. It is insisted, however, by the counsel for the appellant, that all question as to the force of these defects on the validity of the instrument, ought to be regarded here as closed by the decision of this court in the case of Call v. Ruffin, 1 Call 333, in which a judgment rendered on a bond exactly like this was affirmed, and by the fact that the bond here has strictly pursued the form prescribed in the books of forms which have been and still are usually consulted by the justices and clerks as guides in taking such bonds.

The decision in Call v. Ruffin does not seem to me to be entitled to all the weight which is claimed for it as an authority applicable to this case. The bond in that case (as will be seen from the statement of Judge Pendleton in delivering the opinion of the court) was dated in 1779, at which period the act of 1748 was still in force. And by said last mentioned act the direction to the courts in respect to the bonds of guardians, was that they should "take good security of all guardians by them appointed for the estates of the orphans to them respectively committed." Hen. St. ch. 4, § 4, p. 450.

179 *The first clause of the condition of the bond, therefore, in that case, was almost in exact conformity with the very words of the act under which it was taken.

Still, as the justices, most probably not adverting to the alteration in the condition of the bond first required in the act of 1785 and since followed in the act of 1819, have continued to use the old form, a declaration of the invalidity of bonds on the score of such defects as are alleged against the one under consideration, could not fail to be productive of most serious evils. And even if I entertained the opinion that a free and untrammeled consideration of the question as an open one, would probably result in a conclusion unfavorable to the validity of such bonds, I would, in view of the consequences likely to ensue from such a decision, feel strongly inclined, if not indeed constrained to defer to the usage.

I am, however, satisfied that a reference to the authorities will result in showing that the defects in the bond under consideration do not affect its efficacy to bind the parties, to the extent of their undertaking.

The effect on the validity of the bond of a public officer, of superadding a condition not required in the act directing the bond to be taken, is very fully considered by Judge Story in delivering the opinion of the Supreme court of the United States in the case of United States v. Bradley, 10 Peters' R. 343. The English cases are there reviewed, and the doctrine is deduced from them, as well as from previous decisions of the Supreme court, that there is no solid distinction in cases of this sort between bonds and other deeds containing conditions, covenants or grants not malum in se but illegal at the common law, and those containing conditions, covenants or grants illegal by the express prohibition of statutes. In each case the bonds or other deeds are void as to the conditions, covenants or grants that are illegal, and 180 are good as *to all others which are legal and unexceptionable in their purport. The only exception is where the statute has not confined its prohibitions to the illegal conditions, covenants or grants, but has expressly or by necessary implication avoided the whole instrument to all intents and purposes. The judge proceeded further to declare, that inasmuch as the act merely prescribed the form and purport of the bond to be taken, and did not declare that all other bonds not taken in the prescribed form should be utterly void, it would be a mischievous interpretation of the act to hold that under such circumstances it was the intendment of the act that the bond should be void. And that it was a sufficient compliance with the policy of the act, and in consonance with the dictates of the common law and of common sense, to hold the bond void, as to any condition imposed beyond what the law required, and good, so far as it was in conformity to the act.

The cases of Central Bank v. Kendrack, Dudley (Geo. R.) 67; Speck v. The Commonwealth, 3 Watts & Serj. 324; Commonwealth for &c. v. Pearce, 7 Monr. R. 317; Walker v. Chapman, 22 Alab. R. 116, are all to the same effect. See also 2 Rob. Pr. 35, 36.

Even, therefore, if the condition in respect to indemnifying the justices imposed upon the guardian some new and onerous duty, wholly foreign to the nature of his office, we should be well justified in refusing to "call in aid a distinct condition which might be illegal to vitiate that which is clearly legal." Collins v. Gwynne, 20 Eng. C. L. R. 189.

That the want of conformity, in the first clause of the condition, to the terms of the act does not vitiate the bond, would seem to be still more obvious. It would seem to be absurd to hold the parties not responsible for a failure of the guardian to perform one of his duties, and that the main duty of his office, simply because the condition of the bond, falling 181 *short of the comprehensive language of the act, has failed to stipulate in terms for the performance of all the duties of his office. It is enough that the condition is co-extensive in its stipulations with the breach or breaches alleged.

The suggestion of insufficiency in the bond because of the failure in the condition to recite the appointment of Wright as guardian, is fully met by the decision in Call v. Ruffin, before cited. The same objection to the bond was there taken; and indeed that was the only objection to the sufficiency of the bond, to which the attention of the court was in that case specially directed in the assignment of errors. The objection was, as has been seen, of no avail. And no ground is laid in subsequent legislation on the subject, from which to infer the necessity of such a recital now.

I do not see on what ground any doubt can be raised as to the jurisdiction of the Circuit court. The bill calls for an account of the guardianship; and if the Circuit court had not been of the opinion that the bond was null and void, and consequently, that there was no foundation for relief against the surviving surety and the representatives of the sureties that are dead, I apprehend it would have found no obstacle, arising out of the nonresidence of the guardian, to prevent its taking jurisdiction of the cause, as well as to him as to the other defendants. It is true, that in Call v. Ruffin it was held that the ascertainment, by previous suit against the guardian, of the demand against him, was not in all cases essential (as it was in a suit upon an executor's bond) to the maintenance of a suit at law on the bond; but that case has never been understood by the courts as settling that the right so to proceed at law on the bond was in exclusion of the jurisdiction of chancery to hold the guardian to an account, and his se-182 curities with him, to the *payment of any balance found due to his ward. If the guardian in this case was within the jurisdiction of the court, neither he or his sureties could be heard to object that the proceeding ought to have been by suit at law instead of by bill in equity. His absence does not oust the court of chancery of its jurisdiction. His sureties or their representatives are within the jurisdiction of the court, and no reason is perceived why the suit may not proceed, as in other cases where some of the defendants are within and others without the jurisdiction of the court. His absence may be the occasion of inconvenience and trouble in making up the account, but it presents no legal bar to the relief sought.

It seems to me that the decree ought to be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the principles herein declared.

MONCURE and SAMUELS, Js., concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

LEE, J., concurred in the opinion, except that he was not disposed to give as much weight to the practice as to the forms of the bonds as was attached to it in the opinion.

Decree reversed.

183 *Taylor & als. v. Yarbrough & Wife.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

1. Gift to Wife—Slaves—Case at Bar.—T lends to his daughter D, a married woman, three negro women during her life, and they go into the possession of the husband; and by deed he gives her the future increase of the three women. D survives her husband and keeps possession of the three women as belonging to her, and whilst so in her possession they have a number of children. HELD:
   1. Same—Same—Interest of Husband.—The women not having been expressed to be given for the separate use of D and not having been conveyed to a trustee, they were the property of the husband for the life of the wife.
   2. Same—Same—Future Increase.—The gift of the future increase of the women was a valid gift.
   3. Same—Same—Same.—The wife having survived her husband, the increase of the three women born after the death of the husband belong to the wife.
2. Res Judicata.†—A bill in equity having been dismissed generally without a reservation of any right of the plaintiff to sue thereafter, is conclusive between the parties and those claiming under them upon all the issues made up in the cause.

By deed bearing date the 17th of July 1823, Robert Taylor, for divers good causes and considerations, but more especially for and in consideration of natural love and affection, conveyed to his daughter Patty Deshazor four certain young negroes named Daphney, Cassandra, Wiley and Armstead, children of Nelly, and Rachel and Jenny, together with all the future increase of the said three women from and after the date of the deed. And the deed recites that he had lent the three women Nelly, Rachel and Jenny to Mrs. Deshazor for her life.
184 *At the time of the execution of this deed John Deshazor, the husband of Mrs. Patty Deshazor, was alive, and the slaves went into his possession, and so continued until his death in March 1825.

In November 1825 a suit was instituted in the County court of Powhatan by Mrs. Deshazor against George Taylor as the administrator of John Deshazor deceased and Ann Elizabeth an infant daughter by a former marriage, and the only child of John Deshazor, for a settlement of the administration account and a distribution of the estate. At the same term the administrator and guardian ad litem filed their answers, and there was a decree appointing commissioners to settle the account, and divide the slaves and other personal estate, the one-third to the widow and the other two-thirds to the daughter; the widow's third of the slaves for her life.

These commissioners reported their division of the slaves, which omitted all mention of the three women given to Mrs. Deshazor for life; and the cause coming on to be finally heard on the 17th of May 1827 the report was confirmed, and the widow and daughter were each decreed to hold the slaves allotted to them respectively, the first for life and the latter in fee.

Some time after this decree, but whilst she was still an infant, Ann Elizabeth Deshazor married William W. Yarbrough; and they in February 1843 filed their bill in the Circuit court of Powhatan county against George Taylor as administrator of John Deshazor and Patty Deshazor, in which they set out the deed of Robert Taylor, the fact that the seven negroes came into the possession of John Deshazor, and his death leaving a widow and the female plaintiff his only child then an infant. They state that soon thereafter George Taylor qualified as administrator, and made in the fall of the same year 1825, a partial division of the said slaves as the 185 property of his intestate, giving *to the widow one-third of the four young negroes during her life, and the remaining two-thirds thereof to the female plaintiff, and leaving undivided and in the possession of the widow, the three women aforesaid, where they and their numerous increase born since the date of the deed, had ever since remained, except Nelly who was dead.

*Gift to Wife—Slaves—Interest of Husband.—See principal case cited in Hutchinson v. Parkersburg, 25 W. Va. 240.

See generally, monographic note on "Gifts."

†Res Judicata.—For the proposition that, a bill in equity having been dismissed generally without a reservation of any right of the plaintiff to sue thereafter, is conclusive between the parties and those claiming under them upon all the issues made up in the cause, the principal case is cited and followed in the following cases: Carberry v. West Va., etc., R. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 265, 28 S. E. Rep. 695; Watson v. Watson, 45 W. Va. 295, 31 S. E. Rep. 940.

They claimed that John Deshazor became absolutely entitled in his lifetime and so continued until his death, to all the said seven slaves, and their increase born after the date of the deed, the three women for life of his wife, but their increase absolutely. That at his death the same property passed to the female plaintiff subject to the widow's third for life, and ought to have been so held and distributed by the administrator. They state that the increase of the slaves has been considerable since the death of John Deshazor; and that they are advised they are entitled to have a distribution in manner aforesaid. And they ask for such a distribution, and an account of profits.

George Taylor, the administrator of Deshazor, answered the bill, referring to the decree in the County court of Powhatan, and relying upon it as a bar to the claim of the complainants. He said that under that decree the property was delivered to the parties. That it was probable the County court erred in its decision upon the right of John Deshazor's estate to the negro women Nelly, Rachel and Jenny; and if so, he had no objection to the correction of the decree, if the plaintiffs are not barred by the length of time during which Mrs. Deshazor has held the said negroes adversely. But he insists that the increase of the women born since the death of John Deshazor are no part of his estate, but survived to Mrs. Deshazor. He gives the names of the children born since John Deshazor's death.

Mrs. Deshazor also answered, taking 186 the same *grounds; and insisting, that if she is to be deprived of the slaves, she should be allowed for raising them. She also relied upon the statute of limitations.

This cause came on to be finally heard on the 10th of November 1845, when there was a decree in general terms, dismissing the bill with costs. And from this decree the plaintiffs obtained an appeal, which was afterwards dismissed for their failure to perfect the appeal in the time prescribed by law. See 7 Gratt. 374.

In April 1851 the same plaintiffs instituted this suit in the Circuit court of Powhatan county. They again set out the facts as to the deed of Robert Taylor, the death of Deshazor, and the partial division of the slaves between Mrs. Deshazor and the female plaintiff, and the leaving the three women in the hands of Mrs. Deshazor. They insist that John Deshazor was entitled to the three women for the life of his wife, and to their increase born during that time absolutely. They say that Mrs. Deshazor was entitled to one-third of them for her life, and the complainants were entitled to the other two-thirds, with the reversion in the third to which the widow was entitled for life. That it is probable they have lost their right to the two-thirds which would have been allotted to them in the first instance by the lapse of time; but that as to the other third they had only an interest in remainder which had lately become vested by the death of Mrs. Deshazor. That they could not sue for that third during the lifetime of Mrs. Deshazor, and therefore could not be barred by the lapse of time. And making the administrator of John Deshazor and the executor and legatees of Mrs. Deshazor parties defendants, they asked for a decree in their favor for one-third of the increase of the said three women between the date of the deed and the death of Mrs. Deshazor.

187 *All the defendants answered at great length. They relied on the decrees in the suits in the County and Circuit courts hereinbefore mentioned as a bar to the claim of the complainants. They denied that Mrs. Deshazor held the one-third of the increase of said three women as a part of her dower slaves; and insisted that she held all of said slaves, claiming them as her own, and that she had so held and claimed them from the time of the division of the slaves in 1825 until her death in 1850. They said that at that division the right of Mrs. Deshazor to the three women was acquiesced in before the commissioners by the guardian of the female plaintiff: And they relied on the statute of limitations in bar of the plaintiffs' claim.

The cause came on to be heard on the 8th day of February 1854, when the court held that under the deed of Robert Taylor to Mrs. Deshazor, her husband John Deshazor took an estate for her life in the three women, and that their increase born during that period constituted a part of his estate; and that the plaintiffs were not barred by either of the before mentioned suits, of their recovery of the third thereof to which Mrs. Deshazor was entitled as for her dower or thirds in her husband's estate. And a decree was made against the legatees of Mrs. Deshazor who had received the slaves under her will, accordingly. Whereupon they applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Patton, for the appellants, insisted:

1st. That the deed of Robert Taylor vested an estate in Mrs. Deshazor for her separate use; and therefore that her husband took no interest in the slaves.

2d. That the plaintiffs were barred by the decree in the former suit. That Mrs. Deshazor held and claimed all the slaves as her own, and that she set up this title 188 *in that suit. That the decree in that suit passed upon her title and concluded the question.

Dance, for the appellees, insisted:

1st. That the deed of Taylor conveyed the slaves directly to Mrs. Deshazor, without in any way creating a separate estate in her; and that the slaves vested absolutely in her husband John Deshazor, and on his death passed as a part of his estate.

2d. That these slaves were not divided by the commissioners in 1825, but went into the possession of Mrs. Deshazor; to one-third of which she was entitled for life. That the question in the former suit was different from the present: There the plaintiffs claimed the two-thirds of the slaves, which claim was defeated by the plea of the statute of limitations; and the decree, therefore, only barred the plaintiffs to the extent that the plea covered the claim. Saunders v. Marshall, 4 Hen. & Munf. 455; Lane v. Harrison, 6 Munf. 573; Northwestern Bank v. Nelson, 1 Gratt. 108. And that the statute could not apply to the one-third of the saves held by the widow as her dower slaves, to which she was entitled for life; and for which the plaintiffs had no title to sue until her death in 1850.

LEE, J. The interest granted to Mrs. Deshazor in the negroes Nelly, Rachel and Jenny by her father's deed being for her life only, of course whatever right John Deshazor acquired in them terminated upon her death, and accordingly Rachel and Jenny were surrendered to her father, the other, Nelly, having died some time previously. And as the appellees admit that as to two-thirds of the increase born after the death of John Deshazor they have lost their right by lapse of time and as those born previously have been heretofore divided, the only subject of controversy here is the undivided third part of the increase 189 of the *three slaves named born after the death of John Deshazor, the whole having been held by Mrs. Deshazor during her life.

That the deed from Taylor conveying to his daughter Mrs. Deshazor the future increase of the three slaves was effectual to pass such increase cannot be successfully questioned. True, it may be said that as they were not in existence, property in them could not be in the grantor and non det qui non habet. Still being the absolute owner of the reversion of these slaves after the determination of the life estate granted to his daughter, their capabilities of increase also belonged to him and he might grant such increase just as well as the principal subject. Thus it is said a man may grant the wool of a flock of sheep for years. Noy's Max. 83. And it is common to grant the future rents and profits of real estate. The grant of the future increase of a female slave would of course confer but a contingent and uncertain interest: but as the children were born they would vest in the donee and the title become complete. It has even been held that the owner of a female slave may give her to one child and her future increase to another. Banks' adm'r v. Marksberry, 3 Littell's R. 275. In one case decided in the old General court in 1736, a bequest of the future increase of slaves to others than those to whom the slaves were given, was held to be void. Stone's adm'r v. Pope, Jeff. R. 43. In a subsequent case decided by Chancellor Wythe in 1791, such a bequest was sustained. Dandridge v. Lyon, Wythe's R. 123. The last case would I apprehend furnish the rule at this day. That the increase of the slaves during Mrs. Deshazor's life estate would belong to her father (but for his grant) may be regarded as settled by the authorities. Ellison v. Woody, 6 Munf. 368; Maria v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 228.

In the deed to Mrs. Deshazor, no
190 trustee was named *to intercept the marital rights of her husband, nor was the deed even expressed to be for her special or sole or separate use. So that the property in the slaves born during the lifetime of John Deshazor vested in him. But as to those born after his death a different question is presented.

Marriage is said to be an absolute gift to the husband of the goods and personal chattels of which the wife was actually and beneficially possessed in her own right at the time of the marriage and of such others as come to her during the coverture. Coke Litt. 300 a, 351 b; 2 Bac. Abr. "Baron and Feme," C. 3, p. 21. But of property coming under the description of choses in action, such as debts due the wife, legacies, residuary personal estate, money invested in public securities and the like, marriage is only a qualified gift upon condition that the husband get possession during its continuance; for if he die before the wife without having gained such possession, she and not his personal representative will be entitled. Coke Litt. 351; Scawen v. Blunt, 7 Ves. R. 294; Langham v. Nenny, 3 Ves. R. 467; Legg v. Legg, 8 Mass. R. 99. In 2 Black. Comm. 433, the doctrine is stated in general terms that "in chattel interests the sole and absolute property vests in the hubsand to be disposed of at his pleasure if he chooses to take possession of them: for unless he reduces them to possession by exercising some act of ownership upon them, no property vests in him but they shall remain to the wife or representatives after the coverture is determined." This learned and accurate writer makes no discrimination in this regard between personal chattels and choses in action: as to both the reductio in possessionem is required to vest the property in the husband. And Judge Tucker tells us that chattels personal and choses in action "are all upon the same footing, whether they be debts, bonds 191 or *contracts (which are properly called choses in action) or slaves, horses or other cattle or goods, all of which come under the general denomination of chattels. For unless reduced by the husband into possession at some time during the coverture they will survive to the wife if she survives." 1 Tuck. Comm. Lib. 2, ch. 24, p. 329. Thus if the property of the wife be a bond or a slave or horse of which another person has possession adverse to the wife the husband must sue for and recover the money or property in the wife's lifetime or the property will not be his. Ibid. The learned commentator would seem to restrict the necessity of a reduction to possession to the cases in which the possession was held by a third person adversely. But the doctrine is carried further for it is held to apply strictly in cases in which the possession is not adverse to the wife but perfectly consistent with her title, but in which the husband did not, because from the nature of the case, he could not, recover the possession during his life. Thus where a wife is entitled to slaves in remainder or reversion expectant upon a previous life estate and the husband die before the termination of the life estate, the wife him surviving, she, and not the estate of the husband, is entitled to the property; and any disposition of it by his will, will be ineffectual. Upshaw v. Upshaw, 2 Hen. & Munf. 381. So where there was a deed of gift of slaves from a father to his daughter, the use and possession of which was reserved to the father during life: the daughter married and the father afterwards died, and then the husband died without taking actual possession: held that the right to the slaves survived to the wife. Bohn v. Headly, 7 Harris & John. 257. Where the husband survives the wife but both die during the life estate, the right passes to the wife's administrator. Neale's adm'r v. Haddock, Cam. & Norw. R. 75.

192 *As to reversionary interests in personal property of a wife expectant on a previous life estate in another, if the tenant for life and the wife both outlive the husband, it is the settled rule that the wife takes the property by survivorship even although the husband may have assigned it during his life to another. Hornsby v. Lee, 2 Madd. R. 16; Purdew v. Jackson, 1 Russ. R. 1; Honner v. Morton, 3 Russ. R. 65, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 298; Browning v. Headly, 2 Rob. R. 340. In these cases the husband could not reduce the property to possession because of the life estate and his assignment of the reversionary interest was not deemed to be equivalent; and so upon his death, the wife took the property. But a similar rule would seem to have prevailed in certain cases in which the chose might have been immediately reduced into possession but from neglect or other causes had been left outstanding by the assignee. Elwin v. Williams, 13 Sim. R. 309, 36 Eng. Ch. R. 308; Ashby v. Ashby, 1 Coll. R. 553, 28 Eng. Ch. R. 549. See also Hutchings v. Smith, 9 Sim. R. 137, 16 Eng. Ch. R. 138; 1 Bright on Husb. & Wife 86. And even where possession did come to the husband but not clearly and distinctly in his character of husband, such possession was held not to defeat the wife's right of survivorship. Thus in a well considered case in which a father by his will gave slaves to his married daughter and appointed her husband executor who qualified as such: the husband afterwards died before any division of the estate of the father was made, having by his will bequeathed the slaves to his daughter and sons: held that his possession was to be considered as in his character of executor and not that of husband, and that the right to the slaves survived to the wife. Wallace v. Taliaferro, 2 Call 447. So where a widow entitled to an interest in the slaves of her deceased husband marries a second time and a suit is brought by her 193 *second husband and herself for a division of the slaves which is made by commissioners appointed by the court, but their report was never returned nor therefore confirmed: the slaves remain on the plantation in possession of husband and wife and in this state of things the husband dies: held (though by a divided court) that the husband acquired no right to the slaves. Gregory's adm'r v. Mark's adm'r, 1 Rand. 355. Thus it appears the law favors the wife's right of survivorship and is not disposed to surrender it unless the husband shall take possession, nor will it permit a doubtful or constructive possession to defeat it. For where there is a possession in the husband which may be referred to his character of executor or to that of husband, it will, as we have seen, to protect the wife's right rather refer it to the former than the latter. And so where the possession might have been as trustee or as executor and trustee. Wall v. Tomlinson, 16 Ves. R. 413; Baker v. Hall, 12 Ves. R. 496. See also Smith v. Scudder, 11 Serg. & Rawle 325; Blakey v. Newby's adm'r, 6 Munf. 64.

Now in the present case the interest of the wife is not a reversion expectant upon a life estate but it is a future interest far more uncertain and contingent. It is a right to slaves thereafter to be born and which only came in esse after the death of her husband. It was therefore a subject which from its character was not susceptible of any thing in the nature of a possession by John Deshazor in his lifetime nor did he assign it or exercise ownership or do any other act in regard to it which by the most liberal construction could be regarded as a substitute for or as equivalent to a reduction into possession. Every reason which would save to the wife her right of survivorship in the case of a reversionary interest would seem to apply in full or stronger force: and I am therefore of opinion that the increase of the three 194 slaves named born after the *death of John Deshazor did not belong to his estate but were the property of Mrs. Deshazor, and that the appellees can maintain no claim to them whatever.

But if this were otherwise, there is another ground upon which as it seems to me, the appellees must fail. Their bill filed in 1843 sets up this identical claim to the increase of the three women born after the death of John Deshazor which of course included the reversion of the third after the death of Mrs. Deshazor and prayed distribution to be made between them and Mrs. Deshazor (upon the concession that she was entitled to a life estate in a third) and an account of hires and profits. Mrs. Deshazor in her answer pleads the statute of limitations and relies upon the decree of partition of the County court in 1826 as a bar to the claim. But she also directly denies the right of the appellees to any of the slaves born after the death of John Deshazor and insists that they were her property and not the property of his estate. Upon these issues the case was heard in 1845 and a decree pronounced in general terms dismissing the bill with costs. No grounds are specified as those on which the decree was based nor is there any reservation of the right to sue at a future period for the third conceded to be properly held by Mrs. Deshazor for her life: and in the absence of any specification of the grounds on which it was based and of such a reservation, the decree must be taken to rest upon each and all of the issues presented by the pleadings and must be regarded as a final adjudication of the entire right, as well that to the two-thirds then claimed as to the remaining third now sought to be recovered.

I am of opinion to reverse the decree and dismiss the bill.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Decree reversed.

195 *Daniel & als. v. Leitch.

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

(Absent, ALLEN, P., and DANIEL, J.)

1. Purchase of Land Subject to Deed of Trust—Primary Fund for Payment of Debts—Case at Bar.—D purchases a tract of land on which there is a deed of trust to secure a debt which the creditor may enforce by a sale of the land whenever he may direct, and D retains the amount of the debt out of the purchase money for the purpose of paying it. D dies largely indebted, to a much greater amount than can be paid out of his personal estate. The land is the primary fund for the payment of the debt: and the widow of D is not entitled to have it discharged out of his personal estate.

2. Same—Suit by Widow to Have Land Sold.†—In such a case the widow may institute a suit in equity to have the land sold and the debt paid, and to have her dower out of the residue of the purchase money.

3. Same—Same—Case at Bar.—In her bill the widow states that the personal estate will not be sufficient to pay the debts, and that it will be necessary to sell the land for this purpose, and that it will be greatly for the interest of the heirs of D, who are infants, to have the land sold, and after paying the debts, to invest the balance of the purchase money in some of the slaves of her husband's estate which are of peculiar value to them; and she asks for a sale of the land, the payment of the debt secured on the land, and the investment of the proceeds of sale after payment of debts in these slaves. She also prays that if the trust creditor will consent to it, that the land may be sold subject to the trust: but this the creditor declines.—The addition of this prayer does not vitiate the proceedings as against the infant heirs; but the decree directing a sale of the lands and the payment of the trust debt, a purchaser under the decree may obtain a valid title to the land sold, and will be compelled to complete his purchase.

4. Sale of Infants' Lands—Sale Confirmed—Reasonable Time to Perfect Title.‡—A sale of a part of the land having been made under a decree in the suit by the widow, and that sale having been confirmed by the court, even if the proceeding was irregular as to the infant heirs, yet the purchaser will not be discharged from his purchase if the title can be perfected within a reasonable time: And the guardian of the infants having filed his bill according to the statute, in which he asks to have the sale confirmed as very beneficial to the infants, the court may in that case confirm the sale, and thus assure to the purchaser a good title against the infant heirs; and compel him to complete his purchase.

196 *5. Same—Same—Same.—After a sale of infants land has been confirmed by the court although the proceeding has been irregular, yet if the title of the purchaser can be made good, and it is for the interest of the infants to confirm the sale, the purchaser will not be released from his purchase; but if the interest of the infants is injured by the sale it will be set aside.

Purchase of Land Subject to Deed of Trust—Primary Funds for Payment of Debts.—In Gayle v. Wilson, 30 Gratt. 173, it is said: "As between the vendor and the purchaser of the equity of redemption, the land is the primary fund for the liquidation of the incumbrance. See Daniel v. Leitch, 13 Gratt. 195, 206; Jumel v. Jumel, 7 Paige R. 591, 11 Paige 28; Stebbins v. Hall, 29 Barb. R. 524; Jones on Mortgages, §§ 736, 740-8-9, 756."

See also, Osborne v. Cabell, 77 Va. 467, where the principal case is cited.

†Same—Suit by Widow to Have Land Sold.—In Morris v. Peyton, 10 W. Va. 8, the court said: "There can be no more doubt in this case, than there was in the case of Daniel v. Leitch, 13 Gratt. 195, that at the death of Peyton, his widow had a right of dower in the said tract of land, subject to the vendor's lien. She had a clear right to relieve the land from that incumbrance, in order to make her claim to dower available. 'She was entitled to go into equity to have the land sold, the incumbrance discharged, and her right of dower in the surplus secured to her.' (Id.) If, then, she could be complainant, a fortiori she should be made a defendant to a suit like this."

In Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 2, it is said, distinguishing the principal case, "A widow cannot bring a suit in chancery to have all the lands of her husband sold, and out of the proceeds of such sale to have the value of her dower paid, and the residue paid to the creditors of her husband, and if any surplus remains, to have it divided among her children, the sole heirs of her husband."

‡Sale of Infants' Lands—Sale Confirmed—Reasonable Time to Perfect Title.—The principal case is cited and followed in the following cases: Thomas v. Davidson, 76 Va. 343; Berlin v. Melhorn, 75 Va. 642; Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 710; Robinson v. Shacklett, 29 Gratt. 108; Long v. Weller, 29 Gratt. 351; Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Gratt. 530; Brock v. Rice, 27 Gratt. 816; Crawford v. Weller, 23 Gratt. 850; Jones v. Tatum, 19 Gratt. 737, and note; Cooper v. Hepburn, 15 Gratt. 568; Hurt v. Miller, 95 Va. 42, 27 S. E. Rep. 831; Carr v. Carr, 88 Va. 789, 14 S. E. Rep. 368; Terry v. 6. Judicial Sales—Discretion of Court in Giving Time to Perfect Title.—Courts of equity have at least as large a discretion in giving time to perfect the title in cases of sales under their decrees, as in cases of purchases by private contract.

In the year 1823 the late Judge William Daniel borrowed of the president, masters and professors of William and Mary College the sum of five thousand dollars, for which he executed to them his bond with sureties payable on demand, with interest to be paid semiannually until the principal was demanded, and he at the same time executed a deed by which he conveyed to Edmund Christian, the bursar of the college, a tract of land called Broomfield, of some fifteen hundred acres, lying on both sides of Willis' creek in the county of Cumberland, in trust to secure the same; in which it was provided that upon the failure of said Daniel to pay the said semiannual interest as it fell due, or the principal sum when demanded, the trustee should sell the said tract of land for cash, and out of the proceeds of sale should pay the debt. This land was devised by Judge Daniel to his three daughters, two of whom were married; and the husbands and daughters in June 1841 sold and conveyed the same to John Daniel. Up to this time the interest on the debt to the college had been paid; and the vendors paid to John Daniel out of the purchase money five thousand dollars to discharge the lien of the college upon the land. The balance of the purchase money was paid.

In 1850 John Daniel died, leaving a widow, Mary Ann Daniel, and two infant children; and Archibald C. Page qualified as his administrator. At this time the debt to the college had not been paid; and John Daniel was largely indebted, to much more than the value of his whole personal estate.

197 *In February 1851 Mrs. Mary Ann Daniel filed her bill in the Circuit court of the county of Cumberland, in which she set out the foregoing facts. She stated that the whole estate left by her husband both real and personal was estimated at about thirty thousand dollars, of which the said tract of land was estimated at twelve thousand dollars; and that his debts would probably exceed twenty-three thousand dollars. That if the whole personal estate including the negroes were applied to the payment of the debts in the ordinary course of administration, the land would still be required to satisfy the demands of the creditors, and the real estate remaining would be unprofitable to herself and her infant children, as they would have no means of cultivating it; and if rented out, it would deteriorate in value: And from what she had learned, she apprehended the college were unwilling longer to continue the loan of five thousand dollars, which they were entitled to recall at pleasure.

She further stated, that among the slaves belonging to the estate, there were some family servants who were very valuable, and from their good qualities and long association and early attachments, were of peculiar value to herself and her children: And that if the property left to them after the payment of the debts should be in slaves instead of land, it would be more agreeable to their feelings and more conducive to their pecuniary interests. And having made parties defendants to the bill the administrator of John Daniel, and his infant children, the trustee Christian and the College and the executor of Judge Daniel, she prayed for a settlement of the administrator's accounts, and for an account of the unadministered estate of John Daniel real and personal, and also of debts due which had been paid by the administrator, and the character of those debts. That the court would decree a sale of the said tract of land, subject to the trust in 198 *favor of the college, if the college and the executor of Judge Daniel were willing to continue the loan of the five thousand dollars with the provisions in the deed of trust specified; but if they were not willing to continue the loan, then that the land should be sold and the said debt paid out of the proceeds of sale, and that the residue of said proceeds should be applied to the payment of the debts due from John Daniel deceased. That if any of the property could be saved for herself and the children, the administrator should be directed to reserve such of the slaves as would be most profitable to them; and that the said slaves, or a certain number of them equal in value to the residue of the proceeds of the sale of the land after the payment of the debt to the college, be held by herself and her children, subject to the laws of descent which are applicable to such estate.

The president, masters and professors of William and Mary college and the trustee Christian and the executor of Judge Daniel answered, declining to permit the land to be sold subject to the trust of 1823, but expressing themselves willing that it should be sold and the debt be paid. The administrator Page also answered, stating that the estate was very much involved in debt, and expressing his belief that the personal estate was not sufficient to discharge the indebtedness, and that the real estate would have to be applied to that purpose. He stated that he had just settled an account of his administration before one of the commissioners of the court, the report of which, with a statement of the outstanding debts, and the amount of assets real and personal, he filed with his answer, which he believed was a true exhibit of the condition of his intestate's estate. The infants answered by guardian ad litem.

The report filed by the administrator showed that there were in his hands

199 proceeds of sales of personal *estate not then due, of one thousand four hundred and two dollars and forty-eight cents; that the slaves and other personal estate in his hands were estimated at nine thousand five hundred dollars; and that the ascertained outstanding debts amounted to twenty thousand one hundred and forty-three dollars and fifty cents; showing a deficiency of personal assets to pay the debts, of eight thousand eight hundred and thirty-three dollars and sixty-three cents. The real estate consisted of the tract of land before mentioned of fifteen hundred and seventy-six acres, estimated by the commissioner at eight dollars and fifty cents per acre, or thirteen thousand three hundred and ninety-six dollars.

The cause came on to be heard on the 26th of March 1851, when the court, reciting that it appeared the college desired the payment of the debt of five thousand dollars secured by the deed of trust on the land in the bill and proceedings mentioned; that the personal estate of John Daniel deceased was to a considerable extent insufficient to discharge his debts, and that his real estate was chargeable with the same, decreed that the said tract should be sold on the premises at public auction on a credit, altogether or in separate parcels, as might be considered most likely to secure the best price; five thousand dollars of the purchase money to be paid in one year from the day of sale, and the balance in two equal annual instalments thereafter; that bonds and good security were to be executed by the purchaser and the title retained as additional security. And two commissioners were appointed to execute the decree, one of whom was the counsel of the plaintiff.

In August 1851 the commissioners returned their report. They say that on the 30th of July, the time specified in the advertisements and notices, and the day succeeding, there was cloudy weather and rain.
200 *The following day, the first of August, was fair and a considerable number of persons attended the sale; and that the land lying on the east of Willis' river, amounting according to a survey made some years before by which they sold it, to six hundred and twenty-four and one-half acres, was knocked out to William Leitch at sixteen dollars per acre, making the sum of nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-two dollars.

The cause came on again to be heard on the 29th of August, when the court confirmed the sale, and the commissioners were authorized to retain the purchaser's bonds and collect the same as they fell due. And it being suggested that the purchaser would probably prefer paying the whole or a portion of the purchase money before it fell due, the commissioners were authorized to receive any such payment, discounting the same at the rate of six per centum per annum for the time for which the payment was anticipated: And they were directed after paying the expenses of the sale, to pay off the debt due to the college, and to pay over the residue to the administrator of John Daniel, to be applied by him in payment of the debts due from the estate of his intestate.

And the commissioners were further authorized to sell that portion of the said tract of land lying west of Willis' river, either at public or private sale, upon terms stated in the decree. And the death of the defendant Christian was suggested.

In March 1852 the commissioners reported that Leitch the purchaser of the land had paid, on the 2d of October 1851, six thousand two hundred and ninety-eight dollars and thirty cents, paying off two of his bonds, and giving him a credit of one hundred and twenty-five dollars on his bond last due. That after paying the expenses of the sale they had paid to William and Mary college their debt, amounting 201 to *five thousand and sixty-nine dollars and sixteen cents; and that they had paid over the balance in their hands, amounting to one thousand and forty-one dollars and one cent, to the administrator of John Daniel. And they reported that they had obtained from the president, masters and professors of William and Mary college a deed releasing the trust given by Judge Daniel to secure the debt, and that the bond had been delivered to them: And the deed and bond were returned with the report.

At the same March term of the court William Leitch, the purchaser of the land aforesaid, presented his petition to be made a party defendant in the cause and to have the sale of the land set aside. After setting out all the proceedings in the cause down to the last report of the commissioners, he says, Of the proceedings in the said cause he had no knowledge until within a few days past. He saw the advertisement made by the commissioners in the newspapers, and spoke of becoming a bidder. He then heard it suggested that the proceedings had in the case were perhaps not exactly regular, but the suggestion made no impression on his mind; and supposing that all things had been rightly done in the cause, he attended the sale and was a bidder as aforesaid. Afterwards and before paying a cent of the purchase money, he out of abundant caution sought a conversation with one of the commissioners, who was the lawyer who had conducted all the proceedings in the suit. That the said commissioner assured him that all things had been rightly done, and that in that suit a good title would be made to him for the land he had purchased; and he therefore paid to the commissioners the sum of six thousand two hundred and ninety-eight dollars and twenty cents.

He further stated that he had been advised that the sale made in the suit 202 was absolutely null and void. *That the widow not being a creditor of the estate, had no right to bring a suit for the sale of her deceased husband's real estate; and that the real estate of infants can be sold under the decree of a Circuit court only where the decree is made in a suit brought by the guardian of the infants, and prosecuted according to the mode prescribed by the statute regulating the manner in which the real estate of infants may be sold. He charged that his purchase was made and money paid under decrees that were void, and that a good title could not be made to him in the suit; and he prayed that he might be made a party in the cause; that he might be restored to the position he occupied before his purchase; that the money he had paid might be returned to him, and that his bond for the balance of the purchase money might be delivered up to him; and that the court would make all other orders and decrees that might be necessary to protect his just rights and to remedy the injury which had been done to him.

In July 1852 Archibald C. Page was appointed by the County court of Cumberland guardian of the two infant children of John Daniel deceased; and in August he as their guardian filed his bill in the Circuit court of Cumberland for the purpose of having a confirmation of the sale to Leitch, and a sale of the remainder of the tract. To this bill the infants, and the person who would be their heir if they died during infancy, their mother and Leitch were parties defendants. The proceedings in the former suit were set out, and it was alleged that the sale of the land was made at a high price, and that it would be very injurious to the infants to set it aside; and he prays that it may be sustained, and that the purchaser may be quieted in his title.

The bill further set out the other property of the estate of John Daniel deceased;
203 which consisted of *slaves and the remainder of the tract of land before mentioned. It alleged that there was a large amount of debt yet due, and that it was very much for the interest of the infants that the remaining lands should be sold and applied to the payment of the debts; and that the slaves should be retained.

The heir of the infants and their guardian ad litem answered, occurring in the opinion that the confirmation of the sale to Leitch and the sale of the other land would be beneficial to the infants. Leitch answered, denying that the proceedings in Mrs. Daniel's suit were valid, or that he was bound to abide by his purchase when every party was at perfect liberty to repudiate it. He insisted that in this suit the land of the infants could only be passed from them by a sale, and to such a sale he had no objection; but he positively objected to be bound where no other person concerned was bound. And he asked that the sale made in the other suit might be declared null and void.

The bill and proceedings in this suit seem to have been in strict conformity to the statute in relation to the sale of infants' lands, if the application to confirm the sale already made was proper.

In January 1853 another bill was filed in the same court by Thomas M. Powers, a creditor of John Daniel, in behalf of himself and of all the other creditors, in which he sought to enforce the sale of the land to Leitch. To this bill Leitch set up the same objections to the validity and confirmation of the sale as in the previous suit by the guardian, and in his petition.

On the 9th of March 1853 the three causes came on to be heard together, the first upon the papers formerly read and the petition of Leitch, when the court held that Mary Ann Daniel, the plaintiff in the first suit, had no right to institute that 204 suit, and that neither the *infant heirs or any guardian that might be appointed for them were bound by the decree rendered therein; and that Leitch could not have obtained a good title to the land purchased by him under that decree. And as he could not have obtained a good title under that decree, he was entitled to be discharged from his purchase, notwithstanding the now guardians of the infants, and the creditors of John Daniel, at the time of the hearing of the causes, expressed their willingness to ratify the sale as set forth in the bills in the second and third of said causes. And the court further held that as the debt due to the college was a primary charge upon the land, and that debt had been paid out of the money received from Leitch, he was entitled to be substituted to the rights of the creditor, and to have the land sold to reimburse him; and commissioners were appointed to examine and report what part of said land would be sufficient to discharge said debt, and could be sold with least inconvenience to the heirs and widow of John Daniel; and whether the land could be sold most advantageously altogether or in parcels. And it was decreed that Page should pay to Leitch the sum of one thousand and forty-one dollars and one cent, paid to him under the former decree by the commissioners, with interest from the date of its receipt; and that the decree directing the commissioners to collect the balance remaining unpaid on Leitch's third bond be set aside, and that they should return the bond to the clerk of the court.

In the third cause the court decreed accounts of the debts due from the estate of John Daniel, and that the administrator settle his accounts before a commissioner of the court. And the same commissioner was directed to report the gross value of the whole tract of land, and separately the value of the part lying on the east and west of Willis' river, as also the annual 205 values of *the whole and the separate parts; and also the personal assets remaining in the hands of the administrator, and their value.

The report of the commissioner showed that after charging the administrator with the sum of one thousand and forty-one dollars and one cent, received as before stated, he was in advance to the estate on the 1st of July 1853, four hundred and forty-eight dollars and seventy-six cents. That he had paid debts binding the heirs, eleven thousand five hundred and twenty-four dollars and forty-one cents; debts by simple contract, two thousand and twelve dollars and two cents. That the whole tract of land was of the value of twelve thousand five hundred and twelve dollars; the land on the east side of Willis' river was of the value of six thousand two hundred and forty-five dollars, and that on the west of the river, of six thousand five hundred and seventy-six dollars and fifty cents; the annual value of the whole was four hundred and fifty dollars; that on the east of the river was two hundred and fifty dollars, and that on the west was one hundred and fifty dollars; and the rents due from Leitch, five hundred dollars. The personal assets in the hands of the administrator consisting, except as to five hundred dollars, wholly of slaves, were valued at thirteen thousand five hundred dollars; the debts still due binding the heirs amounted to fourteen thousand six hundred and sixty-two dollars and seventy-two cents, and by simple contract, to four thousand seven hundred and ten dollars and thirty-two cents. There were other liabilities reported, amounting to two thousand one hundred and sixty-three dollars and thirty-three cents; thus making the whole assets, real and personal, twenty-six thousand five hundred and twelve dollars; and the whole debts, twenty-one thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars and thirty-three cents.

On the 8th of August 1853 the 206 causes came on *again to be heard, when the court confirmed the report to which there was no exception; and it appearing that the payment of the debts would exhaust the whole personal estate and would require for their payment the sale of the greater portion of the real estate of John Daniel; and the court being of opinion that it was clearly shown, independent of the admissions in the answer, that the interest of the infants would be promoted and that the rights of no person would be violated by a sale of the real estate, and by investing the proceeds of sale, so far as the same might not be required in aid of the personalty, for the payment of debts, in the slaves left by the said John Daniel, it was decreed that Archibald C. Page, who was appointed a commissioner for the purpose, should sell the land lying east of Willis' river at public auction upon a credit of one and two years; and that he should sell the land on the west side of the river either at public or private sale altogether or in parcels, upon the like credit, &c. From the decrees of the 9th of March and 8th of August 1853, the widow and infant children of John Daniel applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

The Attorney General and Patton, for the appellants.

Morson and Robinson, for the appellee.

MONCURE, J. The tract of land called Broomfield, and not the personal estate of John Daniel, was the primary fund for the payment of the debt of five thousand dollars due to the president and masters or professors of William and Mary college, and secured by deed of trust on the land. When land is sold subject to a mortgage as part of the consideration money, the grantee, as between himself and the grantor, is bound to pay, and is liable to an action on the part of the grantor for breach of con-207 tract in not paying the *debt; but the grantee does not become personally liable to the mortgagee without some promise made to him; and even a promise made to him, does not always change the primary liability from the mortgaged land to the personal estate of the grantee. It must be made with intention to have that effect. For the authorities on this subject, see 1 Leading Cases in Equity 415–440, 65 Law Libr. 432–456. Though the land in question was conveyed by the devisees of Judge Daniel to John Daniel, with covenant of general warranty, it was in effect conveyed subject to the incumbrance of the deed of trust; the debt secured by which was part of the consideration money. The latter undertook with the former, and was bound to them, to discharge the incumbrance; but he had no communication, and made no contract for that purpose with the creditor.

At the death of John Daniel, his widow the appellant Mary Ann Daniel, had a right of dower in the said tract of land subject to the said deed of trust; in other words, in equity of redemption. Heth v. Cocke & wife, 1 Rand. 344. The land being the primary fund for the payment of the debt secured by the deed of trust, she had no right to have it paid out of the personal estate, even if that had not been, as it was, required for the payment of his other debts, to which it was wholly inadequate. She had a clear right to redeem the land and disengage it from the incumbrance, in order to make her own cliam beneficial or available. 2 Story's Eq. Jur. § 1023. She was entitled to go into a court of equity to have the land sold, the incumbrance discharged, and her right of dower in the surplus secured to her. The creditor was unwilling to wait longer for the debt, and a sale of the land for its payment was necessary. The trustee in the deed might have sold it without any decree for the purpose.
208 He might have sold the *whole tract, as the deed provided for a sale of the whole; and in that case the surplus would have been subject to the rights of the widow and heirs to be adjusted and secured by the decree of a court of equity. The trustee was in declining health, and probably was not able to execute the trust. He died pending the suit, and shortly after it was brought. The creditor might have come into a court of equity in consequence of the death of the trustee or his inability to act, and had the land sold, the debt paid, and the surplus disposed of, as before mentioned, under a decree of the court. Or the widow and heirs or any or either of them might have brought a suit for the same purpose. It was not material by which of these parties the suit was brought, so that it was brought for that purpose, and the necessary parties were made.

The suit brought by the appellant Mary Ann Daniel was substantially, I think, a suit of that kind. Her bill set forth all the necessary facts, and made all proper parties. She expressed her fears, from information received, that the president and masters or professors of William and Mary college were unwilling longer to continue the loan, which under the deed they had a right to recall at their pleasure. And she prayed, in effect, that if they were unwilling to do so, the land should be sold with a clear title to the purchaser, and out of the proceeds of sale, after paying the expenses thereof, the debt of five thousand dollars with any interest which might be then due thereon should be paid, and that the surplus should be invested in the purchase of such of the slaves of her husband (some of whom were represented as of peculiar value) as would likely be most profitable to her and her children, to be held by them subject to the laws of descent which are applicable to real estate.

If this had been the whole frame of 209 the bill, there could have been no *objection to it in form or substance. I see no impropriety in the prayer that the residue of the proceeds of sale of the land after paying off the incumbrance should be invested in the purchase of slaves to be held as real estate. Though the court could not have converted land into slaves in such a suit merely because the interest of the widow and heirs required it; yet having properly converted the land into money for the purpose of discharging the incumbrance, it might properly invest the surplus in any subject which the interest of the widow and heirs might require, provided the subject retained the character of realty. At all events, it could not be contended that a prayer for such an investment would invalidate the sale of the land.

But the bill prays for other and alternative relief, which it is supposed rendered the sale null and void. It prays for a sale of the land subject to the incumbrance, if the president and masters or professors of William and Mary college and the executor of Judge Daniel were willing to continue the loan. There would seem to be little substantial difference between a sale of the land and payment of the debt out of the proceeds, and a sale of the land subject to the payment of the debt. In either case the amount of the debt would, in effect, be a part of the price of the land. In the one case, it would be paid immediately; in the other, it would be assumed by the purchaser and paid by him afterwards. The chief difference would seem to consist in the accommodation which the latter mode would afford to the purchaser, and the enhancement of the sale which it would probably occasion. In either mode, the widow and heirs would realize the value of the equity of redemption, to be disposed of for their benefit and according to their respective rights. But let it be conceded that in 210 this *suit there could properly have been no sale of the land subject to the incumbrance; and that the prayer for such a sale was an improper prayer. Would its insertion in the bill affect the sale? I think not. At most it would be mere surplusage, there being enough in the bill to sustain the propriety of the decree which was made. The president and masters or professors of William and Mary college and the executor of Judge Daniel were unwilling to continue the loan. This rendered the prayer for a sale of the land subject to the incumbrance ineffectual; and made it necessary to proceed on the alternative prayer for a sale of the land and payment of the incumbrance out of the proceeds. The decree was such a one as might well have been made if the bill had been properly framed, and had contained no superfluous allegation or prayer. And the sale was made according to the decree. It is the business of a purchaser at a judicial sale to see that all the persons who are necessary to convey the title are before the court, and that the sale is made according to the decree. But he "will not be affected by error in the decree, such as not giving an infant a day to show cause, in cases in which a day ought to be given; or decreeing a sale of lands to satisfy judgment debts without an account of personal estate." 2 Daniel's Ch. Pr. 1456; Bennett v. Hamill, 2 Sch. & Lef. 566; Lloyd v. Johnes, 9 Ves. R. 37. A fortiori he will not be affected by any imperfection in the frame of the bill, if it contain sufficient matter to show the propriety of the decree. No more of the estate was sold in this case than was proper for the purpose of paying off the incumbrance: And that portion of it was sold which the convenience of the owner required. This is shown by the fact, that after the sale was set aside the Circuit court decreed a resale of the very same portion for the purpose of refunding to the purchaser

211 *the amount of the incumbrance which had been discharged out of the purchase money paid by him. But if more of the estate had been sold than was necessary to discharge the incumbrance, the purchaser could make no objection to it, "the decree being a sufficient security to him, as it cannot appear but that it was right to sell the whole." 1 Sugd. on Vend. 68. (In fact, the deed of trust in this case provided for a sale of the whole.) Nor is he answerable for any disposition which the court may make of the purchase money. Brown v. Wallace, 4 Gill & John. 479. Nor for any error which the court may afterwards commit in decreeing a sale of the residue of the land. According to these views there was no defect in the title of the purchaser under the decree in this case.

But if there had been such defect I am of opinion that it was not incurable; and that it might, and ought to have been cured by a decree of confirmation in one or both of the other suits which were brought for that purpose. The highest bidder at a judicial sale is not considered as the purchaser until the report of sale is confirmed. Until then, according to the English practice, he has no right to resell at a profit, except for the benefit of the owner of the estate. He is not liable to any loss by fire or otherwise, which may happen to the estate. Nor is he entitled to the benefit of any material appreciation of the estate by the accidental falling in of lives or by other means. Heywood v. Covington's heirs, 4 Leigh 373; Taylor v. Cooper, 10 Leigh 317. As the chief aim of the court is to obtain as great a price for the estate as possible, it is in the habit, under certain regulations, of opening the biddings. 1 Sugd. on Vend. 84. It is unnecessary to enquire how far the English practice in these respects has been departed from in Virginia. Our courts certainly exercise a large discretion in 212 refusing to confirm *a report of sale, and in ordering a resale of property sold under a decree. They will not confirm a report of sale and compel a purchaser to complete his purchase when there is any defect of title of which he had no knowledge when the sale was made. Nor will they confirm it when the directions of the decree in regard to the sale have not been pursued, if either party object to such confirmation. Accordingly, in Talley &c. v. Starke's adm'r, 6 Gratt. 339, in which the land was not sold on the premises as directed by the decree, and the confirmation of the report was opposed by two of the purchasers on that ground; this court, for that and other reasons, reversed the decree of confirmation; saying that inasmuch as the purchasers could not have enforced their contracts, if resisted by the parties in the cause, they ought not to be compelled to perfect them. If therefore there was any defect in the title which the purchaser could acquire under the decree in this case, the court on his motion would have refused to confirm the report of sale, and discharged him from his purchase.

But after confirmation of a report of sale, without any objection on the part of the purchaser, his rights and obligations are very different. His inchoate contract is then perfected, and the court has a right to compel him to complete his purchase. He has still a right, according to the English practice, to have an order to enquire whether a good title can be made to him. But he may waive that enquiry; and if he pay the purchase money and enter into possession of the property, he will generally be considered as having waived the enquiry and accepted the title. 1 Sugd. on Vend. 73. In Virginia it would seem that the proper time for making objections to the title, and for having an enquiry, if one is desired, is before the confirmation of the report. Threlkeld v. Campbell, 2 Gratt. 198;
213 *Young's adm'r v. McClung, 9 Gratt. 336. There are certainly some defects to which objection may be made by a purchaser even after confirmation, here as well as in England: such, for example, as a defect arising from a want of jurisdiction, or want of parties, which would prevent a purchaser from getting the title intended to be sold and conveyed to him. But there is this difference between such an objection made before and after confirmation; that in the former case, if the objection be well founded, the purchaser will be discharged peremptorily; whereas, in the latter, he will be discharged only if the defect be incurable, or be not cured in a reasonable time. A complete contract having, in the latter case, been made between the court and the purchaser, the court has the same right which any other vendor has to cure defects and perfect the title, provided it be done in a reasonable time, so as to occasion no injury to the purchaser. On a reference as to title in a suit for specific performance the enquiry generally is, Whether the vendor can, not whether he could make a title at the time of entering into the agreement? If a good title can be shown at any time before the master's report, and even after the report, if the vendor can satisfy the court that he can make a good title by clearing up the objections reported by the master, the court will generally make a decree in his favor. See 2 Daniel's Ch. Pr. 1195, and notes; Seton v. Slade, 3 Leading Cases in Equity 392, 72 Law Libr. 14. "Where (says Lord Eldon) the master's report is that the vendor getting in a term or getting administration, &c. will have a title, the court will put him under terms to procure that speedily." Coffin v. Cooper, 14 Ves. R. 205. In which case it was held that the purchaser could not insist on being discharged from the contract, the vendor having procured a good title by 214 means of an act of parliament, *although upwards of a month after the master's report. It is true that in a case where there was error in the decree under which the estate was sold the purchaser was discharged, upon motion, from his purchase, although the parties were proceeding to rectify it: Lord Eldon, who decided the case, saying that he would not extend the rule which the court had adopted, of compelling a purchaser to take the estate when a title is not made till after the contract, to any case to which it had not already been applied. Lechmere v. Brasier, 2 Jac. & Walk. 287. I have no doubt of the correctness of the decision of that case, in which it seems a good title could not have been made until an infant heir became of age. But I cannot see why the same rule which applies to ordinary cases, should not apply to a judicial sale in this respect. The court considers itself to have greater power over the contract of sale when it is made under a decree, than when it is made between party and party. 2 Daniel's Ch. Pr. 1465. And it may therefore exercise at least as much discretion in affording parties an opportunity of perfecting the title in the former as in the latter case. In the subsequent case of Chamberlain v. Lee, 10 Sim. R. 444, 16 Eng. Ch. R. 445, the case of Lechmere v. Brasier was not considered as making a judicial sale an exception to the general rule; but it being discovered after the sale of an estate under a decree, and after the confirmation of the report of sale, that a small portion of the estate was the property of another person, the court would not discharge the purchaser from his contract, without giving the vendor an opportunity of acquiring a title to that portion. In the case of Crawle v. Meem, 8 Gratt. 496, land in which infants were interested was sold under a decree prematurely made, and the report of sale was confirmed: it was 215 held that although *it was competent for the court, the proceedings being interlocutory, to set them aside in the further progress of the cause, upon its appearing that they were prejudicial to the interests of the infants; yet, on the other hand, it appearing to be beneficial to them, there could be no good reason for disturbing them in behalf of any other party. This court was of opinion that the sale should be established or set aside, according as the Circuit court should consider it to be advantageous to the infant heirs. I can see little or no difference, in principle, between that case and this. There, as here, infants were interested in the land decreed to be sold, and the report of sale was confirmed before any objection was made by the purchaser. There, as here, the purchaser contended that he was not bound because the infants were not bound. But the court in that case held, as I think it ought in this, that as the ground of objection to the title might be removed by a further decree of the court, the sale should be established and the purchaser compelled to complete his purchase if the interest of the infants required it.

Whatever defect or irregularity there may have been in the proceedings in this case, it is not pretended that there was any fraud or unfairness on the part of those by whom or for whose benefit they were conducted. They bona fide believed that the proceedings were all right and legal, and that a good title could and would be conveyed to the purchaser. This gives them a strong claim on the consideration of the court in the exercise of its discretion to compel the purchaser to complete his purchase. On the other hand, the purchaser, while it cannot be said that he has been guilty of any bad faith or unfairness, has certainly no just claim on the court to interpose in his favor and discharge him from his purchase.
216 He did not file his *petition until after the sale had been confirmed, the possession of the land delivered to him, the greater part of the purchase money paid by him, the amount so paid applied to the discharge of the incumbrance, and otherwise according to the direction of the court, and the land released from the lien of the deed of trust; nor until nine months after the sale. The excuse assigned in his petition for not filing it sooner, was that he had no knowledge of the proceedings in the cause until within a few days past. Though he admits that when he saw the advertisement of the sale in the newspapers and spoke of becoming a bidder, he heard it suggested that the proceedings had in the case were perhaps not exactly regular, but says the suggestion made no impression on his mind, and supposing that all things had been rightly done in the cause, he attended the sale and became a bidder. Notwithstanding the admonition he had thus early received, he took no step, either before or after the sale, until a few days before the filing of his petition, to inform himself of the correctness of the proceedings, or to obtain the advice of counsel in regard to the title; but chose to rely on a conversation, which he says he sought and had before he paid one cent of the money, with one of the commissioners, who was the lawyer that conducted all the proceedings; and who, he says, in that conversation assured him that all things had been rightly done in the suit, and that a good title would therein be made to him. This assurance being fairly given, it is not perceived in what manner it can help the purchaser. Under these circumstances, he had no right to demand an absolute discharge from his purchase, even if the title was defective; but the utmost extent of the belief to which he was entitled was to be discharged if the defect could not, or in a reasonable time should not, be cured. The defect, if 217 any, *was curable; and in a reasonable time could have been cured, by a decree in one or both of the suits brought for that purpose, as soon as convenient after the petition was filed. There was no unnecessary delay in the prosecution of those suits, which was not occasioned by the petitioner himself. He was the only reluctant party; against him alone the suits had to be regularly matured. All the other parties were anxious to confirm the sale. And at the first term after a guardian was appointed to the infants, his suit might have been matured, and a decree of confirmation made therein. Even as it was, both suits were soon matured for a decree, and on the 9th of March 1853 all three of the causes came on to be heard together, when the purchaser was discharged from his purchase. Instead of that, the court should have confirmed the sale, and held him to his purchase. For it then clearly appeared from the proceedings in each and all of the suits, that the interest of all parties concerned required a confirmation of the sale, except perhaps the purchaser, who certainly had no right to complain of it. In a suit brought by a guardian for the sale of the real estate of his ward, under chap. 128 of the Code, p. 535, the court may confirm a sale already made, if the interest of the ward require it. Garland v. Loving, 1 Rand. 396. In that case it was held to be competent for the court to confirm a sale already made, provided the purchaser was willing to abide thereby. And it was argued by the counsel for the appellee in this case, that the court cannot confirm such a sale without the consent of the purchaser. Even if such consent be necessary in ordinary cases, (as to which I express no opinion,) it certainly cannot be in this case. All that the purchaser here can require is a good title; and he cannot prevent the court from giving it to him by withholding his consent to a decree of confirma-
218 tion. *See also Hughes & wife v. Johnston, 12 Gratt. 479.

I am therefore of opinion, that so much of the decree appealed from as discharged the appellee from his purchase, and directed the purchase money paid by him, or any part of it, to be refunded, and the land purchased by him to be resold, is erroneous, and ought to be reversed; that the sale made to him ought to be established and confirmed, and he compelled to complete his purchase; and that the cause should be remanded, to be further proceeded in according to the principles before expressed.

219 *Hepburn & als. v. Dundas & als.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

1. Emancipation of Slaves—Condition—Payment of Certain Sum—Case at Bar.—A deed of emancipation sets the slave free upon the payment of a certain sum, and the interest thereon, and provides that a receipt in full for the payment shall be taken as complete testimony of such discharge. The payment of the money may be inferred from circumstances; and it is not essential to produce the receipt.

2. Slaves—Emancipated—Heirs of.—There are three negroes, children of the same mother, born slaves, and the mother and children are afterwards emancipated. One of the three dies, having acquired real estate, intestate and without children. The mother is dead. The other two take the estate as heirs of the deceased sister.

3. Ejectment—Interest Allowed on Profits—Effect—Statute.†—Prior to the act, Code, ch. 177, § 14, p. 673, interest could not be allowed by a jury in an ejectment upon the profits; and the jury having allowed such interest it is mere surplusage, and the judgment will be for the principal sum and interest from the date of the verdict.‡

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of Alexandria county, instituted in April 1848, by the lessee of Moses Hepburn and Arthur Waring and Julianna his wife, persons of color, against James H. Dundas and others claiming as heirs at law of William Hepburn deceased, to recover a tenement in the city of Alexandria. The plaintiffs Moses and Julianna 220 *claimed as the brother and sister of Letty, a woman of color, and as such her heirs at law, to whom the property was devised by William Hepburn. The facts are stated by Judge Samuels in his opinion. The defendants demurred to the evidence; and the court below rendered a judgment upon the demurrer in favor of the defendants. And thereupon the plaintiffs applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

The case was elaborately argued by Wellford and Morson, for the appellants, and H. Winter Davis, for the appellees.

SAMUELS, J. This is an action of ejectment, brought before the Code of 1849 was enacted. It is therefore incumbent on the plaintiff to sustain his action by proving a right of entry in his lessors at the time the action was brought. The only evidence offered on the trial was that of the plaintiff; and to this the defendant demurred. We must, therefore, regard as fact every thing which was directly proved by the testimony, or which the jury might have fairly inferred from it.

It must, therefore, be taken as true, that the property sued for by the plaintiff and that held by the defendants is the same property. That William Hepburn had title in fee to the premises, and that he held possession, claiming such title from the year 1796, at least, until his death in the year 1817. That by his will he devised the same to Letty, sometimes called Letitia Hepburn, a woman of color, and a bastard. That Letty, by her guardian, or by her husband, had possession of the property from Hepburn's death until her own death in 1823 or 1824, 'after having had living issue, which died in her lifetime. That Letty's mother being dead, Moses and 221 Julianna, lessors of the *plaintiff, are the bastard brother and sister of Letty, and the only surviving issue of Letty's mother. That Grymes, the husband of Letty, held the property as tenant by the curtesy until his death in 1834. The question of capacity in Letty, Moses and Julianna respectively, to take or transmit

*Slaves—Emancipated—Heirs of.—In Blair v. Adams, 59 Fed. Rep. 245, it is said: "Under the statute of Virginia, which provides that, 'bastards also shall be capable of inheriting or of transmitting inheritance, on the part of their mother, in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of such mother,' the courts of that state have uniformly so held as to confer upon the bastard the capacity to inherit estates, real and personal, from the mother and any of her kindred, lineal and collateral, and transmit to the mother and such kindred in like manner as if he had been lawfully begotten of the mother. He is thus given a mother, uterine brothers and sisters, and other kindred on the part of the mother, but quoad the father he is regarded as quasi nullius filius. Garland v. Harrison, 8 Leigh 368 et seq.; Hepburn v. Dundas, 13 Gratt. 219; Bennett v. Toler, 15 Gratt. 588."

But the court in the above case distinguished the principal case and held that under the Texas statute a bastard did not transmit his estate through his deceased mother to her surviving brothers and sisters.

†Judgments—Interest—Statutes.—The principal case is cited in Lewis v. Arnold, 13 Gratt. 461.

‡Code, ch. 177, § 14, p. 673. "The jury in any action founded on contract, may allow interest on the principal due, or any part thereof, and fix the period at which such interest shall commence. And in any action for a cause arising hereafter, whether from contract or from tort, the jury may allow interest on the sum found by the verdict, or any part thereof, and fix the period at which the said interest shall commence. If a verdict be rendered hereafter which does not allow interest, the sum thereby found shall bear interest from its date, whether the cause of action arose heretofore, or shall arise hereafter, and judgment shall be entered accordingly."

the inheritance, turns upon the same facts. It appears that they were the children of Esther, a slave, the property of William Hepburn, and were thus born slaves. That Hepburn, on the 1st of February 1816, conveyed Esther and her said children to Hannah Jackson, a woman of color, the sister of Esther; (a question is made, to be considered hereafter, whether Hannah Jackson had capacity to acquire title to these slaves, or to emancipate them.) That Hannah Jackson executed a deed of emancipation, dated February 12, 1816, in due form of law, whereby she set free Esther and her children, if she had capacity in law to acquire and manumit slaves. In regard to this question of capacity, it appears that Hannah Jackson had been the slave of one John Harper. That Harper, on the 23d of October 1810, in consideration of one hundred and ninety-six dollars, sold and by deed conveyed Hannah to one William Goddard for the term of ten years, and no more; and at the end of that time, set her free; and also set free any child or children of Hannah, born during her servitude. This deed was executed in form to operate as a deed of prospective emancipation. On the 24th of October 1810, Goddard executed a deed of emancipation, setting Hannah free whenever payment of the said sum of one hundred and ninety-six dollars, and the interest thereon, should be made: and providing that the receipt in full for the payment should be taken and admitted as complete testimony of such discharge. These deeds were duly recorded December 2d, 1811. It is shown by the evidence that Hannah 222 Jackson acted as a free woman in *buying and holding property. The evidence is not clear as to the precise time at which she began so to act; but from the fact that the deeds of emancipation from Harper and Goddard respectively, were withheld from the record from October 1810 to December 1811, and then recorded, and that Hepburn, on the 1st February 1816, sold Esther and her children to Hannah, and that no question has been made by those interested to make one about the status of Hannah or of Esther and her children, it may be inferred that every thing was rightly done in regard to them on the 1st February 1816. There is no force, I conceive, in the objection that the payment of the hundred and ninety-six dollars and its interest could be proved only by Goddard's receipt. The deeds of emancipation and registry thereof, and the fact of payment, completed the manumission; and the payment is sufficiently shown by the circumstances above stated, which occurred soon after the date of Goddard's deed. The provision in regard to the receipt was intended for the benefit of the freed woman; to give it a weight and force beyond that usually given to a mere receipt; to make it complete testimony. I am of opinion that Hannah Jackson was a free woman on the 1st of February 1816; that Hepburn's conveyance of that date passed to her his title to Esther and her children; and that her deed of the 12th February 1816 was effectual to emancipate them.

Holding then that Letty had capacity to take and transmit the inheritance by descent, that Moses and Julianna were of capacity to take the inheritance if the law cast it upon them, the bastard brother and sister of Letty, the question is presented whether the law of descents did so cast the inheritance?

If the estate in controversy had been within the jurisdiction of Virginia, and subject to her laws at the time of Letty's death, there would have been 223 no *reason to doubt the right of Moses and Julianna, the bastard brother and sister, to succeed to her estate. The statute of October 1785, 12 Hen. Stat. p. 138, prescribes the course for descents of real estate. Section 16 enacts that "bastards also shall be capable of inheriting or transmitting inheritance on the part of their mother in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of such mother." The statute of October 1785 has been repeatedly re-enacted in Virginia with some modifications; the clause above cited, however, has always been re-enacted without change, and is now the law of Virginia. 1 Rev. Code of 1819, p. 357, § 18; p. 523, § 5. This court long since decided under this statute, that bastards might transmit inheritance collaterally on the part of the mother. Garland v. Harrison, 8 Leigh 368. This construction of the statute may now be regarded as the settled law of Virginia. It is said, however, and said truly, that at the time of Letty's death this property was beyond the jurisdiction of the state of Virginia, and that the law of that part of the district of Columbia in which it lay regulated the descent. Conceding this, it becomes necessary to ascertain what was the law in that locality. The congress of the United States was the legislature for the district of Columbia, having authority and charged with the duty to provide laws therein. It was accordingly enacted by the statute February 27, 1801, 2 Statutes at Large, p. — § 1, "that the laws of the state of Virginia, as they now exist, shall be and continue in force in that part of the district of Columbia which was ceded by the said state to the United States, and by them accepted for the permanent seat of government," &c. The statute of October 1785, as modified and re-enacted by the act of December 8, 1792, thus became the law of that part of the district of Columbia which is now the county of Alexandria, and 224 which includes *the property in controversy. Section 18 of the act of 1792 is the same as section 16 of the act of 1785 in regard to descents to or from bastards. Thus it is shown that the case of Garland v. Harrison, above cited, should rule this case, unless something is made to appear requiring a different ruling.

It is said that the Supreme court, in Stevenson's heirs v. Sullivant, 5 Wheat. R. 207, placed a different construction upon this clause of the statute of descents, holding that it prescribed transmission of inheritance lineally but not collaterally on the part of the mother of a bastard: that the Supreme court at the time of this descent cast was the court of the highest authority having jurisdiction over the locality in which the property was; and that the decisions of that court must have the same conclusive effect in settling the law within their local jurisdiction that the decisions of this court have in settling the law of Virginia. It must be conceded that all rights of property in Alexandria county, vested according to law whilst that territory was under the jurisdiction of the United States government, must be respected. This is required as well by natural justice as by the terms of the acts of congress and of the general assembly retroceding that territory to Virginia. We should give to any adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction therein the same binding force upon the parties to a suit, which their laws at the time imparted to such adjudications. We should generally allow to decisions of the Supreme court on questions of law arising in Alexandria county, whilst that tribunal was the local tribunal of the last resort therein, the same authoritative right in settling the law therein that we ascribe to decisions of this court in settling the law of Virginia. In fine, conceding every thing which can be claimed as giving obligatory force to decisions of the Supreme court on questions of law arising in 225 *Alexandria county, yet it is impossible to hold the decision in Stevenson's heirs v. Sullivant, 5 Wheat. R. 207, a decision upon the law of Alexandria county. Stevenson the intestate lived in Kentucky, and died in 1796. The land descended lay in the Nothwestern territory, now the state of Ohio. The suit was brought in Ohio. The state of Virginia, on the first of March 1784, by her deed of that date, ceded her territory lying north and west of the Ohio river to the United States; 11 Hen. Stat. 571; and from that time, by the express terms of the deed, her jurisdiction ceased in that quarter. The statute of October 1785 was not enacted until more than a year after the cession, and thus at no time was in force in the ceded territory. On the 13th of July 1787 the congress of the United States passed an ordinance for the government of the territory. This was before the death of Stevenson the intestate. By the second section of that ordinance a course of descents is prescribed, which excludes bastards from collateral succession to an inheritance. From this it is plain that neither the law of descents of Alexandria county or of Virginia was involved in the case before the Supreme court; that court obviously held that the law of Ohio governed the case; and as the law of Ohio was supposed to be not more favorable to the bastards than the law of Virginia, they placed a construction of the law of Virginia as showing the law of Ohio. The court decided nothing more than this, that by the law of Ohio collateral descents amongst bastards are not permitted. The reference to the Virginia law was by way of argument or illustration. There is no enactment by congress, nor any authoritative exposition of the law of descents by the Supreme court, to prevent the courts of Virginia for putting our own construction of this clause of the statute of descents in Alexandria whilst under the jurisdiction of the general government. In 226 *Virginia a single decision of this court on a question in the law of property long acquiesced in, or successive uniform decisions on such question, are regarded as settling the law; as establishing a canon of property. So after a construction has been put upon a statute, if the legislature re-enact such statute, the construction is regarded as having received, in some sort, a legislative sanction; as having correctly expounded the meaning of the law makers. The case of Garland v. Harrison was long since decided, and has never since been drawn in question until now; and the law thereby expounded has been re-enacted and a reference to the case placed upon the statute book. Thus stability has been imparted to the law as thereby declared, in all the forms in which it may be done. Regarding the decision of the court therein as now beyond question, I may yet be permitted to add that it rests upon a foundation so just, reasonable and consistent with the letter and spirit of the statute, that it should not be disturbed. I am therefore of opinion that Moses and Julianna succeeded to the estate of Letty.

It remains to be considered whether the right of entry has been barred by the statute of limitations. Up to the time of Grymes' death in 1834, the possession was held by tenants paying rent to him as tenant by the curtesy; that is, it was held in privity with, and not adversely to, the title to which Moses and Julianna succeeded. However little I might be disposed, on the evidence in the case, to regard the possession of the tenants after Grymes' death as adverse to the lessors of the plaintiff, yet it is not material to decide whether it was so or not, because, even if adverse, it did not continue so long as to bar the right of entry.

The plaintiff filed with his declaration a statement claiming damages for rents and profits up to March 10, 1848, with interest from the end of each year for 227 the *rent of such year. Whether the plaintiff, under the statute, Code, p. 562, § 30, might have filed an additional statement claiming further rents and profits accruing after March 10, 1848, and up to the time of the trial, with such interest as the law allows, is not material to enquire, as no such additional rents and profits, with interest, were claimed by the plaintiff, or assessed by the jury. The damages claimed and allowed are for a tort, for the trespass and ejectment alleged, prior to the 1st of July 1850, when the Code of 1849 became the law. The statute, ch. 177, § 14, p. 673, permits a jury to give interest on damages for tort arising after that law took effect; but leaves damages for tort theretofore committed as they formerly were; that is, bearing no interest. The usual and proper course for juries in cases of this kind has been to consider the amount of interest, and allow it as damages, but not as interest. Regarding the allowance of interest made by the jury in this case as mere surplusage, the case is left under the operation of the second clause of § 14, which requires judgment to be given for interest for money recovered in all cases from the date of the verdict, if no other proper time be fixed. The judgment in this case must, therefore, be for interest on the damages assessed from the 18th May 1853, the date of the verdict.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

Judgment reversed.

228 *McDaniel v. Baskervill.

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

Deeds of Trust—Case at Bar.—By deed of marriage settlement the feme conveys several slaves to D in trust, among others, that if she should die in the lifetime of her husband, the trustee should deliver the property to her legatees. During the coverture D sold one of the slaves to B, and the wife by her next friend filed a bill against D and B to recover the said slave and for an account of profits; and there was a decree for the slave and for an account. Pending the suit the wife died having made a will, by which she gave all the trust property to her husband M. M then filed his bill against B and the administrator of his wife, in which he set out the proceedings in the previous suit, the death of his wife, and her will; and he prayed that the suit might stand in his name in that condition to enable him to recover the slave sold to B, and that B should be compelled to deliver the slave to him; or if the slave could not be had, that B should be made to account for his value and also for his hires. B demurred to the bill. HELD:

1. Chancery Practice—Original Bill.—M might have brought a new and independent suit in equity against D and B and his wife's administrator for the purpose of recovering the said slave or his value, and so much of his hires as had not been paid to the wife in her lifetime.
2. Same—Bill of Review.—But M might file a bill setting out the proceedings in the previous suit, and ask to have the benefit of said proceedings: and the prayer of the bill though informal, is substantially that prayer.
3. Same—Parties.†—That D the trustee is a necessary party.

In March 1850 Daniel W. McDaniel filed his bill in the Circuit court of Mecklenburg, in which he stated, that in the year 1843 a suit was instituted in the same court in the name of himself and his wife Diannah, the latter by her next friend, against Alexander Dortch and William Baskervill, the object of which was to recover of Dortch the hires of a negro boy named Asa, and to recover of Baskervill the boy Asa, 229 and also his *hires for the time Baskervill had him. That Diannah McDaniel had, with his consent, previous to the marriage, executed a deed by which she conveyed to the said Dortch the negro Asa, a girl Chaina and other property, in trust for her exclusive use and benefit; and in said deed it was provided that Dortch should reconvey and deliver over all the property and the interest and profits thereof which might not have been paid over to her order during the coverture, to the said Diannah, if she should survive the said Daniel McDaniel; and if she should die during the coverture, then that the said Dortch should deliver over the said property according to her will. But if she should die without having made a will, that he should deliver the property over to her heirs. That the said bill charged the trustee with having received large sums of money for which he had not accounted; and that the sale of the boy Asa by Dortch to Baskervill was without authority and void. That the court in that case decided that the sale of the boy Asa was without authority, and that Baskervill had no title to the boy, but that he belonged to the said Diannah, and that a commissioner of the court was directed to settle the account of the trustee.

The bill further stated that during the pendency of that suit Diannah McDaniel died, having first made her will, by which she bequeathed to the plaintiff her husband, the said boy Asa, the girl Chaina and her increase and all the other property she had. And it prayed that the suit might stand in his name in that plight and condition to enable him to recover the said boy Asa. And it prayed that the court would decree that Baskervill should deliver up the boy Asa to him, or if he could not be had, that then Baskervill should be made to account to the plaintiff for the full value of him, and also for his hires. Rep. 836, it is said: "Mr. Barton says in his Chancery Practice, vol. 1, sec. 85: 'It is a general rule in equity that all persons interested in the subject-matter of the bill, and which is involved in and to be affected by the proceedings and result of the suit, should be made parties, however numerous they may be.' Citing numerous authorities, the decisions in this State are in an unbroken line; and upon plain principles he whose rights are to be affected by any proceeding should be before the court, and have an opportunity to be heard. fendant made in this suit was Baskervill.

230 *Before the defendant appeared the plaintiff amended his bill, and after repeating what he had before said, he stated that the will of Diannah McDaniel had been accidentally destroyed by fire; but that its purport and contents had been set up and established as her true last will by the County court of Mecklenburg. And he exhibited with his bill a copy of the order of the County court establishing the will and stating its contents. The prayers of the bill are the same as in the former; and Baskervill and John F. Finch the sheriff of Mecklenburg and as such the administrator with the will annexed of Diannah McDaniel are made parties defendants.

Baskervill appeared and demurred to the bill, on the grounds, first, that the plaintiff's title to the boy Asa, if any he had, was acquired after the filing of the original bill, and had no connection or dependence upon the title of Diannah McDaniel the plaintiff in the original bill. Second, that the plaintiff had a clear remedy at law, and a court of equity had no jurisdiction of the case.

Beside the will of Diannah McDaniel which gave all her property including the boy Asa, to the plaintiff, the deed of marriage settlement was filed, by which the property was settled to her separate use with the provision stated in the bill.

The cause came on to be heard on the 20th of September 1852, when the court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill with costs. Whereupon the plaintiff applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Bouldin, for the appellant:

This is not a bill of revivor, but an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill. But if the bill sets out a ground of relief, the court will consider it just of such a nature as the case may require. And 231 to *show the liberality of the court as to pleadings in equity, I refer to Kyle v. Kyle, 1 Gratt. 516. That the interest of the plaintiff is so connected with the interest involved in the original bill as to entitle his plaintiff to file an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill, see Story's Equ. Pl. §§ 346, 349, 350, and note to this last section; 3 Daniel's Ch. Pr. 1718 to 1723.

As to the jurisdiction, clearly the plaintiff in the first suit was properly in equity. In that suit there was a decree for an account and a decree affirming the title under which plaintiff here claims. Even if the plaintiff held the legal title, he is entitled, under the circumstances, to the aid of a court of equity to enforce his rights. But the legal title is in the trustee, whose duty it is to deliver over the property, and he refuses; then surely we may come into equity to compel him. The case is much stronger for the interposition of a court of equity and the privity of the titles more perfect than in the case of Robinson v. Day, 5 Gratt. 56, in which the bill was sustained and relief was given.

In this case there are strong reasons why the plaintiff should be allowed the benefit of the previous proceedings. The statute of limitations might bar the recovery of the profits if the plaintiff is put to commence an original proceeding, though in the first suit there has been a decree for an account.

Joynes, for the appellee:

The court will find that it requires not only great liberality but some charity of construction to make anything out of this bill. The only thing stated is that the plaintiff is the owner of a slave in the possession of Baskervill, and asks that it may be delivered up to him. He claims 232 nothing by virtue of the previous *proceedings, and does not exhibit the papers. And states no difficulty in proceeding at law.

The title set up in the bill is purely legal. The title of the trustee is commensurate with the trusts. If the purposes of the trust are exhausted with the life or coverture of the cestui que trust, the estate of the trustee then terminates, though an estate of inheritance is granted to him. Hill on Trustees 239. Dortch's estate, then, was only commensurate with the objects of the trust, and they continued only during coverture. If the party named in the will had been named in the deed, he would have taken a legal estate in remainder after the estate for life. So though not named in the deed, yet the power exercised in his favor made him a remainderman in the deed, and gave him the legal title. Then where was the difficulty in suing at law.

In order to show the nature of the class of bills into which the counsel on the other side would introduce this bill, the court is referred to the authorities cited by the counsel, and to Daniel's Ch. Pr. 1666. In a supplemental bill the old proceedings become a part of the new cause, and the papers are incorporated with it. These authorities imply that the plaintiff must have ground of his own on which to stand in court. He is not entitled to the benefit of what is done in the first cause. There may be a new defense; there must be other evidence; and even if there is a decree in the first cause, it can only be relied on as inducement, not as binding the rights of the parties. Then, in this case, the prayer for the benefit of the previous proceedings is improper; and the plaintiff is not entitled to the benefit of that suit.

DANIEL, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It seems to the court, that as by the 233 terms of the *deed of marriage settlement of the 9th of November 1831, it is made the duty of the trustee Dortch, in case of the death of Mrs. McDaniel occurring before that of the appellant, to pay and deliver over all of the property in said deed embraced, according to her last will and testament; and as by her last will and testament she has bequeathed to the appellant the negro man Asa and all the other property to which she was entitled, it was competent for the appellant, upon the state of facts alleged in his bill, to have brought a new and independent suit in equity for the purpose of recovering the said negro or his value, and so much of his hires as had not been received by Mrs. McDaniel in her lifetime, making the appellee Baskervill, the trustee Dortch, and the legal representative of Mrs. McDaniel, all parties to his bill.

It seems, however, further to the court, that as Mrs. McDaniel had in her lifetime instituted her suit in equity against the appellee and the said trustee, for the purpose of recovering said slave or his value, and of having a settlement of the account of trustee, it was not necessary for the appellant, in order to obtain the relief sought by him, to bring a suit wholly independent of the suit so commenced by Mrs. McDaniel; but that it was competent for him, in a bill setting forth his case and the previous proceedings had at the instance of Mrs. McDaniel, to ask to have the benefit of said proceedings.

And it seems further to the court, that the prayer in the bill of the appellant in respect to the proceedings had in Mrs. McDaniel's suit, though informal, is still a substantial prayer to be allowed to have the benefit of said proceedings.

The court is therefore of opinion, that the appellant has in his bill and amendment thereto stated a case entitling him to the aid of a court of equity, and that 234 *the decree of the Circuit court sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill is erroneous.

And it seems also to the court, that it would be premature in this court to express any opinion as to whether the appellant is entitled to have the benefit of the proceedings in Mrs. McDaniel's suit, absolutely, under the rules which ordinarily govern in cases of bills simply supplemental, or on such terms as are usually imposed in cases of original bills in the nature of supplemental bills. In either aspect, however, it seems to the court proper that the appellant should make the trustee Dortch a party to his bill.

The court doth therefore adjudge, order and decree, that the decree of the Circuit court be reversed with costs, &c. And the cause is remanded, with liberty to the appellant to amend his bill and make new parties; and for further proceedings in accordance with the principles above declared.

Decree reversed.

235 *Armstrong's Adm'r & als. v. Pitts & als.

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

1. Wills—Devise in Trust for Use of Son and Family—Right of Creditors to Sue before Acquiring Lien.—Testator devises land and negroes to trustees for the use and benefit of his son A during his life, with the privilege that he may reside on said farm and have the use of said negroes so far as may be necessary for his support and maintenance, and for the support and maintenance of his family: and at his death the property to be equally divided among his children. And he directs that the property shall not be liable for any debt which his son A might then or thereafter owe. Creditors of A not having recovered a judgment against him cannot come into equity to subject the trust property, though the debts were contracted for necessaries for the support of the family.

2. Chancery Practice—Interlocutory Decrees—Errors—Correction in Lower Court.†—A cause is heard upon the report of a commissioner which had not been returned for the legal period. The decree being merely interlocutory, the error should have been corrected by application to the court below; and it is not ground for an appeal unless, upon application, the court below refuses to correct it.

In the year 1840 Ellis Armstrong of the county of Essex departed this life, having made his will, which was duly admitted to probate in the County court of Essex. By the first clause of his will he gave to John Armstrong and George Wright the farm on which he lived and nine slaves, upon the following trust; "for the use and benefit of my son Joseph N. Armstrong during his life, with the privilege that he may reside on said farm and have the use of said negroes, so far as may be necessary for his support and maintenance, and for the support and maintenance of his family; and at his death, should his wife Susan survive him, then the said Susan may reside on said farm and have the use of said negroes, so far as may be necessary for the support and maintenance of herself and such 236 children *as she may have by my said son Joseph N. during her widowhood, and no longer; and at the death of my said son Joseph N. and at the death or

*Devise in Trust for Use of Son and Family—Right of Creditors to Sue before Acquiring Lien.—In the principal case it is held that creditors of the cestui que trust not having recovered judgment against him cannot come into equity to subject the trust property, though the debts were contracted for necessaries for the support of the family.

This ruling is approved in the case of Salamone v. Keiley, 80 Va. 99, but that case is distinguished on the ground, that the trustee in improving the trust property, created a liability on the property, and thereby involved it in a controversy properly cognizable in equity.

That equity does not have jurisdiction in all cases simply because a trustee is a party, see Markham v. Guerrant, 4 Leigh 279; Sheppards v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 373.

†Chancery Practice—Jurisdiction of Court—Where the Objection Can Be Made.—In Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 655, the ruling of the principal case on p. 243 is quoted and approved, that is, that where the court of equity has no jurisdiction, the bill should be dismissed by the appellate court and that even though there was no exception made in the court below. And to sustain the proposition the court cites the following authorities including the principal case: Hudson v. Kline, 9 Gratt. 379; Jones v. Bradshaw, 16 Gratt. 355; Green & Suttle v. Massie, 21 Gratt. 358.

marriage of the said Susan his wife, if she should survive him as herein before provided for, to be equally divided among the children of my son Joseph N. and their lawful issue. The issue of such as may be dead to take such part or portion only as his, her or their ancestor or ancestors would take if living."

By the fifth clause of the will it was declared that the property and estate given in the first clause should be in no way liable for any debt or liability which his son Joseph N. might thereafter or at that time owe.

The executors and trustees refused to qualify or take upon them the burden of the trusts of the will, and the estate was committed to the sheriff of Essex.

In January 1853 B. D. Pitts & Co. and Robert B. Rennolds filed their bill in the Circuit court of Essex county, against the administrator of Ellis Armstrong, John N. Armstrong and wife and their children, in which they set out the trust in favor of John N. Armstrong and his wife and children. They stated that Armstrong had become indebted to D. B. Pitts & Co. for goods, which were necessaries of the family suited to their condition and estate, and that he had become indebted to Rennolds for attendance upon his family as a physician. And they insisted that under the trust of the will and the principles of equity they were entitled to have their debts satisfied out of the trust property: And such was the prayer of the bill, &c.

The bill was taken for confessed as to Armstrong and wife, and the husbands of two of the children and their wives, and there were answers by the administrator and the guardian ad litem of the infant children.

In April 1853 there was a decree for an account of the debts of the complainants and of the trust property. The commissioner filed his report on the 25th 237 *of October 1853, in which he stated the debt due to D. B. Pitts & Co. at two hundred and fifty-nine dollars and five cents, and the debt due to Rennolds at two hundred and ninety-five dollars; both bearing interest; and the trust slaves were valued at four thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars.

The cause came on again to be heard on the report of the commissioner on the 12th of November 1853, when the court made a decree in favor of the plaintiffs for the sums reported to be due to them respectively, with interest, and also for their costs. From this decree the administrator of Ellis Armstrong and the adult children of Joseph N. Armstrong with their husbands applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Griswold & Claiborne, for the appellants.
Patton, for the appellees.

MONCURE, J. This case was first submitted to the court on a preliminary question, the decision of which in favor of the appellants, it was supposed, would render it unnecessary to consider the case upon the merits. That question was raised by the third assignment of error, which is, that "it was irregular to hear the cause upon the commissioner's report until thirty days after the same had been returned to the court." Code, p. 659, ch. 175, § 9. In Gray v. Dickenson's adm'rs, 4 Gratt. 87, referred to in the petition, this court, on a similar ground, reversed with costs the decree of the court below, without considering the other errors assigned. We would have to take the same course in this case, if it were like that in all respects: but it is not. In that case the decree appealed from was final. The defendant had not appeared and answered; and there was nothing in the record from which it could be inferred 238 that the cause *was heard by consent, or that the objection to acting upon the report returned to the court so recently before the cause was heard, had been waived. The only remedy for the correction of the error was by an appeal. In this case, the decree appealed from is interlocutory: and though the bill was taken for confessed as to some of the parties, who cannot be considered as having consented to the hearing of the cause within thirty days after the return of the commissioner's report, or as having waived any objection thereto; yet they had an opportunity of having the error corrected by motion to the Circuit court; and if there had been no other error in the proceedings, ought to have pursued that course, rather than subject the appellees to the expense and delay of an appeal. The right of appeal from an interlocutory order or decree was not given for the correction of such an error as this; but is limited to "a decree or order dissolving an injunction or requiring money to be paid, or the possession or title of property to be changed, or adjudicating the principles of the cause;" and was intended to test the merits of the decree or order. If that be right upon the merits, and the only apparent error in the proceedings consists in the fact that the decree or order was prematurely made, the petition for an appeal therefrom may be rejected upon the ground that it is most proper that the case "should be proceeded in further in the court below, before an appeal is allowed therein." In other words, the petitioner should have the error corrected in the court below if he can. If his application for relief to that court be overruled, he will then be entitled to come to this court and have the decree or order reversed with costs. But if he come to this court without having first unsuccessfully applied for relief to the court below, though he will be entitled to have the decree or order reversed on account of that error; yet the question of costs will 239 depend upon *the question, whether the decree or order be correct in principle, upon the case as it stands; and if it be so, the appellee will recover costs as the party substantially prevailing. This is the principle of the decision of this court in Cunningham v. Patteson, 3 Rand. 66; in which the court said that the appellant not having made his objections in the court below, "shall not lie by and take advantage of them in the appellate court, to throw on the opposite party the costs of an appeal, which the law never intended to allow for the correction of such defects."

The court having announced that, whatever might be its opinion upon the preliminary question submitted, it would be necessary to consider the question, whether the decree be correct in principle; the case was then fully submitted for its decision.

In considering the case upon its merits, the first question which presents itself is, Whether the appellees are entitled to any relief in the case as it now stands? In other words, Whether a court of equity has any jurisdiction of the case?

The appellees have obtained no judgments upon their claims. They are creditors at large of Joseph N. Armstrong. They do not come into court under chap. 179, § 2, p. 677 of the Code, "to avoid a gift, conveyance, assignment or transfer of, or charge upon, the estate" of their debtor. They do not claim to be beneficiaries under, or privies to, the trust created for their debtor by the will of his father. Nor do they set any claim to a lien on the trust subject under any contract with the trustee, or even with their debtor. They claim only as general creditors of Joseph N. Armstrong, and upon the ground that their claims are for necessaries furnished for the use, maintenance and support of the said Armstrong, his wife and family; and that they are therefore, as they insist, "entitled to be paid out of the property given by the 240 *will aforesaid to the said Joseph N. not only in accordance with the principles of equity, but according to the express provisions of said will." The claim of a creditor against his debtor is generally in personam only. He can acquire a lien upon specific property, only in some mode prescribed by law, or under some contract made for that purpose, or some trust created for his benefit. If his debtor be a feme covert entitled to separate estate, he can have no claim against her personally, because she is incapable in law of making a contract, to bind herself personally; and can only bind her separate estate; as to which she is regarded in equity as a feme sole. All the contracts which she is authorized to make under the settlement, are considered as contracts made in reference to, and as binding upon her separate estate. Her creditors therefore cannot sue her at law, but must go into equity in pursuit of that estate. But if the debtor be sui juris, the creditor cannot go into a court of equity merely because a trust has been created for the benefit of the debtor. He has no more specific lien or claim upon the trust subject than he has upon any other property of his debtor. That he looked to that subject for the satisfaction of the debt when it was created, can give him no such lien or claim. He no doubt then looked to all the property of the debtor for that purpose. In this case the will gave no separate estate to the wife of Joseph N. Armstrong: and not she, but he is the debtor. The trust subject is therefore not bound in equity for these claims, unless bound for them by the provisions of the will, as the bill insists. Now the express object of the trust was to prevent the subject from being bound for the debts of Joseph N. Armstrong; it being by the fifth clause of the will expressly declared that the property given in the first clause (which creates the trust) shall be in no way liable for any debt which the 241 said Joseph N. might *then or thereafter owe or be bound for. Whatever may be the effect of this clause in securing to Joseph N. Armstrong and his family the enjoyment of the trust subject against the claims of his creditors, it certainly excludes all idea of any right on the part of those creditors to come in as beneficiaries under the trust. Their claim upon the subject, if any, must be against, and not under, the terms of the trust. It must be founded on some contract with the trustee or the cestui que trust, which they or either may have a right to make. It is not pretended that any contract at all was made with the trustee; nor any contract for a lien, with the cestui que trust. The claim is solely based upon a general contract with the cestui que trust, and the principles of equity and the provisions of the will. That these are not sufficient to create a lien and give the appellees a right to come into equity, has already been sufficiently shown. That no contract with a cestui que trust in such a case could give his creditors a lien on the trust subject, and a right to come into equity to subject it to the payment of their claims, is conclusively shown by the case of Markham v. Guerrant & Watkins, 4 Leigh 279, which in most of its features is very much like this. Of all the cases referred to on either side, that is the only one in which the creditors came into a court of equity to charge the trust subject with their debts, without first having obtained judgments for them at law. In the other cases the creditors had obtained judgments and were seeking to enforce them against the trust subject at law when they were enjoined at the suit of parties claiming under the trust. In that case the creditors came into equity on the alleged grounds that relying on the credit of the trust estate they had furnished sundry necessary supplies to John Markham and his family, that Fleming the trustee had assumed the payment of the debt out of the trust estate by 242 a *letter which was exhibited, and that Markham had lately died leaving no property but the trust estate. The bill was dismissed without prejudice to any other remedy to which the appellees might be advised to resort. "It behooves every one (said the court in that case) who deals on the credit of a fund like this, to look to the deed and see how much can be disbursed; and to make his bargain beforehand with the trustee. In this case then I do not think that the appellees by their dealings with the family, acquired any right to charge the trust fund: if they did, every other person who chose to let the cestuis que trust have goods or property would have the same right; and thus the check interposed by the deed would be destroyed, and one year's extravagance swallow up the revenue of years to come, and leave the wife and children to starve." The court strongly inclined to the opinion that even the trustee could not bind the fund by anticipation, and thus absorb the support of future years; and intimated that the proper course to be pursued by persons furnishing necessaries to a family in such a case is, to apply to the trustee to know how far they may go in trusting the cestuis que trust: in which case he will be personally liable to the extent of the dealings he may have authorized, and may indemnify himself out of any of the trust funds which may come to his hands and be properly applicable to that purpose. That case was more favorable to the claims of the creditors than this is. In that case, by the terms of the trust, all the profits of the trust subject were applicable to the support of the family; whereas, in this case, while the trust subject is given for the use and benefit of Joseph N. Armstrong during his life, it is "with the privilege that he may reside on the farm and have the use of the negroes, so far as may be necessary for his support and maintenance, and for the support 243 and maintenance *of his family."

If the bill was properly dismissed in that case, so it ought to be in this. That case is a binding authority in itself, and has been recognized and followed in subsequent cases in this court. Nickell v. Handly, 10 Gratt. 336; Johnston v. Zane's trustees, 11 Id. 552.

It would be premature, and is not intended to intimate any opinion in this case, whether, and to what extent, the trust subject or its profits may ultimately be made liable to the claims of the appellees; the court being of opinion, that whether so liable or not, and to whatever extent liable, they can have no right to come into equity to enforce any such liability until they shall first have obtained judgments at law. And then, if there be a liability which cannot be enforced at law, they may come into equity to enforce it. Upon the question of liability, whenever it may properly arise, the cases cited by the counsel, in addition to that of Markham v. Guerrant & Watkins, may have an important bearing. Those cases are Scott v. Gibbon, 5 Munf. 86; Scott v. Loraine, 6 Munf. 117; Galt v. Carter, Id. 245; Rankin v. Bradford, 1 Leigh 163; Roanes v. Archer, 4 Leigh, 550; Butler v. McCann, Id. 631; Nichell v. Handley, 10 Gratt. 336; Johnston v. Zane's trustees, 11 Id. 552. See also Hughes v. Pledge, 1 Leigh 443; Wallace & wife v. Dold's ex'ors, 3 Id. 258; Stinson, ex'or v. Day & wife, 1 Rob. R. 435; Perkins, trustee v. Dickinson, 3 Gratt. 335; which may have some bearing on the question.

That the bill, not showing on its face proper matter for the jurisdiction of the court, may be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, notwithstanding no exception on that ground was taken in the court below, is shown by the case of Hudson v. Kline, 9 Gratt. 379.

The court is therefore of opinion that both the decree of the 25th day of 244 April 1853 and the decree of *the 12th day of November 1853 are erroneous, and ought to be reversed with costs, and the bill dismissed with costs, but without prejudice to any other remedy to which the appellees may be advised to resort.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

245 *Hooe & als. v. Hooe.

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

(Absent, ALLEN, P., and MONCURE, J.)

Wills—Construction of.*—Testator says, "I give the use and profits of all my estate, real and personal, to my daughters who may remain single. Should they all marry, or when they die, then it is my will that my property shall be equally divided among my surviving children. My land in the county of King George, called Dissington and Freidland, I give to my son G. I do this in consideration of the attention and kindness that he has paid, and will continue to pay, to his sisters." Testator had three sons who had means to support themselves, and six daughters, five of whom were, at the time, unmarried. He lived on the land mentioned as given to G, and it was all the land he owned, and he had about thirty slaves.

HELD:

1. Same—Same.—By the first clause of the will an estate for life was given to his daughters in the property therein described; determinable as to each upon her marriage.
2. Same—Same.—That the devise of the land to G, in the third clause of the will, is not an exception out of the general devise to the daughters, nor a revocation of said devise pro tanto upon the ground of repugnancy thereto.
3. Same—Same.—That the daughters did not take a mere equitable right to the use and profits of the property devised, dependent, as to the land, upon a legal estate vested in possession in G; but took such a legal estate in the use and profits of the testator's whole estate including the land, as entitled them to retain the possession thereof until they should marry or die; and the estate given to G will not vest in possession until that time.

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of King George county, brought by the infant children of George Mason Hooe, by their next friend, against George Anna S. Hooe, to recover two tracts of land, called Dissington and Freidland.

The plaintiffs claimed under a devise 246 to their father from his *father, Alexander S. Hooe. The defendant was the only remaining unmarried daughter of the testator.

Alexander S. Hooe died in October 1835, having made his will in the previous August; which contained a single devise, as follows:

"I give the use and profits of all my estate, real and personal, to my daughters who may remain single. Should they all marry, or when they die, then it is my will that my property shall be equally divided among my surviving children. My land in the county of King George, called Dissington and Freidland, I give to my son, George Mason Hooe. I do this in consideration of the attention and kindness that he has paid, and that he will continue to pay, to his sisters." George Mason Hooe and the defendant George Anna S. Hooe were appointed executor and executrix of the will.

The condition of the testator's estate and family and the circumstances by which he was surrounded at the time of making his will, and at his death, are stated by Judge Lee in his opinion.

The parties submitted the case to the court upon a case agreed, and there was a judgment for the defendant. Whereupon the plaintiffs obtained a supersedeas to this court.

Welford and Morson, for the appellants.
Patton, for the appellee.

LEE, J. This case turns upon the construction of the will of the late Alexander S. Hooe of King George.

For the plaintiffs it is contended that the devise of the lands called "Dissington" and "Freidland" to the testator's son George M. Hooe, operates to except them out of the estate the uses and profits of which had in the first clause of the will, been devised to the daughters who might remain unmarried. Or, if this 247 *be not so, that there is an incurable repugnancy between the devise to the daughters and that to George M. Hooe the effect of which is that the latter operates as a revocation pro tanto of the former. And if neither of these views can be sustained, it is insisted that the interest taken by the daughters in "Dissington" and "Freidland" was a mere equitable right to the use and profits dependent upon the legal estate vested in George M. Hooe by the terms of the will and thus that the plaintiffs having the legal title must recover in this action whatever may be the rights of the defendant elsewhere.

There are certainly no express terms of exception used in the will nor are any such to be supplied unless rendered necessary by the clear and plain intention of the testator. Indeed had there been express terms of exception no room would have been left for controversy. The argument is however that from the terms and succession of the several devises to the daughters and George M. Hooe, the subject of the latter is by necessary implication withdrawn and excepted from the former, because George M. Hooe was to take Dissington and Freidland immediately and no inferest was intended to be given in them to the daughters. Thus the question is resolved into an enquiry as to what was the true meaning and intention of the testator, and this is to be ascertained by weighing the terms of the will themselves and by placing ourselves in the situation of the testator and considering the language he has used in the light reflected upon it by the circumstances surrounding him at the time his will was made, and the relative situation of the different parties. Kennon v. McRobert et ux., 1 Wash. 96; Wootton v. Redd's ex'ors, 12 Gratt. 196.

The testator by the first clause of his will gives the use and profits of all his estate real and personal to his daughters who may remain single. By the next 248 *clause, he declares that should the daughters all marry or when they died, his property was to be equally divided among his surviving children. Thus an estate for life in the use and profits of the whole estate was plainly given to the daughters determinable as to each, upon her marriage. Then follows the devise to George M. Hooe of Dissington and Freidland, which is declared to be in consideration of the attention and kindness that he had paid and would continue to pay to his sisters. Now if we look to the context and general tenor of the instrument, it seems apparent that the testator's first object was to provide for the support of his unmarried daughters, and to this end he devotes the profits of his whole estate. Upon their marriage when he assumed that the necessity for such provision would cease, or at their death, he directs a division of his property among his surviving children. But it occurs to him that his son George M. Hooe for the reasons which he assigns is entitled to some special manifestation of gratitude and regard, and he accordingly gives to him his lands called "Dissington" and "Freidland." The devise to the daughters is of the use and profits: that to the surviving children and that to George M. Hooe are of the absolute title and estate. If therefore the devise to George M. Hooe constitutes an exception out of any previous devise it would seem to be rather out of that to the surviving children than that to the daughters. The division of the property among the surviving children was to take place upon the death or marriage of the daughters, and it is not an unreasonable interpretation of the will that the devise to the son should take effect at the same period.

This view of the testator's intention as deduced from the general scope and context of the will is greatly strengthened when we come to consider the circumstances by which he was surrounded at the 249 *time it was made. It appears that the only real estate which he owned were these lands called Dissington and Freidland and certain ground rents in Alexandria of the annual value of one hundred and thirty-five dollars: that these two tracts lay in the county of King George and were separated from each other by the main road leading from Fredericksburg to King George court-house, but had always been cultivated together and treated as one plantation by the testator: that his residence with his family for many years and up to the time of his death was upon Freidland on which was a mansion-house with servants' houses, barns and other out-houses, while upon Dissington there was no dwelling or other house whatsoever: that Dissington contained about six hundred and twenty-six acres and was assessed in 1835 (the year of the testator's death) at the sum of five thousand eight hundred and thirty-four dollars and thirty-two cents: that Freidland contained about one hundred and forty-nine acres and was assessed in the same year at two thousand two hundred and ninety dollars and thirteen cents: that the testator owned slaves, thirty-one in number and valued at the aggregate sum of ten thousand two hundred and ninety-five dollars, and other personal estate of the value (as by appraisement) of one thousand five hundred and thirty-one dollars: and that he owed very few debts and those of very inconsiderable amount. It further appears that at the making of his will the testator had nine children, three sons and six daughters: that of the sons, the eldest Alexander S. was a captain in the United States army and had recently married the daughter of a very wealthy man: that the other two sons were unmarried and were lieutenants in the navy: that of the daughters one only was married, and the youngest was of the age of ten years only.

Now it is most probable that the 250 testator regarded *any provision for the immediate support of his sons unnecessary, thinking the pay which they received as army and navy officers adequate for that purpose whilst he did deem it necessary and proper to make such provision for his daughters. And it cannot be doubted that it was his intention they should continue to reside until they might happen to marry upon the property on which he had for many years resided with his family and should be supported by cultivating both tracts just as he had himself done with the slaves. It is impossible to suppose he could have intended to give the daughters thirty-one slaves and yet take from them the lands on which they had their home and which would be necessary for the profitable employment of the slaves and for their support as well as that of the daughters. It cannot be supposed that he intended the slaves to be hired out and their hires applied after providing for the support of children and any who might be infirm or disabled, to the maintenance of the daughters. Nor is there any thing in the motives by which the testator is prompted to make the devise to George M. Hooe which at all evinces any intention to diminish the extent of the previous devise to the daughters. On the contrary those which he assigns grow out of his affection for his daughters and looked to their benefit and advantage. The gift of Dissington and Freidland to George M. Hooe was in consideration of the attention and kindness which he should continue to pay to his sisters as well as of that which he had previously shown; and when those fraternal offices should be no longer required by the condition of his sisters, he was to be rewarded by the enjoyment of the property given to him by his father in consideration of his affection and dutiful conduct towards those whom the father regarded as most needing protection and provision and who were plainly the first objects of his bounty and paternal care.

251 *Nor is there any such inconsistency between the devise to the daughters and that to George M. Hooe that the latter should be regarded as a revocation of the former to the extent of the subject which it embraces. The rules on this subject of an implied revocation of a previous devise by a subsequent inconsistent one, are well settled. It is the duty of the judicial expounder of a will to give effect to every word without alteration or diminution, if an effect can be given to it not inconsistent with the general intent of the whole will taken together; and the former of several apparently contradictory devises is never to be sacrificed but on the failure of every attempt to give to the whole such a construction as will render every part of it effective: and in the attainment of this object, the mere local order of the several devises will be disregarded if by their transposition a consistent disposition may be deduced from the entire will. 2 Jarman on Wills 415; Gray v. Minnethorpe, 3 Ves. R. 103; Constantine v. Constantine, 6 Ves. R. 100; Doe ex dem. Baldwin et ux. v. Rawling, 2 Barn. & Ald. 448, 449, 452; Shelton's ex'ors v. Shelton, 1 Wash. 53. Thus the rule which assigns to a subsequent devise in a will the effect of revoking a previous one as being the latest manifestation of the testator's intention is never applied except where the two provisions are totally irreconcilable and where the real intention of the testator cannot be ascertained. Covenhoven v. Shuler, 2 Paige's R. 122; Homer v. Shelton, 2 Metc. R. 194, 202. Nor is it ever suffered to clash or interfere with the doctrine which enjoins upon the expositor to look for the intention of the testator in the general tenor and context of the instrument and to qualify or even reject any clause or phrase that may be found incompatible with it; and though first expressed, this general intent shall overrule the particular intent afterwards disclosed. 1 Jarman on Wills 420; 2 Wms. Ex. 710, et seq.;

252 Doe ex *dem. Bosnall v. Harvey, 4 Barn. & Cress. 610, 10 Eng. C. L. R. 419; Jesson v. Wright, 2 Bligh. Par. Cas. 1, 56; Boon v. Cornforth, 2 Ves. R. 277; Coryton v. Helyar, 2 Cox's Cas. 340; Lunn v. Osborne, 7 Sim. R. 56, 9 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 476; Bartlett v. King, 12 Mass. R. 537; Cook v. Holmes, 11 Mass. R. 528. And the courts have ever betrayed an anxiety in the interpretation of wills to adopt such a construction as will give effect to every part of an instrument and thus avoid declaring any provision which it contains to be repugnant to others. Thus where a testator in different parts of his will gives the same identical lands to different persons in fee; this would appear to be a case of direct and insuperable repugnancy in which the earlier devise in the will would according to the rule be deemed to be revoked by the later. But the difficulty has been overcome by the modern construction which would seem to have prevailed in opposition to the early writers, according to which the devisees take concurrently. Sherratt v. Bentley, 2 Myl. & Keene 149, 7 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 305; Ridout v. Pain, 3 Atk. R. 486; Constantine v. Constantine, 6 Ves. R. 100; 1 Jarman on Wills 417. So where there are apparent inconsistent limitations on an estate in fee, the conflict has been reconciled by assuming that the latter disposition was intended as a substituted devise in case of lapse and applied exclusively to the event of the prior devisee dying in the lifetime of the testator. Clayton v. Lowe, 5 Barn. & Ald. 636, 7 Eng. C. L. R. 218. Other illustrations of the astuteness of the courts to reconcile apparent repugnance between the devises of a will will be found in the cases. Holdfast ex dem. Hitchcock v. Pardoe, 2 Black. R. 975; Coryton v. Heylar, 2 Cox's Cas. 340; Bettison v. Richards, 7 Taunt. R. 105, 2 Eng. C. L. R. 40.

In this case I think there is no difficulty in reconciling the seemingly incon-253 sistent devises. The devise *to the daughters is as we have seen, of a life etsate determinable as to each upon her happening to marry. This is followed by a devise in fee of the lands to George M. Hooe. The plain and natural import of such a disposition would seem to be that the former devise should have its full effect and the latter take effect in remainder after the determination of the previous estate upon the marriage or death of the daughters. Such I think we must see was the intention of the testator whether we look to the general tenor and context of the will alone or view it as illustrated and explained by surrounding circumstances. There is therefore no room for this doctrine of repugnancy and implied revocation. The case resembles that put of a devise of land in fee to A and a subsequent devise of the same lands to B for life. In the construction of law both devises shall stand and the will shall be read as if the devise had been first to B for life with remainder to A in fee. Per Anderson, C. J. Anon. Cro. Eliz. 9.

This construction will be found strongly supported by a decision of the Supreme court of North Carolina in a very similar case. The testator by his will gave to his wife a life estate in the land and plantation whereon he lived. After some other provisions, the will proceeded as follows: "To my son Aaron I give a horse, &c., my land and plantation that I have before mentioned in this will with all the farming utensils &c." It was contended that the devise of the estate for life to the wife was revoked by the subsequent devise to the son or at least was so far modified that the son became entitled to an immediate estate in the premises on the death of the testator and to a joint possession with the wife. But the court held otherwise and that the wife was entitled to an exclusive life estate. Ruffin, C. J., said "that no contradiction was to be allowed of unless the several provi-254 sions are *absolutely irreconcilable." "That the natural import of" (such a devise) "is that the latter takes in remainder and therefore that the first gift remains in force. In that way there is nothing incongruous in the two dispositions but each operates in its natural order." Crissman v. Crissman, 5 Ired. Law R. 498.

In our case the devise to the daughters is of a life estate determinable as to each upon her previous marriage, and there is the additional circumstance evincive of the testator's intention that there should be no interference between it and the devise to George M. Hooe, that the former is in terms of the use and profits of the estate, the latter is of the lands by the names which had been given to them.

The remaining ground upon which the right to recover in this action has been sought to be maintained that the devise to George M. Hooe passes the legal title at least subject to accountability in equity to the daughters for the rents and profits, is I think equally unsustainable. It is in vain to enquire what might be the technical import of the language used, or the nature of the limitations which it might create if employed in a deed. It is the language of a nonprofessional gentleman in the country framing for himself the testamentary disposition of his estate. There is no room here for the application of technical rules or the niceties of conveyancing. The first and great rule in the exposition of wills, to which all other rules must bend, as said by Chief Justice Marshall, is that the intention of the testator shall prevail provided it be consistent with the rules of law. It is the polar star to guide us in the construction of wills. Smith v. Bell, 6 Peters' R. 68, 75, 84. If the intention be apparent, no strict legal construction nor technical sense of any words whatever, shall prevail against it. 2 Wms. Ex. 710; Hodgson v. Ambrose, 1 Doug. R. 337, 342; Homer v. Shelton, 2 Metc. R. 195; Kennon v.

255 *McRobert et ux., 1 Wash. 96. Here the plain and unmistakable intention of the testator was that the daughters should have the use and profits of the whole estate for their support and education until the necessity for such a provision should cease by reason of their marriage or death: and this right to cultivate the lands for their own benefit with the slaves, carries with it as a necessary incident the absolute right to the possession untrammeled by any notion of mere trust. Or if it be regarded in the terms of its creation, as a devise in trust to permit the daughters to receive the rents and profits, it is an executed use carrying the legal title upon which the daughters may successfully rest their defense to any action by George M. Hooe or his heirs before their estate is determined as provided in the will, upon the principle established in Doe ex dem. Leicester, 2 Taunt. R. 109. Either way, the will should in effect be read as giving a life estate to the daughters determinable as to each by marriage with remainder in fee to George M. Hooe.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

The judgment was as follows:

The court is of opinion, that by the first clause of the will of the said Alexander S. Hooe deceased, an estate for life was given to his daughters in the property therein described, determinable as to each, upon her marriage.

And the court is further of opinion that the devise of the lands called "Dissington" and "Freidland" to the testator's son George Mason Hooe, by the third clause of the will, is not to be regarded as an exception out of the general devise in the 256 first clause to the *daughters, nor as a revocation of said devise pro tanto upon the ground of repugnancy thereto.

And the court is further of opinion upon the true construction of said will that the daughters did not take a mere equitable right to the use and profits of the property devised dependent as to the lands called Dissington and Freidland upon a legal estate vested in possession in the said George Mason Hooe, but took such a legal estate in the use and profits of the testator's whole estate including Dissington and Freidland as entitled them to retain the possession thereof until they should be married or die, and that the estate given to George Mason Hooe in Dissington and Freidland will not become vested in possession as long as either of said daughters shall remain in life and unmarried.

And the court is therefore of opinion that as the defendant is one of the daughters of the said Alexander S. Hooe and is still unmarried, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in this action.

And so it seemeth to the court here that there is no error in the judgment aforesaid.

Therefore it is considered by the court that the said judgment be affirmed and that the defendant in error recover against the said Elizabeth M. A. G. Hooe, prochein ami of the plaintiffs thirty dollars damages according to law for retarding the execution of the said judgment, together with her costs by her in the defense of said writ in this court expended. Which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court.

quired to account for the hires of the slave: and in 1850 there is a decree against the executor in favor of the parties interested in the estate for their respective shares of these hires. In an action against a surety of the executor founded on this decree. Held: The statute of limitations in favor of the sureties of fiduciaries, Code, ch. 149, § 5 and 6, p. 591, did not begin to run in favor of the surety until the decree of 1850: And this though the surety was not a party to the suit in equity.§

3. Decrees—De Bonis Testatoris—De Bonis Propriis.—That the decree against the executor was de bonis testatoris, when it should have been de bonis propriis, is an error of which the plaintiff might have complained, but it is not an error which can avail the surety.

4. Same—Erroneous—Binding until Reversed.|—If the decree was erroneous as to the surety, this 258 would not render *it a nullity. So long as it remains unreversed full force and effect must be given to it as well against the surety as the executor; and it cannot be questioned by the surety in an action upon the official bond of the executor.

This was an action in the Circuit court of Campbell county, brought in January 1851, by Williston Talbott, John Organ, Anselm Lynch and Adam Clement, justices of said county, at the relation of Patsey Depriest, against Lewis Franklin, and upon his death revived against his administrator. The action was founded on the official bond of John Rosser, as executor of Henry Wood, and was against Franklin as one of his sureties. The declaration, after setting out the execution of the bond and the qualification of Rosser as executor of Wood, set out the proceedings in a suit in chancery instituted in December 1834, by Patsey Depriest and others against the said executor, which resulted in a decree made in October 1850, in favor of the plaintiffs, for various sums, and among others for the sum of eight hundred and twenty-one dollars and twenty cents, with interest on four hundred and ninety dollars, a part thereof, from the 31st of December 1847 till paid: this being the share of Patsey Depriest of the hires of a slave named Squire, for which the executor was held responsible.

Franklin appeared and pleaded "covenants performed," and the statute of limitations, on which issues were made up. He also tendered a further special plea of non est factum, that the official bond of the executor was not made payable to the justices of the County court of Campbell at the time it was executed; and that Adam Clement, one of the persons to whom it is made payable, was not one of the justices sitting in said court at the time of the execution of said bond, as would appear by the records of that court. This plea was objected to by the plaintiff, and excluded by the court; and the defendant excepted.

259 *On the trial the defendant demurred to the evidence; and the jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff for eight hundred and twenty-one dollars and twenty cents, with interest on four hundred and ninety-dollars, a part thereof, from the 31st of December 1847 till paid, subject to the opinion of the court on the demurrer to evidence; the court at the same term rendered a judgment thereon in favor of the plaintiff: Whereupon Franklin's administrator applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded. The evidence is sufficiently stated in the opinion of Judge Lee.

Garland, for the appellant:

1. The first question presented is, Whether the court erred in refusing to receive the plea, stating that the bond was not taken in conformity with the act of assembly? The plea alleges, and verifies it by the record, that Adam Clement, one of the justices to whom said bond is payable, was not sitting in said court at the time said bond was executed. The record would show that but three justices were sitting when said bond was taken, and it was therefore not taken in conformity with the act of assembly. These bonds are statutory bonds, and the requisites of the statute must be therefore complied with.

2. The next question is, Did the court err in refusing to receive the plea of the statute of limitations upon executor's bonds? We insist that it did. The bond bears date the 8th of December 1823. The suit in this case (which is the first proceeding of which the court can notice upon the executor's bond) was instituted on the 10th of January 1851, twenty-eight years after the execution of the bond. By the various reports in the chancery suit, it will be seen that the indebtedness to the appellee Patsey Depriest was entirely on account of the negro 260 Squire and his hires, except *sixty dollars and sixty-two cents as of December 31st, 1833, and its interest, which was properly in the hands of said John Rosser, who was at that time her trustee. Upon inspection of the decree, it will be found that there was no general balance upon account due to the several plaintiffs who have brought these suits, except to Patsey Depriest, as above stated; and that the whole sums decreed in their favor to be due arose out of the proceeds of a sale and the hires of the negro Squire.

Of course the securities were not bound for any misappropriation of the trust fund of Patsey Depriest, held by said Rosser, as her trustee. The conditions of an executorial bond could not cover such a liability. Jones v. Hobson, 2 Rand. 483.

It is insisted that the right of action to set aside the sale of the negro man Squire accrued from the time when said sale was made. The injury to the legatees was the sale; and thereupon the condition of the bond was broken, and a right of action accrued. Spotswood v. Dandridge, 4 Munf. 289. The plaintiffs, aware of this state of things, made the securities defendants by the amended bill. Two securities appeared and answered, relying upon the act of limitations. The plaintiffs, seeing that the statute would apply, and in order to avoid it, (Rosser not having relied upon it,) dismissed their suit as to the securities and took this extraordinary decree in this case, that the actual indebtedness of the executor to the estate should be paid out of the assets of the estate.

3. The last question is, Did the court err in overruling the defendant's demurrer to evidence and giving judgments for the plaintiff? We think it did.

Because the decree, in "Depriest v. Wood's adm'r," given in evidence, was both a fraud upon the securities and a nullity.

1. Was it not a fraud? In using this expression, we do not mean to attribute 261 any intentional fraudulent *design, but insist that it was a legal fraud. The securities had been dismissed from the case and placed in a situation, in which they could not protect their rights. The decree is such as the plaintiffs had no right to have, and such as no court should have rendered. It is the first instance in the history of our judicial proceedings in which a decree in favor of distributees against an executor for distribution, after a balance found due in his hands, has been rendered payable out of the assets of the estate in his hands to be administered, and not out of his own personal estate.

Whoever heard that legatees were to be treated as creditors of an estate? And yet such is this decree. The legatees could only be entitled to the residue of the estate, after the payment of debts; and for such residue they were entitled to a direct decree against the executor. In this case they could not make the assets of the estate pay the amount of Squire's sale and hires, when the executor alone was in default. This decree, being against all rules and precedents, could have no other object, therefore, than to avoid the statute of limitations which had applied in favor of the securities; and as they had been dismissed from the case and could not protect their rights, it was in law a fraud upon their rights.

This decree should have been against John Rosser's private estate. Moore's ex'x v. Ferguson, 2 Munf. 421; Sheppard's ex'or v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29; 2 Rob. Pr. 392, old ed.

2. We insist, also, that this decree is a nullity.

This suit was on behalf of legatees. It has been found, upon a settlement of the executorial account, that there are certain balances in the hands of the executor due to them as legatees. For these balances, instead of taking decrees directly against the executor, they have taken decrees against the assets of the estate in his hands to be administered. The record, made 262 *evidence in the case at bar, shows that the whole estate of the testator is in the hands of the legatees themselves, except these balances. The decree, then, is substantially against the legatees themselves.

We insist, therefore, that the judgment upon the demurrer to evidence is erroneous and ought to be reversed.

Mosby, for the appellee:

The counsel for the appellee submits that two questions only are presented by these records to the Court of appeals. Did the court err:

1. In rejecting the third plea offered by the defendants severally?

2. In overruling the defendant's demurrer to the evidence and giving judgments for the plaintiff?

As to the first: The gist of this plea is, that the bond sued on "is not payable to the parties sitting in the said County court of Campbell at the time it was executed."

I submit that the bond, on its face, declaring that the obligors are bound to four persons, "gentlemen justices of the county of Campbell, now sitting," they are, upon general principles, estopped (even if the fact were otherwise, as it really was not in this case), from denying that averment was true. It is not necessary, however, to fortify this position by argument or authority, since the question presented is settled definitely by the 3d section of chapter 168 of the Code, p. 640.

This section provides, that "upon any official bond, executed before this act is in force, suit may be maintained (for the benefit of any person injured by the breach of the condition thereof), in the names of the judges, justices or other person, to whom such bond is payable, whether any of the obligees be alive or not, and although any justice to whom the bond is payable, 263 *was not sitting in court at the time of its execution, or although any other justice was sitting at that time."

As to the second question: The printed argument of the appellant's counsel takes the ground that the decree of 12th of October 1850 was "a fraud on the securities and a nullity."

As to this latter ground, it may be remarked, at the least, it is most gratuitous. How could the decree of the 12th of October 1850 be a fraud upon or injuriously affect the rights of the sureties? It simply carried out the mandate of the Court of appeals, directing the executor John Rosser to be charged with Squire and his hires, which could not have been resisted either by him or the sureties. It did not bind the sureties, unless they were bound independently of it. It did not and could not possibly affect the operation of the act of limitations, if that act was otherwise a protection to them. It left them exactly where they were, if they had not been made parties by the amended bill of 1850. When sued in the action at law, the forum merely was changed, and they had then and there every right of defense that could at any time or under any circumstances have been made by them.

Equally powerless is the idea that the decree is a nullity, because it directs the executor, out of the assets of his testator in his hands, to pay the plaintiff's demand. It is true, that so far as Mrs. Depriest is concerned, the decree may be regarded as erroneous, because it limits the recovery of the sum decreed her, to the assets in the executor's hands; and for this cause she might reverse it, if her interests should make it necessary to do so. This is the principle referred to in 2 Rob. Pr. p. 392, and sanctioned by the Court of appeals in 2 Munf. 421, and 3 Munf. 29.

But the case is wholly different so far as the executor and his sureties are con-
264 cerned. They cannot object *to the decree because of its limited character. This is beneficial to them, and especially to the sureties. It is admitted the executor had in his hands the hires of Squire. By the terms of the executorial bond he was bound to pay them over to the rightful owner, and his sureties stood responsible for that appropriation. It is not perceived how they were or could be injured by a decree which (though it restricted the appellee's proper remedy) did, in effect, but order the executor to pay these very hires over to her. Following the decree, she attempts to collect them by execution. The return shows an inability to do so, and the verdict finds that the executor has wasted and converted them to his own use. What more can be necessary to fix the liability of the sureties? It is submitted that that liability was perfect and must now be enforced unless the act of limitations is a bar. And this brings up the only point really relied on by the appellants in the court below, viz:

Did the act of limitations bar the plaintiff's action?

The facts are, that the sale of Squire was in May 1825, and the suit of Depriest v. Rosser was commenced the 23d of December 1834, so that, on the ground taken by the appellant himself, his defense fails.

But it is submitted that the appellant's counsel misapprehends the true period at which the act of limitations relied on could apply to the bond in question. The act was passed on the 8th of March 1826, and went into effect on that day. See Supp. R. C. p. 260.

By the 4th section it is provided, "that in computing the time within which rights of entry and of action now existing will be barred by the provision of this act, this computation shall commence from the date of the passage of this act and not before, so that such entries may be made and such actions brought within the same time, as if the right or title thereto had ac-265 crued *at the time of passing this act." The 8th day of March 1826 being then the earliest day at which the sureties could begin to rely on this act, and the suit of Depriest v. Rosser having been commenced on the 23d December 1834, there seems to be an end of the question, unless indeed the fact that they were not made parties in the suit thus brought against the executor will discharge them. The appellant's counsel, either in the petition nor printed argument, has contended for such a proposition.

The court is referred to the case of Roberts v. Colvin, 3 Gratt. 358. That was a case much stronger for the surety than this. A ward, soon after coming of age, filed a bill against the administrator of her guardian for an account. After twenty-four years a decree was rendered in the ward's favor. Unable to make it out of the guardian's estate, she then filed a bill against his sureties, and this court held "that the lapse of time during which the ward was prosecuting the claim against the administrator of the guardian furnishes no ground for the exoneration of the surety; and that the statute of limitations does not apply to the case."

LEE, J. I am of opinion that the third plea offered by the plaintiffs in error that Clement one of the persons to whom the bond sued on was made payable, was not one of the justices sitting in the court at the time the bond was executed, was naught and was properly rejected by the court. By the bond itself the parties who executed it acknowledged and declared that the four persons to whom it was made payable were justices of the county, then sitting, and it was acknowledged by them in open court and ordered to be recorded. They are therefore estopped now from averring the contrary upon the general principles of estoppels. But if there were any 266 doubt about this, *the question is put at rest by a provision of the Code which declares that upon any official bond executed before that act was in force suit may be maintained in the names of the judges, justices or other persons to whom such bond is payable, whether any of the obligees be alive or not, and although any justice to whom the bond is made payable was not sitting in the court at the time of its execution or although any other justice was sitting at that time. Code of Virginia, ch. 168, § 3, p. 640.

The defendant in error having given in evidence the bond of Rosser and his sureties, the decree of the 12th of October 1850, the execution sued out upon that decree and the return "no effects" showed herself prima facie entitled to recover in this action unless her right was barred by the statute of limitations; and this is resolved into the enquiry when the cause of action accrued.

By the fifth section of chapter 149 of the Code, p. 591, it is provided that every action upon a bond of an executor, administrator, &c., shall be brought within ten years next after the right to bring the same shall have first accrued; and by the sixth section it is declared that the right of action of a person obtaining execution against any personal representative of a decedent or to whom payment or delivery of estate in the hands of such representative shall be ordered by a court acting upon his account, upon the official bond of such representative, shall be deemed to have first accrued from the return day of such execution or from the time of the right to require payment or delivery upon such order. If this provision is to furnish the rule of decision here there is an end of the case; for the decree in favor of Mrs. Depriest was rendered on the 12th of October 1850; the execution sued out thereon and returned "no effects" was dated 21st of November 1850 and was returnable on the first Monday in January 1851, and the suit was brought 267 on the *16th of January 1851. But the argument of the appellant's counsel has assumed that this provision does not apply, for he insists that the wrong to the parties interested was the sale of the slave Squire in 1825 by which the condition of the bond was broken and that the right of action accrued at that time. And to make the argument complete it must be assumed that as the right of action was thus barred by the operation of the act of March 30, 1826, the provision in the Code above cited could not serve to restore it nor could it prescribe any other or different period from which the bar of the statute which its enacts should be computed in a suit brought after it took effect to enforce any right growing out of this original supposed cause of action.

Waiving any enquiry into the correctness of this last proposition, let us briefly consider when the cause of action upon this bond for the matter in controversy should be said to have accrued independently of the provision of the statute.

The subject sought to be recovered was the share of Mrs. Depriest in the hires of a slave named Squire as to which the testator appears to have died intestate; for which hires she claimed that the executor was liable to account. Rosser the executor had sold this slave in 1825 and purchased him, himself, and he claimed to hold him afterwards as his own property; whilst Mrs. Depriest insisted that he was to be considered as a part of the estate of the testator notwithstanding the sale, and so that the executor should account for the hires for all the time the slave was held by him. The executor had not settled his accounts, and there was therefore nothing to show the balance in his hands by which a foundation could be laid for the present demand. A suit in chancery became necessary to set aside the alleged sale, restore the slave to the estate and hold the executor to an 268 account of the hires. *This was accomplished by the decree in the chancery cause of the 27th of April 1841; for although the bill did not charge the fact of the sale of Squire, it charged that a negro man whose name was left in blank, not named in the will, came to the hands of the executor, and called for a discovery in relation to him and to the manner in which he had been disposed of: Rosser in his answer stated that he had sold Squire for six hundred dollars, having previously held him about a year or sixteen months, and expressed his willingness to account for the amount of the sale and a reasonable hire while the slave was thus in his possession. The court however by its decree adjudged the sale invalid and set it aside, and declared that Rosser should account for the hires from the time he qualified as executor until the slave should be sold as therein after directed. And this decree was affirmed by the Court of appeals on the 17th of October 1848, that court declaring that the accountability of Rosser for the sale was just the same as if such sale had not been made no title having been thereby acquired by him. Thus after a controversy of nearly fourteen years, it was finally adjudged that the executor was to be regarded as having held the slave as the property of the estate of his testator during all that time and as then liable for the whole amount of the hires. And an account having been taken on the principles of the decree of the Court of appeals, the court on the 12th of October 1850 rendered a decree against the executor for the amount of the hires.

Now upon this simple statement of the case it would seem impossible to say that this cause of action upon the executorial bond accrued at such a period that it was barred in January 1851 when this suit was brought. The case was simply that of an executor who in 1850 was found to have in his hands assets of the estate of his testator which he was required by the 269 *decree of the court to pay to a distributee but failed so to do. Concede that the executor violated his duty and the condition of his bond by making an illegal sale of the slave instead of making distribution or by failing to settle his accounts, it does not follow that the period of the limitation for the present demand is to be computed from the time of such delinquency. It is not always that the right of action upon a bond with condition shall be deemed to have accrued from the time the condition is broken. Thus in an action upon a marshal's bond, the breach of the condition alleged was that by the order of the District court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, in an admiralty case, the marshal was directed to sell the schooner Estrella and her cargo and to hold the proceeds subject to the order of the court; that the sale was made and the money received by the marshal; that the court by its final decree directed the vessel and cargo or the proceeds thereof to be restored to the libellants, and that the marshal had failed to pay over a part of the proceeds. By law it was made the duty of the marshal to bring the proceeds of sale into court to be deposited in bank in the name and to the credit of the court. This he had failed to do and this violation of his duty took place more than six years before the suit on the bond was commenced. The act of congress of 1806 in relation to suits on marshals' bonds enacts that suits thereon for cause of action thereafter to accrue, shall be commenced within six years after the right of action shall have accrued and not afterwards, and this statute was relied on as a bar to the action. The court held however that its mandate was not fully performed till the proceeds were brought into court or paid over to the libellants and that if the condition of the bond was broken by the failure to bring the money into court, 270 yet that the *plaintiffs' right of action should not be deemed to have accrued until the order directing the proceeds to be paid over to them, nor (an appeal having been taken) until its affirmance: and this affirmance being within six years before the institution of the suit, that the action was not barred. Montgomery v. Hernandez, 12 Wheat. R. 129. So in an action brought in October 1845 against the sureties of a constable upon his official bond in North Carolina, it appeared that certain claims against persons who were good had been placed in the constable's hands for collection in February 1842 and the statutory limitation of three years was set up as a bar to the recovery: and the argument was that if the officer could have collected the claims between February and October 1842, his failure to do so was a breach of the condition of his bond for which a right of action at once accrued and so the sureties were protected by the statute. But the court held otherwise. "The omission to collect, (said Pearson, J.) was a breach of a continuous nature. Admit there was a breach by a failure to collect before October 1842, non constat that there was not a breach for a failure to collect after October 1842 to which latter breach the statute was no bar." State v. Patton, 13 Ired. R. 421. From these cases it may be deduced that although there may be a right of action upon the first breach of the condition of a bond with a penalty, and the whole penalty may be recovered to stand as a security for such other sums as may be afterwards assessed on scire facias, yet the plaintiff is under no necessity to bring his action at once. He may waive the first breach and when a subsequent breach occurs, he may bring his suit and assign the latter; and the right of action as to it will not be deemed to have accrued until the time at which it occurred. And this result is supported by other cases. Sanders 271 v. Coward, *15 Mees. & Welsb. 48; Blair v. Ormond, 7 Eng. Law & Eq. 318; Arnott v. Holden, 16 Eng. Law & Eq. 142; Austin v. Moore, 7 Metc. R. 116.

Whether therefore, Rosser the executor committed a breach of the condition of his bond by the illegal sale of the slave, or by failing to settle his account, or (if the sale be treated as a nullity) by failing to pay over the value of the slave and his hires to those entitled at an earlier period, it seems clear that after the amount of those hires was ascertained in the chancery suit and declared to be a part of the assets of the estate of his testator with which he was chargeable and when he was required by the decree of October 1850 to pay over the same to those entitled and execution in favor of Mrs. Depriest for her share was returned "no assets," there was a clear right of action in her favor upon the executorial bond to which the statute of limitations could have no application. See Beale's adm'r v. Botetourt Justices, 10 Gratt. 278, (opinion of Moncure, J.) which commenced some years before the Code of 1849 took effect.

Whether therefore the period, at which the cause of action upon the executorial bond for the matter in controversy here, shall be said to have accrued, be determined by the provision in the Code already referred to, or upon general principles, the result is the same. In neither case has the statute of limitations any application. The provision of the Code is in effect but declaratory of what the law would have been without it in this precise case.

That the securities might have been made parties in the chancery cause and in fact were at one time made parties but the bill was afterwards dismissed as to them will not impair the present right of action on the bond. Parties may often proceed in equity against an executor and may also make the sureties parties in the cause with a view to their ultimate liability.
272 But *they are under no necessity to make them such parties and the failure to do so will in no manner affect the right to proceed against them by action on the bond after they shall have established their demands against the executor, either under the statute of limitations or otherwise. Creditors upon legal demands sometimes may, and upon equitable demands must, come in the first instance into equity to assert their claims and may make the sureties parties but they may omit them and after establishing their claims against the executor and failing to get satisfaction by execution, may then sue upon the official bond, and their failure to unite the sureties in the chancery suit as defendants with the executor will in no manner affect the question as to when the cause of action upon the official bond accrued. That a decree creditor might sue upon such a bond as well as a judgment creditor was settled even before the provision of the Code, (ch. 130, § 23, p. 544,) which covered both. Bush v. Beale, 1 Gratt. 233. And it is now held even in England that an action of debt will lie upon a decree ascertaining a certain sum to be due and requiring its payment. See cases cited 2 Rob. Pr. (ed. 1855,) p. 124; 1 Ibid. 204.

That the decree was de bonis testatoris and not de bonis propriis is a matter which cannot avail the appellants. The appellee might complain that the decree was restricted to the assets in the hands of the executor, and for that cause might have claimed a reversal in an appellate court. Moore's ex'x v. Ferguson, 2 Munf. 421; Sheppard's ex'or v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29. But it could not prejudice the sureties and certainly cannot render the decree fraudulent and void as to them. The form of the decree was the act of the court and not of the party or her counsel, and there is nothing in the case upon which fraud in fact or in law can with any justice be imputed to either of these. If the decree were even erroneous as contended by the 273 *counsel, this would not render it a nullity. As long as it remains unreversed full force and effect must be given to it as well against the sureties as the executor himself and it cannot be questioned in this collateral way.

I think none of the grounds of error assigned can be maintained: and I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

Official Bonds—Action upon—Relator.*—In an action on the official bond of an executor against one of his sureties to recover the amount of a decree against the executor rendered in favor of the trustee of a woman, the trustee is the proper relator in the action.

This was an action of debt in the Circuit court of Campbell county by Williston Talbott, Adam Clement and two others, justices of Campbell county, at the relation of John R. Depriest, trustee of Patsy Depriest, against the administrators of David Calahan deceased, who was one of the sureties of John Rosser as executor of Henry Wood deceased. The facts are stated by Judge Lee in his opinion. Calahan's administrators applied to this court for a supersedeas to the judgment, which was allowed.

LEE, J. The action in this case is upon the same bond which was the foundation of the action in the case of Lewis Franklin's adm'r against Patsy Depriest; but it was against another of the sureties and was at the relation of John R. Depriest as trustee of Patsy Depriest and her children and not at the relation of Patsy Depriest herself; and the object of the suit was to recover not Mrs. Depriest's share of the hires of the slave Squire, but the sum of one hundred and twenty-five dollars and 275 eighty-two cents with interest on sixty dollars and sixty-two cents part thereof from the 31st of December 1833 until paid being the amount decreed to John R. Depriest as trustee for Mrs. Depriest and her children for so much found due to them from the executor on general account. The pleadings were the same as in the action against Franklin's administrator and there was, as in that, a demurrer to the evidence. But losing sight of the breach alleged in the declaration the jury found a verdict for eight hundred and twenty-one dollars and twenty cents with interest on four hundred and ninety dollars part thereof from the 31st of December 1847 till paid (being the precise amount decreed to Mrs. Depriest herself for her share of the hires of Squire) and the further sum of sixty-eight cents costs subject to the opinion of the court upon the demurrer to evidence. And the court being of opinion that the law upon this demurrer was for the plaintiff, rendered judgment for the penalty of the bond and costs to be discharged by payment of the amount so found by the jury and the costs.

Now for reasons similar to those I have endeavored to assign for the judgment in the case of Franklin's adm'r against Patsy Depriest I think it very clear there was cause of action upon the bond for the amount decreed to be due Mrs. Depriest on general account and that the same was not barred by the statute of limitations; and as this amount was decreed to John R. Depriest as trustee for Mrs. Depriest and her children, there can be no doubt that to recover this particular amount, the suit was properly at his relation. For even one who was originally an equitable assignee only may maintain such an action if he 276 has in his own *name brought suit and obtained a decree for the debt. Commonwealth v. Barstow, 3 B. Monr. R. 293. But it is at the same time perfectly clear that John R. Depriest cannot in this action recover the amount of Mrs. Depriest's share of the hires of Squire. In fact the declaration makes no claim whatever on this account but by the only breach of the condition which it alleges, is expressly restricted to a demand of the one hundred and twenty-five dollars and eighty-two cents with interest on a part thereof decreed to John R. Depriest as trustee of Mrs. Depriest and her children for so much due them from the executor on the general account. And if the declaration had claimed the hires of Squire, still John R. Depriest has shown no right to recover them in this action. Such an action is only to be maintained at the relation of the party having the legal right to the subject demanded or in whose name the judgment or decree was rendered. Garland v. Jacobs, 2 Leigh 651; Burnett v. Harwell, 3 Leigh 89. The decree for the hires was to Mrs. Depriest herself, and not to John R. Depriest, and concede (what I am not disposed to controvert) that if he had been appointed by competent authority, trustee for Mrs. Depriest as to these hires with power to demand sue for and recover them for her benefit, it would have authorized him to maintain an action for them at his own relation, yet nothing of the kind is shown here. It is true John R. Depriest was appointed trustee for Mrs. Depriest by an order made pending the cause in place of Edward B. Withers deceased who had replaced Rosser when by a previous order he had been removed as such trustee; but Rosser had been appointed the trustee by the will of Edward Wood in relation to the property given to Mrs. Depriest and her children by the will and the trust did not extend to the hires of Squire because as to him the testator died intestate. Hence the hires were de-277 creed *directly to Mrs. Depriest (Turpin Depriest her husband being then dead) and not to John R. Depriest. It is clear therefore that he could not have recovered these hires even if the declaration had alleged as a breach the failure to pay them, and that the verdict improperly found for the plaintiffs the amount of them instead of the smaller sum due on the general account. And as the verdict must be set aside, judgment cannot now be given even for the amount which it appears the relator was entitled to recover.

There is still another error in the judgment which would render a reversal unavoidable. The judgment is against the plaintiffs individually when it should have been against them as administrators to be levied of the assets in their hands to be administered. As it must be reversed however for the reason already assigned, this error becomes immaterial.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment, to set aside the verdict and the demurrer to evidence and remand the cause for a venire facias de novo.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Judgment reversed.

278 *McKildoe's Ex'or v. Darracott.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

April Term, 1856, Richmond.

1. Lease—Breach of Conditions—Waiver by Lessor.—A lease being forfeited by the act of the lessee in subletting the premises, the forfeiture will be waived if the lessor with knowledge of the forfeiture, accepts rent, or sues out a distress for rent, accruing after the forfeiture.

2. Same—Same—Same.—A subletting is not a continuing act of forfeiture, and if the forfeiture is once waived it cannot afterwards be retracted.

This was an action of unlawful detainer instituted in the Hustings court of the city of Richmond by Peyton Johnston executor of James McKildoe deceased, against John Darracott, to recover possession of the Powhatan house in the city of Richmond. Upon the trial of the cause it appeared that the plaintiff as executor of McKildoe and guardian of his children, leased by deed to Richard F. Darracott the Powhatan house in the city of Richmond, for five years from the 1st of October 1852, reserving a rent of three thousand dollars per annum, payable quarterly; and Darracott covenanted that he would not, without the license of the said Johnston, assign or in any way dispose of his said lease, or underlet the property, or in any manner transfer or dispose of the same, or his interest therein, or any part of his said interest, during the term aforesaid; and should he do so, the said Johnston reserved the right to re-enter on the premises and property and determine the lease.

In March 1855 Richard F. Darracott having failed in business, he conveyed all his furniture in the Powhatan house and other property to William D. Winston 279 *and John O. Steger in trust for the payment of his debts. On the 2d of May 1855 Darracott addressed a note to Johnston, in which, after referring to the provisions of his lease which forbade him to sublet the house, and to his inability to keep up the hotel, proposed to surrender the lease on the 20th of the month; and gave him notice that unless he would accept the surrender of the lease he should sublet it to John Darracott for one year from the 15th instant. And he said that unless before that day he heard from him objecting to the subletting to John Darracott, and consenting to accept a surrender of the lease, he should consider the subletting met with his approbation, and would be with his license.

Not having received an answer to his letter, Richard F. Darracott proceeded to lease the house to John Darracott for one year from the 15th of May 1855; and by another letter of that date he informed Johnston that he had so leased the property to John Darracott and had put him in possession. To this letter Johnston replied on the same day, positively objecting to the transfer of the lease by Richard F. to John Darracott. And it appears that he had, between the 2d and 15th of May, apprised the parties that he objected to the lease of the premises to John Darracott, unless he would take it for the whole of the unexpired term.

On the 16th of May 1855 William D. Winston and John O. Steger addressed a note to the plaintiff, informing him that the creditors secured by the deed of trust executed by Richard F. Darracott, desired them to proceed at once to sell the property; and as the law required that one year's rent of the premises should be secured to the landlord before the property was removed, they therewith sent him a bond securing the payment of the rent from April 1st, 1855, to April 1st, 1856. And with this note they sent the bond.

280 *When the quarter's rent fell due on the 1st of July 1855, the plaintiff wrote a note to Richard F. Darracott, dated July 2d, requesting him to let the plaintiff have the rent due for the Powhatan house before three o'clock. John Darracott offered to pay the rent, but required the plaintiff to give him a receipt for it as tenant; which the plaintiff refused to do. On the 3d of July the plaintiff gave a receipt for two hundred dollars in part of the rent, without specifying from whom it was recieved; and he sued out a warrant of distress for the balance of the rent as due from Richard F. Darracott, having first made the affidavit required by the statute; whereupon the balance of the rent was paid, and a receipt for it was given by the plaintiff without specifying by whom it was paid, except that it was paid by a check of John Darracott, payable to plaintiff's order; but the plaintiff at the time of receiving the check protested that John Darracott was not his tenant, but Richard F. Darracott was.

Upon this evidence the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff; and the defendant moved the court to set it aside and grant him a new trial; but the court overruled the motion; and he excepted, and applied to the judge of the Circuit court of the city of Richmond for a supersedeas to the judgment, which was allowed.

In February 1856 the cause came on to be heard in the Circuit court, when that court reversed the judgment of the Hustings court; and the cause was retained for trial. And thereupon the plaintiff applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

MONCURE, J. It was properly conceded, in the argument of this case, on the one hand, that R. F. Darracott had incurred a forfeiture of his lease from Johnston 281 *by subletting the demised premises to John Darracott; and on the other, that the forfeiture might be waived by the lessor: And the only question to be decided is, Whether it was so waived?

The underletting in this case was without the consent of the lessor, either written or parol. And a forfeiture for assigning or subletting without license may be waived, whether the license be required by the terms of the lease to be in writing or not. Goodright v. Davids, Cowp. R. 803; Roe v. Harrison, 2 T. R. 425, 430. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider whether this case comes within the operation of the Code, p. 506, § 18; which declares that "in a deed of lease a covenant by the lessee that 'he will not assign without license,' shall have the same effect as a covenant that the lessee will not, during the term, assign, transfer or set over the premises or any part thereof, to any person without the consent in writing of the lessor, his representative or assigns."

Then, as to the question of waiver of the forfeiture. The doctrine on this subject is thus laid down by an elementary writer: "The re-entry resting, as we have seen, in the election of the lessor, he may enforce or waive his right at his pleasure. And as forfeitures, to use the phrase of the books, are odious in law, slight acts on his part have been deemed sufficient to amount to a waiver. Indeed, it may be stated as a general rule, that any recognition of a tenancy subsisting after the right of entry has accrued, and the lessor has had notice of the forfeiture, will have that effect." 2 Platt on Leases 468. To the same effect is the law laid down by other writers; and the cases cited, so far as I have seen, seem fully to sustain them.

There is, indeed, no conflict of authority in regard to the principle which governs the case. The only apparent conflict is in its application to individual cases. The principle simply is, that if the les-282 sor, with *knowledge of the forfeiture, do any act affirming the tenancy or recognizing its continuance, he thereby waives the forfeiture. Whether the act, in a given case, will have that effect, is sometimes a question of difficulty. The acceptance of rent, eo nomine, generally, if not always, has that effect; because it can rarely, if ever, occur without the relation of landlord and tenant, and is an admission that the tenancy is then subsisting. Archbold 97, citing Penant's Case, 3 Coke 64b; Harvey v. Oswald, Cro. Eliz. 553, 572; Moore 456; 2 Anderson 90; Arnsby v. Woodward, 6 Barn. & Cress. 519, 13 Eng. C. L. R. 241. The same may be said of a distress for rent. Id.; and also of an absolute and unqualified demand of rent, whatever may be the secret motive of the lessor in demanding it. 2 Platt on Leases 468. Generally, the lessor, by merely being passive, will not waive the forfeiture. It is not enough that he knows of the breach without availing himself of his right of re-entry. The act by which the forfeiture is waived must, as we have seen, amount to an affirmance of the tenancy or a recognition of its continuance. Comyn 334; Archbold 97; Doe v. Allen, 3 Taunt. R. 78. Though if, by his acquiescence, he induce the tenant to incur expense in making improvements or otherwise, that is a circumstance from which, it seems, a jury might infer a waiver. Id.

There is a case, however, which was much relied on by the counsel for the plaintiff in error as an authority to show that the mere acceptance of rent is not of itself a waiver, but matter of evidence only to be left to the jury. I mean the case of Doe v. Batten, Cowp. R. 243. That was not a case of forfeiture. The question was, Whether the landlord, by receiving rent, had waived his notice to quit, and created a new tenancy for a year; or had merely received an occupation rent, instead of double 283 rent to which he was *entitled under the stat. 4 Geo. 2. It was held to be a question of intention for the consideration of the jury on all the evidence. Aston, J., expressly distinguished between that case and a case of forfeiture.

But Doe v. Batten was cited, and the doctrine therein laid down disapproved by the Court of king's bench, in Goodright v. Cordwent, 6 T. R. 219. Lord Kenyon, C. J., in delivering his opinion in that case, the other judges concurring, said, "If the defendant had paid, and the lessor of the plaintiff had received the money as a satisfaction for the injury done by the defendant in continuing on the plaintiff's land as a trespasser, then the plaintiff might have recovered in ejectment. But if it were paid eo nomine as rent, and received as such, and the jury have found that it was so, I cannot assent to the doctrine laid down in the cases cited, that the receipt of rent accruing after the expiration of the notice to quit is not a waiver of it; for according to that doctrine, the same person might stand in the relation of tenant and trespasser to his landlord at the same time."

In Blyth v. Dennett, 16 Law & Equ. R. 424, which was also a case of notice to quit, it was conceded that the acceptance to rent, accruing after the expiration of the notice, would have been a waiver of it; but no such rent had been received.

That Lord Mansfield did not intend, in Doe v. Batten, to question the principle that acceptance of rent accruing after forfeiture, with notice of the forfeiture, as a waiver of it, is conclusively shown by the case of Goodright v. Davids, Cowp. R. 803, decided only three years after the former. That was ejectment brought by lessor against lessee on the ground of forfeiture by subletting, contrary to a covenant and condition contained in the lease. The defense was that the forfeiture had been waived by the acceptance of rent.
284 *Lord Mansfield said, "This case is extremely clear. To construe this acceptance of rent due since the condition broken, a waiver of the forfeiture, is to construe it according to the intention of the parties. Upon the breach of the condition the landlord had a right to enter. He had full notice of the breach, and does not take advantage of it; but accepts rent subsequently accrued. That shows he meant the lease should continue. Cases of forfeiture are not favored in law; and where the forfeiture is once waived, the court will not assist it. The consequence is, that there must be judgment for the plaintiffs." The authority of this case has never been denied. It is cited by the elementary writers, and set forth at length in 2 Lom. Dig. marg. 91-2.

The case of Jones' devisees v. Roberts, 3 Hen. & Munf. 436, in which it was contended by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, that this court had approved the case of Doe v. Batten, was a suit for specific performance of an agreement for a lease, and there were many reasons for refusing to enforce the agreement, without relying on the doctrine of that case, which is incidentally referred to with seeming approbation by two of the judges. The question did not properly arise, and could not have been considered in the case.

Nothing done by the lessor before he has knowledge of the forfeiture can have the effect of waiving it. After he is informed of the forfeiture he must make his election, in view of all the circumstances, whether he will waive or enforce it. He is not bound to elect immediately; but may take his own time to do so. Until he makes up his mind, however, he must take care to do no act which may have the effect of affirming or recognizing the continuance of the tenancy. He cannot first waive, and then enforce the forfeiture. The lessee cannot be a tenant and a trespasser at the 285 *same time. He continues to be a tenant, if the forfeiture be waived, just as if it had never occurred. He becomes a trespasser, if it be enforced.

The waiver of one forfeiture is of course not a waiver of a subsequent forfeiture: And if the act of forfeiture be continuing, a waiver of a right of re-entry for one breach will not preclude a re-entry for a new or continuing breach. Thus, a lessor may take advantage of a forfeiture occurring de die in diem, as in the case of a neglect to repair, work a mine, or the like, continuing from day to day, notwithstanding a previous distress for rent. 2 Platt on Leases 471, and cases cited. So also, where the covenant was that rooms should not be used for certain purposes, it was held that there was a breach of this covenant every day during the term that they were so used; and that the lessor was not precluded by receiving rent subsequent to the commencement of such user, from taking advantage of the forfeiture, provided the user continued after such receipt of rent. Comyn 334; Doe v. Woodbridge, 9 Barn. & Cress. 376, 17 Eng. C. L. R. 399.

But a sublease is no more a continuing act of forfeiture than an assignment, notwithstanding what is said by Platt, Id. 472, that "It does not appear to be settled whether an underletting is or is not a continuing breach." The only authority cited for this observation is an obiter dictum of the V. C. in Dowell v. Dew, 1 Young & Col. 345, 366, 20 Eng. Ch. R. 345. But that dictum is plainly opposed to principle and the whole current of authority. The cases are numerous in which forfeitures by subletting have been held to be waived by the subsequent acceptance of rent. The case already cited from Cowper 803, is a case of that kind. There could have been no difficulty in enforcing the forfeitures in these cases if the breaches had been continuing.

The only difference between an assignment and underlease in this respect is, that 286 the *doctrine of Dumpor's Case, 4 Coke R. 119, in regard to assignments, has not been extended to underleases. It was held in that case that a license to assign any part is a dispensation of the whole condition, and the lessee or his assigns may assign all the residue without license. Whereas it has been since held that a lessor who has a right of reentry on a breach of covenant not to underlet, does not, by waiving his entry on one underletting waive his right to re-enter on a subsequent underletting. Doe v. Bliss, 4 Taunt. R. 735; Archbold 97. In the former case the waiver is of the condition itself. In the latter only of the forfeiture for a particular breach. But in the latter each breach is a complete, and not a continuing act of forfeiture.

Having stated the legal principles which I deemed pertinent, it now only remains to apply them to the case. It is certain that Johnston never assented to the underletting to John Darracott, or affirmed or recognized his tenancy; but that he always refused to do so. It is, I think, equally certain that he did affirm and recognize the continuance of the tenancy of R. F. Darracott, with full knowledge of the forfeiture. He was fully informed on the 2d of May 1855 that the premises would be sublet to John Darracott on the 15th of that month; and again, on the 15th, was informed that they had accordingly been sublet. On the 2d of July he demanded the rent of R. F. Darracott, a quarter's rent having, on the preceding day, become due under the lease. On the 3d of that month he received two hundred dollars, and signed a receipt for it, in part of rent to the first of the month. On the 5th or 6th of the month he sued out a distress warrant against R. F. Darracott for five hundred and fifty dollars, balance of the quarter's rent due on the first of the month, having first made the necessary affidavit that the said balance was justly due him, "for rent reserved upon con-287 tract from the said R. F. *Darracott." On the same or the next day he received J. Darracott's check for the said balance, and gave a receipt therefor, "protesting at the same time that J. Darracott was not lessee or tenant, but that R. F. Darracott was." Each and all of these acts, to wit, the demand of the rent, the distress for it, the acceptance of it, and the express declaration made at the time of its payment, were plain and palpable affirmations and recognitions of the existing tenancy of R. F. Darracott. Why, then, are they not a waiver of the forfeiture? Can it be because Johnston refused to sanction the underletting, or to recognize J. Darracott as his tenant? Certainly not. It was not necessary to do that in order to continue the existence of the lease. There was no inconsistency in repudiating the act of subletting, and at the same time insisting on the continuance of the lease. R. F. Darracott could not drive Johnston to the alternatives of sanctioning the act of forfeiture or putting an end to the lease. The right of re-entry was a cumulative remedy, to which Johnston might resort or not, at his election; and whether he resorted to it or not he might still resort to his remedy by action for the breach of the covenant not to underlet; in which action he would be entitled to recover such damages as he could show that he had sustained. See Doe v. Meux, 10 Eng. C. L. R. 417. It might have been to his interest to continue the lease notwithstanding the breach, and to rely for his indemnity on the action only. The covenant would be of no use if he could not do so. By enforcing the forfeiture he would have lost the benefit of the year's rent which had been secured to him in advance, (except so much as had accrued before the forfeiture,) and taken the chance of finding another tenant for the property.

I conclude, then, that these acts were a waiver of the forfeiture: and the 288 waiver, having once been *made, could not be withdrawn. Johnston could not affirm the continuance of the tenancy to the 1st of July and then determine it. He may have supposed that he had a right to do so; but that cannot change the legal effect of his acts. If the tenancy of R. F. Darracott is still a subsisting tenancy, it follows that Johnston is not entitled to the possession of the premises, and of course cannot recover it of J. Darracott, however wrongful the act whereby the latter acquired it.

I am for affirming the judgment of the Circuit court.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Judgment affirmed.

289 *Tinsley v. Jones & als.

April Term, 1856, Richmond.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

Wills—Case at Bar.—B died in 1807, and by his will devised a tract of land to each of his sons J and F. He then says, "It is my will if my said son J die without issue, and the property heretofore given him shall go to his brother F, who in that case will lose the land heretofore given him. It being my will and desire then and in that case, and upon the happening of the event of my son J's death, that the land near W, which would otherwise be F's share, be sold and the money equally divided between my surviving children." J dies without issue. HELD:

1. Same—Estates Tail—Converted into Fee Simple.—J took an estate tail in the land devised to him, which was converted by the statute into a fee simple; and therefore the limitation over to F is void.

*Wills—Estates Tail—Converted into Fee Simple.—In Hood v. Haden, 82 Va. 597, it is said: "The same principle (that is as was decided in Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 73), was decided in See v. Craigen, 8 Leigh 449.

2. Same—Same—Same—Limitation over Void.—F not being entitled to take the estate devised to J under the limitation over to him, the bequest of the proceeds of land devised to him, to the surviving children of the testator upon F's taking the land devised to J is void, and F is entitled to retain it.

The testator John Bryan, who died in 1807, devised a tract of land to each of his sons John F. and Frederick; after which his will contains a clause in these words: "It is my will, if my said son John F. Bryan die without issue, that the property heretofore given him shall go to his brother Frederick Bryan, who in that case will lose the land heretofore given him. It being my will and desire, then and in that case, and upon the happening of the event of my son John F. Bryan's death, that the land near Williamsburg, which would otherwise be Frederick's share, be sold, and the money equally divided between my surviving children." J. F. Bryan died in 1850, leaving no issue living at his death. Frederick is still living. The appellant, as the personal representative and an 290 heir *of one of the children of the testator who survived him, but died before J. F. Bryan, claims an interest in the land devised to F. Bryan under the limitation aforesaid in favor of the testator's surviving children.

In April 1820 John F. Bryan and Frederick Bryan entered into an agreement under seal, by which they agreed to unite in the sale of the land devised by their father to John F. Bryan, and to divide the proceeds of the sale between them; and Frederick Bryan covenanted to convey to John F. one-half of the land devised to Frederick, upon the condition of John F. Bryan's having a child or children; and if John F. had no child, the deed was to be void. In pursuance of this agreement they in August 1820 sold and conveyed the land of John F. Bryan to Scervant Jones.

In 1826 Frederick Bryan conveyed the land devised to him to Bennett Kirby in trust to secure to Haynes Lee a debt due to him from Frederick Bryan, and also to indemnify Lee as the security of Frederick Bryan. This land seems to have been sold under this deed of trust, and to have come through several intermediate conveyances to the possession of Scervant Jones.

After the death of John F. Bryan in 1850 this suit was instituted in the Circuit court of Williamsburg and James City, by Thomas Tinsley, a descendant of one of the daughters of the testator John Bryan, in his own right and as the administrator of the daughter, against Jones and the other descendants of John Bryan, seeking to recover the land which had been devised to Frederick Bryan; and to have it divided under the will of John Bryan. Upon the hearing the court below dismissed the bill; and thereupon Tinsley applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Morson and Wellford, for the appellant.
Robinson and Stanard, for the appellee Jones.

291 *MONCURE, J. I think that Frederick Bryan was not to lose the land devised to him, unless and until he should become entitled to the land devised to John F. Bryan. The will so expressly declares, and that was the testator's plain intention. Then, if the land devised to John F. Bryan was devised to him in tail, the limitation over to Frederick can never take effect; being a remainder limited on an estate tail, and destroyed by the statute converting that estate into a fee simple.

The question therefore is, Whether John F. Bryan took an estate tail in the land devised to him? If he did, it must have been by virtue of the words "die without issue," in the limitation over; there being no words of inheritance superadded to the devise. The first words of the limitation over are, "It is my will if my said son John F. Bryan die without issue, that the property heretofore given him shall go to his brother Frederick Bryan." If the will had stopped here, it would, by clear implication, have created an estate tail in J. F. Bryan; it being well settled that a limitation over in these words superadded to an estate given to the ancestor in fee or for life, will in the one case cut down, and in the other enlarge, the estate of the ancestor into an estate tail. The remaining words are, "who (that is F. Bryan) in that case will lose the land heretofore given him. It being my will and desire then and in that case," &c. (ut supra). Do these words restrict the technical meaning of the words "die without issue," and prevent them from conferring an estate tail on J. F. Bryan? If the words "and upon the happening of the event of my son J. F. Bryan's death," had been omitted, the residue certainly would not have had that effect. The whole question then is, as to the effect of the last recited words in the connection in which they stand.

292 *"Issue" is nomen collectivum, and a word of very extensive import, embracing the whole line of lineal descendants. It is used in the statute de donis, in some instances, at least, synonymously with heirs of the body; and a devise to A and his issue has even been stated by an eminent judge, (Lord Thurlow,) as "the aptest way of describing an estate tail, according to the statute." 2 Jarm. on Wills 329, 331. It is a technical word of established meaning, and must always have its effect accordingly,

In that case, a will dated in 1803 contained the following clause: 'I give and bequeath to my daughter, Phœbe, the upper half of my plantation * * *; but should she die without heirs of her own body,' then over. It was held that the daughter took an estate tail converted into fee simple. See also, Tate v. Tally, 3 Call 354; Smith v. Chapman, 1 H. & M. 300; Bramble v. Billups, 4 Leigh 90; Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 78; Tinsley v. Jones, 13 Gratt. 269; 2 Min. Inst. (3d Ed.) marg. p. 394 et seq." unless there be a clear manifestation of intention in the context to use it in the restricted sense of issue living at the death. It has been long settled that words (occurring in a will which took effect before the revision of 1819) referring to the death of a person without issue, whether the terms be "if he die without issue," "if he have no issue," "if he die before he has any issue," or "for want, or in default of issue," unexplained by the context, and whether applied to real or personal estate, are construed to import a general indefinite failure of issue. Id. 418. "The rule (in the language of Lord Redesdale) is, that technical words shall have their legal effect, unless from subsequent inconsistent words it is very clear that the testator meant otherwise." Id. 284. Or "unless (in the language of another distinguished judge, Lord Alvanley, in Poole v. Poole, 3 Bos. & Pul. 620) the intent appear so plainly to the contrary that no one can misunderstand it." As to personalty, it seems the word "issue" yields more readily to expressions and circumstances in the will tending to confine it to the restricted sense than when applied to real estate. Id. 427. Thus, where the phrase is, "leaving no issue," the settled construction is that, applied to real estate, it means an indefinite failure of issue, but in reference to personal estate, it imports a failure of issue at the death. Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 663, is the leading authority for this distinction; 293 but it has *been confirmed by a long train of subsequent decisions. 2 Jarm. 419, and cases cited; also Bramford v. Lord, 78 Eng. C. L. R. 707; Dunn & wife v. Bray, 1 Call 338; Hill v. Burrow, 3 Id. 342. The question in this case arises in regard to real, and not personal estate. For though the land in controversy is that which was devised to F. Bryan which, in the event of the limitation over taking effect, is directed to be sold and the money divided, (thus converting the subject, in that event, into personal estate,) yet, as we have seen, the question on which the case depends is as to the estate devised to J. F. Bryan, which in no event is directed to be sold.

Then do the words "upon the happening of the event of my son J. F. Bryan's death" clearly manifest an intention to use the word "issue" in a restricted sense? Similar words have, in England, been held not to have that effect. 2 Jarm. 439. In Walter v. Drew, 1 Com. R. 373, the words of the devise were, "It is my will that if W, my son, shall happen to die and have no issue, &c., then and in that case, and not otherwise, after the death of the said W, I give, &c., all my lands, &c. unto R, my son, to have and to hold the same after the death of the said W, to him and his heirs." Held that W took an estate tail. In Doe v. Cooper, 1 East. R. 229, it was held that a devise of land to R C for the term only of his life, and after his decease to his issue as tenants in common, but in case he should die without leaving issue, then to E H in fee, gives to R C an estate tail. In Doe v. Goldsmith, 7 Taunt. 209, 2 Eng. C. L. R. 73, the devise was to F G and his assigns for his life, and immediately after his decease to the heirs of his body in such parts or shares as he should by deed or will appoint; and in default of such heir of his body, then immediately after his decease to J G. Held, that F G took an estate
294 tail by *implication. See also Broadhurst v. Morris, 22 Id. 1, and Doe v. Rucastle, &c., 65 Id. 876.

I have seen no English case in which similar words have had the effect of restricting the technical meaning of the words "die without issue," in regard to real estate, though there have been several in which they have had that effect in regard to personal estate. 2 Jarm. 443; as in Pinbury v. Elkin, 1 P. Wms. 563; which was followed by Stratton v. Payne, 3 Bro. P. C. Toml. ed. 99 (cited in Read v. Shell, 2 Atk. 647); Wilkinson v. South, 7 T. R. 553; Trotter v. Oswald, 1 Cox's Cas. 317; and Rackstraw v. Vile, 1 Sim. & Stu. 604, 1 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 309. But in Donn v. Penny, 19 Ves. R. 545, the words "after him" (following the words "for want of issue") were held by Sir W. Grant not to vary the construction. "That no judge of later times, (says Jarman, p. 446,) would have departed from the legal sense of the words upon such an expression as that in Pinbury v. Elkin, admits of little doubt." But he thinks that, followed as that case has been by the other cases above mentioned, it is too late to question its authority. "We are taught, however, (he says,) by Sir W. Grant's decision in Donn v. Penny, that the doctrine of the case of Pinbury v. Elkin will not be applied to any case in which the variation of phrase is such as fairly to take it out of the reach of its authority."

But stronger manifestation of intention to use the words "die without issue" in a restricted sense will be required in a case in which a life estate only is given to the ancestor, than in a case in which a fee simple is given to him. In the latter case the issue may inherit the estate from the ancestor as his heirs at law, or derive it from him by deed or will; whereas in the former they cannot get it at all, if the words be construed in a restricted sense; and it is therefore necessary to con-295 strue *them in a technical sense to effectuate the manifest intention of the testator. There can be no conceivable motive for limiting the estate over only in the event of the ancestor's dying without issue, but that the issue, if any, may have the estate. The restrictive words should therefore be extremely strong to require such a construction as would deprive the issue of any possible means of succeeding to the estate. See 2 Jarm. 440-1-2; in which the case of Wyld v. Lewis, 1 Atk. R. 432, is cited as having been decided under the influence of these views. But the opinion of Tucker, P., in Doe v. Craigen, 8 Leigh 449, is conclusive on this subject.

"Here, (said he,) the words, if she dies without heirs of her body, do not amount to a devise to the heirs of her body after the determination of her estate for life; and the consequence would be, that if she takes but an estate for life, her issue can never take any thing. The law of England would therefore construe this clearly an estate tail." "The estate for life must be enlarged into a fee tail, according to the general intent." The authorities upon this subject, he said, are numerous; and he cited several, not only from the English, but also from our own reports.

The will in this case does not give an express estate for life to J. F. Bryan; but it gives the land to him, without the superaddition of any words of inheritance; and there is nothing in the will, but the limitation over in the event of his dying without issue, to manifest an intention to give them more than a life estate. The consequence is, that but for that limitation over he would have been entitled only to a life estate, independently of the act dispensing with the necessity of words of inheritance in the creation of an estate in fee simple. The act of 1785 converting estates tail into estates in fee, declares that every estate in lands which since the 7th of October
296 1776 *hath been, or hereafter shall be limited so that, as the law aforetime was, such an estate would have been an estate tail, shall be deemed to have been, and to continue, an estate in fee simple. 12 Hen. Stat. 156. The question, therefore, in determining whether an estate tail is created, always is, (or at least was before the revision of 1819,) Whether it would have been such an estate under the law as it was before the 7th of October 1776. In the language of Roane, J., in Tate v. Talley, 3 Call 354, the act "refers to and reserves all laws then in force for the decision of the question, Whether, in future as well as in past cases, an estate tail would (but for the interposition of the act) have passed or not?" And in the language of Fleming, J., in the same case, "the whole effect of the statute is to convert estates tail into estates in fee simple, and not to alter the meaning of words or destroy the established rules of construction." The doctrine of that case, which seems indeed to be nothing more than the necessary construction of the act according to its terms, has been recognized and acted on in all the subsequent cases. Some of the judges in some of the cases supposed that as the same act of 1785, which referred to the law as it aforetime was, also dispensed with the necessity of words of inheritance in the creation of a fee, the law as it aforetime was must be considered as modified to that extent in the determination of cases arising afterwards. But that view, it seems to me, is opposed not only to the manifest design of the provision dispensing with words of inheritance, but to the plain language of the act. That design was to effectuate the probable intent of a grantor or testator where there is nothing in the deed or will to show that a less estate than a fee was intended to be given, and where but for the provision the grantee or devisee would be entitled only to a life estate. The act refers to and 297 adopts the law as it *aforetime was without limitation or restriction; and it expressly declares that every estate, &c., "shall be deemed a fee simple, if a less estate be not limited by express words, or do not appear to have been granted, &c., by construction or operation of law." Where an estate is devised to A, and if he die without issue, to B, the statute, or rather the provision in question, does not give A an estate in fee, because the will, "by construction or operation of law," gives him an estate tail. So also where the words "then on the happening of his death," or any other words insufficient to restrict the technical meaning of the word "issue," are superadded thereto. But it seems to be now definitely settled that the provision in question can have no effect in such cases. "From an examination of the cases, (says Tucker, P., in Doe v. Craigen, supra,) it will be found that the question is expressly decided against the statute (that is against the effect of the said provision) in Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 73; and that the case of Bramble v. Billups, 4 Leigh 90, recognizes the principles of that decision in extenso." Though he had struggled against that construction in more than one case, yet he said he could no longer undertake to controvert it, and must therefore surrender. 8 Leigh 452.

The case of Lucas & wife v. Duffield, 6 Gratt. 456, was cited and very much relied on by the counsel of the appellant, to show that the words "die without issue," in this case, were used in the restricted sense of issue living at the death of J. F. Bryan, who did not therefore take an estate tail. Without undertaking to reconcile that case with others on the same subject, it is sufficient to say that it certainly does not profess, nor was it thereby intended, to overrule the case of Lee v. Craigen, and other cases therein referred to; from which it is plainly distinguishable in this, that the land there was devised to W D, to 298 him and his heirs. *No reasons are assigned for the judgment; but, in construing the words "die without legal issue," to mean issue living at the death of W D, the court no doubt considered that it would not only be pursuing the restrictive words contained in the clause of attestation, but would be giving effect to the whole will, and that the issue might inherit the land as heirs of W D, or derive it from him by deed or will, and thus get the benefit intended for them, while the limitation over would take effect as an executory devise. The decision I imagine would have been different if a life estate only had been given by the will to W D; and the manifest general intent in favor of the issue could only have been effected by enlarging that life estate into an estate in tail. See Roe v. Grew, 2 Wils. R. 322; and Doe v. Applin, 4 T. R. 82.

The result of what I have said is, that in my opinion J. F. Bryan took an estate tail in the land devised to him, with remainder limited thereon to F. Bryan. It is not material to enquire whether that remainder is limited to take effect on the death of J. F. Bryan without issue indefinitely, or without issue living at his death; as, by the act for docking entails, all remainders, as well contingent as vested, dependent on the estate in tail, are utterly barred; and as the case occurred before the act of 1819 giving effect to every limitation upon such an estate which would be valid when limited upon an estate in fee simple created by technical language. 1 Rev. Code, p. 369, § 25.

The following cases in our own reports tend strongly to sustain the principles on which the foregoing opinion is based: Carter v. Tyler, 1 Call 165; Hill v. Burrow, 3 Id. 342; Tate v. Tally, Id. 354; Eldridge v. Fisher, 1 Hen. & Munf. 559; Goodrich v. Harding, 3 Rand. 280; Bells v. Gillespie, 5 Id. 273; Broaddus v. Turner, Id. 308; Ball v. Payne, 6 Id. 73; Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh 368; Callava v. Pope, 3 Id.
299 103; Bramble *v. Billups, 4 Id. 90; Doe v. Anderson, Id. 118; Doe v. Craigen, 8 Id. 449; Wright v. Cohoon, 12 Id. 370; Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 78; and Moore v. Brooks, 12 Id. 135. All of these cases concern real estate; in regard to which there has been little conflict in the decisions of this court. Many cases concerning personal property might be cited for the same purpose; but it cannot be necessary to do so.

It now only remains to consider whether, as contended by the counsel for the appellant, F. Bryan has concluded himself and his assigns from setting up the title of J. F. Bryan as tenant in tail, by the agreement with him of the 20th of April 1820, and by joining him in the deed of the 21st of August of that year, conveying the land to the appellee Jones. I think not. The agreement was between the two brothers; and was a compromise of their respective rights, whatever they might be, in the land devised to J. F. Bryan. None of the other children of the testator were parties to it, or had any interest whatever in the subject. The agreement was not intended to benefit, and could not injure them in any way. The only consideration required of F. Bryan for being permitted to participate in the purchase money of the land was his joining in the deed and giving a covenant of warranty to the purchaser, and a covenant to convey to J. F. Bryan, in the event of his having a child or children, one-half of the land devised to F. Bryan, which is the land now in controversy. That land, as early as February 1826, was conveyed by F. Bryan by deed of trust for the benefit of a creditor. The deed was duly recorded; the land was sold under it; has been conveyed to several successive owners; and ultimately to the appellee Jones, as he says, for full value paid for the fee simple estate; he and those under whom he claims having been advised, as he says, that F. Bryan 300 *had a good title to the land under his father's will. If the said appellee had notice of the agreement aforesaid, it does not appear that the intermediate vendors had; nor do I deem it material whether they had or not.

I think the decree ought to be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Decree affirmed.

‡The substance of the statute is stated by JUDGE DANIEL in his opinion.

I. IN GENERAL.

A Church—Definition.—The collective body of Christians, or those who acknowledge Christ as the Savior of mankind form the Church. Wilson v. Perry, 29 W. Va. 169, 1 S. E. Rep. 302.

Same—Cannot Be Incorporated.—"The General Assembly shall not grant a charter of incorporation to any church or religious denomination." Constitution of Virginia, Art. V, § 17.

The case of Trustees v. Guthrie, 86 Va. 125, 10 S. E. Rep. 318, called for a construction of this section of the constitution. The facts were as follows: A corporation styled the "Trustees of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States," with power to carry on foreign missions, etc., to establish committees, etc., deemed branches, for its

of the local society, is not without the operation of the statute, by reason that it sanctions the appointment of the ministers and authorizes them to use the house for preaching, without any reference to the vote or wish of the congregation; it being a Methodist church, and the ministers being to be appointed by the conference, according to the constitution of that church.

8. Same—Ministers' Right to Preach in Church—Powers of—Majority—Laws of Church.—Deed conveys a house of worship in trust for a local religious congregation; and provides, that the trustees are at all times to permit the ministers belonging to the Methodist Episcopal church, who shall be duly authorized by the conferences of the church, to preach in the house. Upon a question of the right of a minister to preach in the house, that question is to be determined by enquiring, not whether he represents the wishes of a majority of the members of the society, but whether he has been appointed and assigned to the society in accordance to the laws of the church.

6. Plan for Separation of Church—Right to Adopt.—The general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States had the conditional power to adopt the plan for the separation of the church, adopted in 1844.

302 *7. Same—Same—Right of Majority to Use Church-House.—A society of the church which, according to the plan of separation, is a border society, having by a majority of its members resolved to adhere to the Methodist Episcopal church south, is entitled to the use of the church-house in exclusion of those who repudiate the authority of said church, and refuse to receive the pastors appointed by it.

By deed bearing date the 3d day of June 1842, John C. Davis and wife, in consideration of ninety dollars, conveyed to Benjamin Brooke, George W. Shacklett and three others, a lot in the town of Salem in the county of Fauquier, upon the following trusts: In trust that they shall erect and build, or cause to be erected and built thereon, a house or place of worship for the use of the members of the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States of America, according to the rules and discipline which from time to time may be agreed upon and adopted by the ministers and preachers of the said church at their general conferences in the United States of America; and in further trust and confidence, that they shall at all times forever hereafter, permit such ministers and preachers belonging to said church as shall from time to time be duly authorized by the general conferences of the ministers and preachers of the said Methodist Episcopal church, or by the annual conferences authorized by the said general conference, to preach and expound God's holy word therein. And in further trust and confidence, that as often as any one or more of the trustees herein before mentioned shall die or cease to be a member or members of the said church, according to the rules and discipline as aforesaid, then and in such case it shall be the duty of the stationed preacher or minister (authorized as aforesaid) who shall have the pastoral charge of the members of the said church, to call a meeting of the re-purposes, with a provision that any bequest to the corporation for any such committees, etc., should pass to said trustees, created a committee called the "Executive Committee of Foreign Missions," commonly known as "The Board of Foreign Missions," and the executive officer as "the secretary," and the corporation itself as the "Southern Presbyterian Church." Held, the creation of such corporation was not the incorporation of a church or religious denomination, which is forbidden by Virginia Const., Art. V, § 17.

Religious Congregations.—Religious congregations include, as well those which are united with others under a common government, as those which are independent or congregational in their organization and government. The phrase, however, does not apply to whole denominations of sects, but it is to be understood in the limited and local sense of the words, so as to restrict the benefit of such conveyances to single congregations, whose members, from their residence at or near the place of public worship, may be expected to use it for such a purpose. Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 313; Hoskinson v. Pusey, 32 Gratt. 431.

Public Policy.—The legislation of Virginia has never exhibited any hostility to bequests for religious uses. Prot. E. Ed. Soc. v. Churchman, 80 Va. 718; Trustees v. Guthrie, 86 Va. 125, 10 S. E. Rep. 318.

II. VALIDITY OF GIFTS TO CHURCHES.

A. INDEPENDENTLY OF STATUTE.—In Virginia gifts for religious purposes in general are void as they create trusts of a vague and indefinite character. The Virginia decisions as to the validity of such trusts, and the general powers of a court of chancery, in the absence of statute, over trusts of this nature, have been conflicting. As held in Fifield, v. Van Wyck, 94 Va. 557, 27 S. E. Rep. 446, the latest Virginia case involving a determination of this question, chancery courts have no jurisdiction to declare vague and indefinite charity trusts, independently of statutory provisions.

As to the general subject of chancery jurisdiction over vague and indefinite charities, see monographic note on "Charities."

B. CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

1. CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.—The Virginia Constitution, Art. V, § 17, provides that the general assembly may secure the title to church property, to an extent to be limited by law. For construction of this section of the constitution, see Trustees v. Guthrie, 86 Va. 125, 10 S. E. Rep. 318.

2. STATUTORY PROVISIONS.—In 1866-67 (Acts 1866-67 p. 907, Va. Code 1887, § 1398), the Virginia Legislature enacted a statute providing that gifts of land for certain religious purposes should be valid when such donations were made by conveyance, devise or dedications since Jan. 1, 1777, and after that date (1866-67), donations made by conveyance only, for such purposes, should be valid. For amendments to Va. Code, 1887, § 1398, see Pollard's Supp. Va. Code, § 1398.

For like provision in West Virginia relative to gifts for religious uses, the law governing which is very similar to Virginia, see W. Va. Code, 1899, ch. 57, § 1. These statutes have been brought in question and construed in the following cases: Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301; Hoskinson v. Pusey, 32 Gratt. 428; Finley v. Brent, 87 Va. 103, 12 S. E. Rep.

And the said trustees, so assembled, shall proceed to elect, and by a majority of votes appoint the person or persons so nominated to fill such vacancy or vacancies, in order to keep up the number of five trustees forever. And in case of an equal number of votes for and against the said nomination, the stationed minister or preacher shall have the casting vote: provided, nevertheless, that if the said trustees, or any of them, or their successors, have advanced, or shall advance, any sum or sums of money, or are or shall be responsible for any sum or sums of money on account of the said premises, and they, the said trustees or their successors, be obliged to pay the said sum or sums of money, they, or a majority of them, shall be authorized to raise the said sum or sums of money by a mortgage on said premises, or by selling the said premises, after notice given to the pastor, or preacher, who has the oversight of the congregation attending divine service on the said premises. If the money due be not paid to the said trustees or their successors within one year after such notice given, and if such sale take place, the said trustees, or their successors, after paying the debt, and other expenses which are due, from the money arising from such sale, shall deposit the remainder of the money produced by the said sale in the hands of the steward or stewards of the society belonging to or attending divine service on the said premises, which surplus of the produce of such sale, so deposited in the hands of said steward or stewards, shall be at the disposal of the next yearly conference, authorized as aforesaid; which said yearly conference shall dispose of said money according to the best of

Davis and Susanna his wife do by these presents warrant and forever defend all and singular the before mentioned and described lot or piece of land with the appurtenances thereto belonging, unto them, the said Benjamin Brooke, W. H. Rector, George W. Shacklett, James F. Milton and Richard H. Carter, and their successors, chosen and appointed as aforesaid, from the claim or claims of them, the said John C. Davis and Susanna his wife, their heirs and assigns, and from the claim or claims of all persons claiming by or under them.

Objects and Purposes of the Statute.

a. Land.—The statute validates conveyances of land for religious congregations for the following uses: As a place for public worship; as a burial place, or a residence for a minister. If any other purposes and objects than those above designated shall be aimed at, the conveyance is, as to such purposes at least, as void as if the statute had never been enacted. Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301; Linn v. Carson, 32 Gratt. 170.

Same—Gift Must Design Enjoyment by Local Society.—No deed which does not respect the rights of the local society or religious congregation; and no deed which does not design the enjoyment of the uses of the property, conveyed, by the local religious society or congregation, can be placed within the influence of the statute. Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301.

Dedication—Local Society.—No dedication of property to religious uses which does not respect the rights of the local society or religious congregation can be placed within the purview of the statute. Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301.

Statute Authorizes a "Conveyance," Not a "Devise."—The act, Code 1849, ch. 77, § 8 (Va. Code 1887, § 1398), relative to gifts for the use of religious congregations, does not authorize a devise of land, but only a conveyance by deed. Seaburn v. Seaburn, 15 Gratt. 423. For like interpretation of W. Va. Code, 1899, ch. 57, § 1, which is similar to Va. Statute, see Bible Soc. v. Pendleton, 7 W. Va. 79, which cites Seaburn v. Seaburn, 15 Gratt. 423.

Bequest of Money—Building Church—Supporting Pastor.—The statute does not authorize a bequest of money to be expended in building a church at a specified place, or for the support of the pastor of such church. Seaburn v. Seaburn, 15 Gratt. 423. See Bible Soc. v Pendleton, 7 W. Va. 79, for like interpretation of W. Va. Code, ch. 57, § 1, this statute being similar in its provisions to Va. Code 1887, § 1398.

Conveyance—Congregation Distinguished from Church at Large.—A conveyance for the use of a particular congregation, in the limited and local sense of the term, that is, for the members, as such, of a certain, defined congregation, who, from their residence at or near the place of public worship, may be expected to use it for that purpose, is valid under Va. Code 1873, ch. 76, § 8 (Va. Code 1887, § 1398).

If it were for the use of the church in the general sense, as for the use of the Methodist Episcopal Church, such conveyance would be void. Hoskinson v. Pusey, 32 Gratt. 428; Boxwell v. Affleck, 79 Va. 402.

Deed—Sanctions Minister's Appointment—Validity.—A deed conveying property in trust for the use of a local society, is not without the operation of the statute, by reason that it sanctions the appointment of the minister and authorizes them to use the house for preaching, even though it be without reference to the wishes of the congregation. Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301.

Construction.—No very liberal rule of construction should be given to the statute, Va. Code 1887, § 1398, but it should be construed according to the general rule. Seaburn v. Seaburn, 15 Gratt. 423.

church-house on said lot, and that the same had been used by the congregation and the ministers and preachers aforesaid, according to the trust, for a long time. This was the church-house in controversy in the case of Brooke & als. v. Shacklett.

By deed bearing date the 15th day of August 1805, Daniel Floweree and wife, in consideration of the conveyance of a lot of land to them, conveyed with general warranty to Benjamin Rector and others a lot of land in the village of Rectortown in the county of Fauquier, upon the same trusts as those above stated as contained in the deed from Davis and wife to Brooke and others. And a church-house was built thereon by the same means and was used in the same way. This is the church-house in controversy in the case of Carter & als. v. Wolfe. All the proceedings and all the other facts in the two cases are precisely the same; and they were heard together in the court below and in this court.

In 1844 a committee of the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal 305 church held in New York, *made a report, which was adopted by the general conference, of which the introduction and the first, second and ninth clauses are as follows:

The select committee of nine, to consider and report on the declaration of the delegates from the conferences of the slaveholding states, beg leave to submit the following report:

Whereas a declaration has been presented to this general conference, with the signatures of fifty-one delegates of the body from thirteen annual conferences in the slaveholding states, representing that, for various reasons enumerated, the objects and purposes of the christian ministry and church organization cannot be successfully accomplished (by them) under the jurisdiction of this general conference, as now constituted; and

Whereas, in the event of a separation, a contingency to which the declaration asks attention as not improbable, we esteem it the duty of this general conference to meet the emergency with christian kindness and the strictest equity: therefore,

Resolved, by the delegates of the several annual conferences in general conference assembled,

That should the delegates from the conferences in the slaveholding states find it necessary to unite in a distinct ecclesiastical connection, the following rule shall be observed with regard to the northern boundary of such connection: All the societies, stations and conferences adhering to the church in the south, by a vote of a majority of the members of said societies, stations and conferences, shall remain under the unmolested pastoral care of the southern church, (and the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal church shall in nowise attempt to organize churches or societies within the limits of the church south; nor

Division in Church—Property—Retroactive Effect of § 1400, Va. Code 1887.—The provision of Va. Code 1887, § 1400, that in the contingency of a division of any religious society, it should be lawful for a majority to determine to which branch such congregation shall hereafter belong, etc., and should conclude questions as to property held in trust for such congregation, is void when applied to property theretofore granted in trust for a particular congregation, as it alters the terms of the trust and impairs the obligation of the contract, and is repugnant to both the federal and state constitutions. Finley v. Brent, 87 Va. 103, 12 S. E. Rep. 228.

b. Books and Furniture.—The statute, Va. Code 1887, § 1401, seems to contemplate books and furniture for the benefit of the congregation, church, or religious society, and their use on the land in the ceremonies of public worship, or at the residence of the minister.

Same—Uses of Local Society.—The uses mentioned in the statute must belong peculiarly to the local society or "religious congregation" at or near the locality of the property conveyed. Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301.

Same—How Acquired.—No particular mode of acquiring books and furniture (the only chattels allowed to be acquired) is prescribed. It may therefore be by gift or purchase inter vivos or by will. Va. Code 1887, § 1401.

III. RIGHTS AND POWERS OF CHURCH BODIES.

Civil War—How Property Rights Affected.—Const. of Va. art. 11, § 8, provides that the rights of ecclesiastical bodies in and to church property conveyed to them by regular deed of conveyance, shall not be affected by the late civil war, nor any antecedent or subsequent event, nor by an act of the legislature purporting to govern the same, but all such property shall pass to and be held by the parties set forth in the original deeds of conveyance, or the legal assignees of such original parties holding through or by conveyance, and any act or acts of the legislature in opposition thereto shall be null and void.

Powers of General Church Bodies—Transfer of Property.—Where property is given to the uses of a particular congregation, the gift is not to the church in a general sense, because as such it would be void, and the general conference of the church has no power, directly or indirectly, to transfer the property of the congregation. Boxwell v. Affleck, 79 Va. 402; Finley v. Brent, 87 Va. 103, 12 S. E. Rep. 228.

Powers of Majority over Property—Division in Congregation.—Where property is granted in trust for the sole and exclusive benefit of a certain religious congregation of a regular orthodox church, and the majority of the congregation leave that church and join another, they cannot take with them the property for the use of the church to which they go. Finley v. Brent, 87 Va. 103, 12 S. E. Rep. 228.

Powers of Majority—Minister's Right to Preach in Building.—A deed conveyed a house of worship in trust for a local religious congregation. It provided that the trustees should at all times permit the ministers belonging to the church, of which the local society was a part, and who should be qualified only by the conferences of that church, to preach in the house. Upon a question of the right of a minister to preach in the house, it was held, that such question should be determined by enquiring whether the minister had been appointed shall they attempt to exercise any pastoral oversight therein, it being understood that the ministry of the south reciprocally 306 *observe the same rule in relation to stations, societies and conferences adhering by vote of a majority to the Methodist Episcopal church,) provided, also, that this rule shall apply only to societies, stations and conferences bordering on the line of division, and not to interior charges, which shall in all cases be left to the care of that church within whose territory they are situated.

2d. That ministers, local and traveling, of every grade and office in the Methodist Episcopal church, may, as they prefer, remain in that church, or, without blame, attach themselves to the church south.

9th. That all the property of the Methodist Episcopal church in meeting-houses, parsonages, colleges, schools, conference funds, cemeteries, and of every kind, within the limits of the southern organization, shall be forever free from any claim set up on the part of the Methodist Episcopal church, so far as this resolution can be of force in the premises.

In May 1845 the representatives of thirteen annual conferences which are within the slaveholding states, met at Louisville, Kentucky, and by a vote of ninety-four to three, adopted the following resolutions:

Be it resolved, by the delegates of the several annual conferences of the Methodist Episcopal church in the slaveholding states, in general convention assembled, that it is right, expedient and necessary to erect the annual conferences represented in this convention into a distinct ecclesiastical connection, separate from the jurisdiction of the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, as at present constituted; and accordingly we, the delegates of the said annual conferences, acting under the provisional plan of separation adopted by the general conference of 1844, do solemnly declare the jurisdiction hitherto exercised over said annual conferences by the general conference of the Methodist Episco-307 pal church, entirely *dissolved; and that said annual conferences shall be and they hereby are constituted a separate ecclesiastical connection under the provisional plan of separation aforesaid, and based upon the discipline of the Methodist Episcopal church, comprehending the doctrines, and entire moral, ecclesiastical and economical rules and regulations, of said discipline, except only in so far as verbal alterations may be necessary to a distinct organization, and to be known by the style and title of the Methodist Episcopal Church south.

Resolved, that this convention request the bishops presiding at the ensuing session of the border conferences of the Methodist Episcopal church south, to incorporate into the aforesaid conferences any societies or stations adjoining the line of division: provided, such societies or stations, by a and assigned to the society in accordance with the laws of the church, and not whether he represented the wishes of a majority of the members of the society. Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301.

Powers of Majority—New Organization—Property.—An organized church cannot be divested of its property even though a majority of its members enter into a new organization which adopts the name of the original church; provided the old organization still exists. Venable v. Coffman, 2 W. Va. 310.

Members Excluded from Buildings—Rights.—When members are improperly excluded from the church buildings they may be restored to their rights and privileges by equitable proceedings. See post, "Procedure." Wade v. Hancock, 76 Va. 620; Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301; Hoskinson v. Pusey, 32 Gratt. 428.

Disregard of Congregation's Wish—Validity of Gift.—The statute authorizes a gift by deed in trust for the use of local societies, and such a gift is not void, or without the purview of the statute, because the deed sanctions the appointment of the minister in a certain way without reference to the wish or vote of the congregation. Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301.

Title in Trustees—Remains in Trust for Church during Existence.—Where the legal title to property was vested in trustees for the use and benefit of a certain church, it was held that until the title was legally divested, it must continue to be held as a trust for said church so long as it has an existence. Venable v. Coffman, 2 W. Va. 310.

IV. TAXATION.

The constitutions of Virginia, art. 10, § 3, and W. Va. art. 10, § 1, provide that property used for religious purposes may be exempted from taxation by law. In accordance with the constitutional privilege, the legislatures of both states have enacted statutes, Va. Code 1887, §§ 457, 488, W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 29, § 43, relieving churches from the payment of taxes upon property held for religious uses.

Constitutionality of Va. Code 1887, §§ 457, 488.—In passing upon these provisions the court in City of Petersburg v. Petersburg Ben. M. Ass'n, 78 Va. 431, held them to be valid.

Proceeds of Property.—The court in the above case further held the grant of power to exempt from taxation all property used for benevolent purposes, to carry with it the power to exempt property the proceeds whereof is used for those purposes.

V. PROCEDURE.

Churches May Sue to Redress Any Wrong or Damage.—A church, although it has no corporate existence in this state, is clearly recognized by the law of Virginia as being a legal organization, capable of holding property, and it may sue to redress any wrong or damage that it might suffer by reason of an illegal infringement of its rights relative to property that it may lawfully hold. Perkins v. Seigfried, 97 Va. 444, 34 S. E. Rep. 64.

How a Church May Sue—Equity.—A suit may be brought in equity by one member of the congregation suing on behalf of himself and the other members. Perkins v. Seigfried, 97 Va. 444, 34 S. E. Rep. 64; Berkshire v. Evans, 4 Leigh 223; Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 268.

Rights of Members—Excluded from Building.—Where members of a congregation are entitled to the use of buildings, and are improperly excluded by the trustees, they may be restored to such rights and majority of the members, according to the provisions of the plan of separation as adopted by the late general conference, request such an arrangement.

The Virginia conference was represented in the convention at Louisville, and became a part of the Methodist Episcopal church south. The Baltimore conference was not represented in that convention, and in 1846 it formally resolved to adhere to the Methodist Episcopal church. A part of this conference was in Virginia, and the Loudoun and Warrenton circuits belonged to it; and they extended to the Rappahannock river; which was the dividing line between the Virginia and Baltimore conferences.

After the action of the Louisville convention, and of the Baltimore conference, the societies worshiping at Salem and Rectortown, by the vote of a majority of their members, resolved to adhere to the Methodist church south. These societies claimed to be border societies, and therefore entitled, under the plan of separation, to elect whether they would adhere to the northern or southern church. Whether they 308 were *such border societies the proof was somewhat contradictory, though the weight of the evidence was in their favor.

The trustees in the deeds holding the church-houses for the use of the societies and ministers connected with the southern church, George W. Shacklett in the first case, and Andrew Wolfe in the second, filed their bills in the Circuit court of Fauquier county, in behalf of themselves and the congregation worshiping in the church-houses, respectively, against the trustees, in which, after setting out the deeds and the division of the Methodist church, as herein before stated, they insisted that these societies were not border societies, and entitled under the plan of separation to adhere to the church south; that the trustees were abusing their trust in excluding from the use of the said church-houses the members and ministers of the Methodist Episcopal church, and in converting them to the use of the members and ministers of the Methodist church south. And they prayed that the trustees might be compelled to execute the trusts of the deeds truly and faithfully, and apply the said church-houses to the use of the members and ministers of the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States worshiping in said houses, or that the said trustees be removed and others appointed in their place; and for general relief.

The trustees answered the bills, insisting that these were border societies, and entitled to adhere to the church south. And the causes coming on to be heard upon the facts and evidence herein before stated, the court held, that the plaintiffs and the other members of the congregations of the Methodist Episcopal church worshiping at the church-houses in Salem and Rectortown, in the bills and proceedings mentioned, with the ministers duly appointed by the Methodist Episcopal church, for said congregations and church-houses to minister therein, were the beneficiaries 309 *in the deeds aforesaid; and the legal title only being in the trustees, that it was their duty to appropriate the same for the use and benefit of the said congregations and ministers and for none others: And the decree was accordingly. And the privileges by filing a bill in equity for this purpose. Wade v. Hancock, 76 Va. 620; Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301; Hoskinson v. Pusey, 32 Gratt. 428.

Suits by Members against Trustee to Compel Proper Application of Property.—See Va. Code 1877, § 1404.

Recovery of Property—Action of Unlawful Detainer.—Trustees, who are the regularly appointed successors of the original trustees in the deed conveying the property, may maintain an action of unlawful detainer to recover the possession of the church building. Allen v. Paul, 24 Gratt. 332.

Sale—Extent of Equity Jurisdiction.—Va. Code 1887, § 1405, authorizes the circuit court of the county or corporation wherein the land lies, upon the application of any member of the congregation, in a proper case, to decree the sale of church property.

Construing this statute in Linn v. Carson, 32 Gratt. 170, the court said, that the authority given in the instances mentioned in the statute does not exclude the authority of a court of equity in other cases in the exercise of its general jurisdiction to decree a sale. "It may be regarded rather as predicated of the amenability of church property to the general jurisdiction of courts of equity, just as the property of other individuals or association of individuals is, and that this section was designed only to give the jurisdiction upon the application of any member of a religious society to effect a sale for the benefit of the society, and for direction to the court in the disposition of the proceeds of the sale."

Sale—Powers of Trustees.—A deed conveyed land to certain trustees, on condition that they build thereon, when they thought fit, a church, and permit certain persons to preach in it, and further, to be used "for such other purposes as should be deemed appropriate and necessary to further the cause of Christ." It contained no covenant to rebuild, on condition that the land revert, upon failure of the trustees to maintain the church. Held, the trustees may sell the land and invest the proceeds in a parsonage for the same congregation, in connection with a new church on a different lot. Hardy v. Wiley, 87 Va. 125, 12 S. E. Rep. 233. As to provisions for sale, see Va. Code 1887, ch. 64.

Sale—Lien on Church Property.—Where the church discipline gives a lien to parties incurring debt on behalf of the congregation for the payment of the purchase price of lands, or for advancements, or where they have, at the instance of the trustees, made themselves liable for any such debt, a court of equity will enforce such claim. Linn v. Carson, 32 Gratt. 170; Hoskinson v. Pusey, 32 Gratt. 442.

But compare Clark v. Oliver, 91 Va. 421, 22 S. E. Rep. 175, where it is held, that a court of equity will not in the absence of statutory authority, entertain jurisdiction to enforce a purely legal demand. The right to charge the property specifically must be first acquired. In the course of the opinion the court cited Linn v. Carson, 32 Gratt. 170, and said that this case rested upon its own peculiar facts. The church discipline gave a "lien."

court proceeded further to remove the trustees; and declared that it would upon the application of the proper authorities of the congregations aforesaid appoint new trustees in their stead. From these decrees the trustees applied to this court for appeals, which were allowed.

The cases were elaborately argued by Griswold, Patton and Robinson, for the appellants, and Morson, for the appellees.

DANIEL, J., delivered his opinion in the case of Brooke v. Shacklett, but it applies equally to both cases:

In the case of Gallego's ex'ors v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450, decided by this court in 1832, it was held that the courts of chancery in this state had no jurisdiction to enforce devises and bequests to religious societies or congregations. The court said, that as the statute of charitable uses, 43 Eliz. under which alone such vague bequests could be established, if ever in force in Virginia, had been repealed in 1792, in the general repeal of English statutes, charitable bequests were to be treated as standing on the same footing with other bequests. If definite, they were to be treated as trusts which courts of equity would execute by virtue of their ordinary jurisdiction; but if indefinite, they were no longer recognized by law, and could not be enforced: And a devise or bequest of property to or for the uses of a religious congregation was, it was said, of the character last mentioned. It was too uncertain as to the beneficiaries.

The reasoning of the court, it is 310 obvious, applies *with equal force to a conveyance of property to a religious congregation by deed.

I do not deem it at all necessary to enquire how far the decision in the case just cited may conform to the views of courts elsewhere in respect to this branch of the law, inasmuch as I am not aware that the authority of the case as a true exposition of the law in this state, has been ever seriously questioned. If, therefore, the law now stood as it did prior to the passage of certain acts whose provisions will be presently noticed, I should find no difficulty in holding that the bill of the appellee ought to have been dismissed as stating no case for the jurisdiction of a court of equity. For though there can be no reverter of the property in question to the grantor or his heirs, inasmuch as the deed purports to be founded on a valuable consideration, and contains a warranty warranting to the trustees and their successors, the property, against the claim of the grantors, their heirs, and all persons claiming by or under them; Yet the same indefiniteness as to the beneficiaries which defeated the bequest to the Roman Catholic congregation in Gallego's ex'ors v. Attorney General, is to be found in the deed here, and would present an insuperable difficulty in the way of the court's undertaking to control the trustees in the performance of their duties, at the instance of a beneficiary in the deed, whether he claimed a use in the property as a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, or as a member of the congregation of that church, worshiping at Salem church-house. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine the acts of assembly just mentioned, and to enquire whether the trusts of the deed can be brought within the scope of their provisions.

The first of the acts to which I refer, is the act entitled an act concerning conveyances or devises of places of public worship, passed February 3d, 1842.
311 *This act in substance declares, that where any lot or parcel of land has been heretofore, or shall be hereafter, conveyed to one or more trustees for the use and benefit of any religious congregation as and for a place of public worship, the same and all improvements thereupon shall be held by such trustee or trustees, and their successors, for the purposes of the trust, and not otherwise; that where such conveyance or devise has been heretofore made to trustees, or where such conveyance or devise shall hereafter be made, whether by the intervention of trustees or not, the Circuit superior court of law and chancery for the county or corporation where the property is situate, shall, on application of the attorney for the commonwealth on behalf of the authorized authorities of any such religious congregation, have power and authority to appoint trustees originally where there were none, or to substitute others from time to time, in cases of death, removal from the county or corporation, or other inability to execute the trust beneficially and conveniently; and the legal title shall thereupon become exclusively vested in the whole number of the then trustees, and their successors. The act, after further providing that a majority of the acting trustees of any such congregation may sue and be sued in relation to the title, possession or enjoyment of such property, concludes with a proviso, that such trustees, for the use of a religious congregation, shall not hereafter take or hold at any one time any tract of land in the country, exceeding in quantity thirty acres, or in any incorporated town, exceeding two acres; and that such real property shall not be held by them for any other use than as a place of public worship, religious or other instruction, burial ground and residence of their minister. The next in order is the act of 1846-7, which gives to any one or more of the members of any religious congregation the right, in his or their 312 *names, on behalf of such congregation, to commence and prosecute a suit in equity against the trustees, to compel them to apply the property for the use or benefit of the congregation, as their duty shall require. In 1849 these acts were substantially re-enacted and are embodied in the Code, in the eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth sections of chapter 77. The only material changes made by these sections of the Code in the provisions of the acts of 1842 and 1846-7, are those to be found in the eighth and tenth sections; by the former of which, validity is given not only to every conveyance and devise, but also to every dedication of property for the uses aforesaid; and by the latter of which it is declared that when books or furniture shall be given or acquired for the benefit of such congregation, to be used on the said land in the ceremonies of public worship, or at the residence of their minister, the same shall stand vested in the trustees having the legal title to the land, to be held by them as the land is held, for the benefit of the congregation.

There is, I think, nothing in the language of these laws to show that the legislature designed to confer peculiar benefits on any particular religious sect or sects. And the manifestation of any such design would not only have been utterly at war with the whole spirit of our institutions, but in direct conflict with the letter of the constitution declaring that the legislature "shall not confer any peculiar privileges or advantages on any one sect or denomination." The terms of the acts are broad enough to embrace not only such congregations as may be independent of others, choosing their own pastors, and making the laws for their own government, but also such as may be united with other congregations under a common government, from which they may respectively receive the pastors that are to instruct them or the laws 313 that *are to regulate them, without having any voice either in the selection or appointment of the former, or in the framing or enactment of the latter. And such is, I think, the obvious design of the legislature. The benefits which these acts confer are intended for any and every religious congregation, without regard to the peculiarities of religious faith or the forms of church government. It is, however, equally obvious that the conveyances, devises and dedications to which the acts mean to give validity, are conveyances, devises and dedications of property for the use of the "religious congregations" therein mentioned, in the limited and local sense of the term, viz: for the members (of these religious congregations) as such, who, from their residence at or near the place of public worship, may be expected to use it for such purpose. This interpretation is to be drawn from the general tenor of the acts, but more especially from the language of those portions of them that stand in the Code as the eighth and tenth sections of the chapter before referred to. The dedications of real estate must be made for the use of the "religious congregation, as a place for public worship, or as a burial place, or a residence for a minister;" and that of the "books and furniture," "for the benefit of such congregation, to be used on the said land in the ceremonies of public worship, or at the residence of their minister;" uses, which it is plain, from their very nature and the connection in which they are mentioned, must belong peculiarly to the local society, "the religious congregation" at or near the locality of the property conveyed. No dedication of property to religious uses, which does not respect these rights of the local society or religious congregation, no deed which does not design such enjoyment of the uses of the property conveyed, by the local religious society or congregation, can be placed within the influence and protection of the statutes.

314 *The deed under consideration, in its first clause or declaration of trusts, provides that the trustees are to hold the property conveyed to them, and their successors forever, in trust that they shall build or cause to be built thereon a house or place of worship for the use of the members of the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States of America, according to the rules and discipline which from time to time may be agreed upon and adopted by the ministers and preachers of the said church, at their general conferences in the United States of America; and in further trust and confidence that they shall at all times forever hereafter permit such ministers and preachers belonging to said church, as shall from time to time be duly authorized by the general conferences of the ministers and preachers of the said Methodist Episcopal church, or by the annual conferences authorized by the said general conference, to preach and expound God's holy word therein.

I am free to admit, that the first impression which this clause of the deed is calculated to make is that of a declaration of trust, not for the benefit of a local society, or congregation of Methodists worshiping or expected to worship at a particular place, but for the benefit of the "Methodist Episcopal church in the United States as an aggregate body or sect," to the exclusion of any peculiar rights of property in the land conveyed, in such local society or congregation. And if such is the true interpretation to be given the deed, it would plainly stand, for reasons already mentioned, out of the influence and operation of the statutes. Upon a fuller and more rigid examination of the deed, however, in which I have been much aided by the clear and forcible views presented by Chief Justice Marshall of Kentucky, in announcing the interpretation placed by the Supreme court of that state, on a deed identical in its features with the deed
315 under *consideration, (see Gibson v. Armstrong, 7 B. Monr. R. 481.) I have come to the conclusion that the deed is entitled to be regarded as substantially a conveyance of the property therein mentioned, to the uses of the local society. And that said property is thus placed within the pale of the statutes.

It is to be observed, as already stated, that the house or place of worship to be erected is to be for the use of the members of the Methodist Episcopal church, &c.; and as the members of the local society are necessarily members of the Methodist Episcopal church, in the sense in which the term is used in the deed, it follows that the land is conveyed for the benefit, to some extent at least, of the local society or congregation. It is to be noted further also, that except upon the happening of a certain contingency, the deed contemplates the perpetual use of the property as a place of worship. And it is obvious, from the nature of things, that the usual occupancy of the property, in attending upon the preaching and exhorations of their minister and in meeting for the observance of the various religious duties and exercises enjoined upon its members by the rules of the church, is one that can be enjoyed only by the local society; and that any use or occupancy of the house by other members of the church must be necessarily casual and infrequent; so much as not to interfere with the full use and enjoyment of it as a place of worship by the local members. Hence it is fairly inferrible that the former use and not the latter was mainly if not exclusively within the contemplation of the parties to the deed. This view is made still more apparent in the subsequent declaration of the trusts. The deed proceeds to provide further, that in case one or more of the trustees die or cease to be a member or members of the said church, the stationed minister or preacher who shall have the pastoral 316 charge of the *members of the said church, (meaning plainly the society,) is to call a meeting of the remaining trustees, who, upon his nomination, are to appoint one or more persons, who shall have been one year a member or members of said church, to fill such vacancy: showing that the minister provided for in the deed is to have charge of the members of the local society; who, consequently, are expected to attend upon and receive his religious instructions and ministrations; and who are thus necessarily the members that are, peculiarly, to enjoy the occupancy of the house as a place of worship. And in the next and last clause, in which, upon a certain contingency, provision is made for the sale of the property for the discharge of debts incurred by the trustees on account of the premises, the surplus arising from the sale, after paying the debts, is directed to be placed in the hands of the steward of the society attending divine service on the premises, and is to be disposed of by the next yearly conference, according to the best of their judgment, for the use of said society.

Does not this provision strongly persuade to the conclusion of a design that, in the event no sale of the property is ever required, or until it is required, the immediate control and peculiar use of the property is to be and remain with the local society, by the contribution of whose members, in the main, (as is stated in the bill and not denied in the answer,) the church-house was erected, and to whose use the surplus proceeds of the property, in the event of a sale, are to be appropriated?

"The primary object of the whole transaction, (in the language of Chief Justice Marshall in the case before cited,) must necessarily have been to provide and secure a place of worship according to the Methodist Episcopal discipline for the local society of that denomination, by and for 317 which contributions *were made, and which was expected to attend worship on the premises. The members of the Methodist Episcopal church at large, not belonging to the local society, can, in a general view, have no other use of the local premises but through the instrumentality of the local society, and by means of the subordination of the local use to the laws and authority of the church at large."

The provision that the trustees are at all times to permit the ministers and preachers belonging to the Methodist Episcopal church, who shall be duly authorized by the conferences of the church, to preach in the house to be erected, it is obvious, cannot in any degree detract from the character and effect of the deed as a dedication of property to the use and benefit of a religious congregation, in conformity with the statute. For the religious congregations, whose worship is not conducted under the lead and instruction of a minister, are comparatively few in number, and it is expressly provided in the statutes, as we have seen, that one of the uses to which the property dedicated may be applied, is, as "a residence for a minister." The only ground, therefore, on which it can be argued that this feature of the deed places it without the pale of the statute, is, that it sanctions the appointment of the ministers, and authorizes them to use the house for preaching, without any reference to the vote or wish of the congregation. It is true, that under the deed, and according to the rules and discipline therein referred to, the local societies have no voice in the selection of their ministers. But it does not follow that the deed therefore fails to fulfill any requirement of the statute, or is in any regard in conflict with its spirit. It could not have been unknown to the legislature that a large number of the religious congregations in the state are in such predicament; receiving their ministers from 318 bodies who are bound by no rule *of church government to consult the preferences of the local societies or congregations in appointing the pastors who are to have charge of them. To declare the deed objectionable and invalid because of the feature in question, would therefore be to impute to the legislature the design of making a most unjust and invidious discrimination against all the congregations just mentioned, and in favor of those who have the selection of their own pastors. Such an idea is wholly inadmissible. Upon the whole, therefore, though some of the provisions of the deed, upon a first inspection, did seem to me to look another way, I am satisfied that it does import a substantial dedication of the property therein mentioned to the uses of the local society, and that we cannot reject it, without adopting in respect to it, rules of construction favorable to the defeat rather than the upholding of such instruments: And I cannot see that we have the warrant of any sufficient reason for such a course.

The dangers to be apprehended from church establishments, and the evils likely to flow from allowing them to acquire property under such broad powers as were at one time claimed and exercised by the chancellor in England as representing the superintendency of the crown, as parens patriæ, over charities, might be very properly looked to and considered by a court engaged, as this court was, in the case of Gallego's ex'ors v. Attorney General, in enquiring whether it had been left free to exercise a jurisdiction, which when once admitted it had no power to limit by any well defined boundaries. The subject is however presented to our consideration under circumstances wholly different. The transfer and acquisition of property for religious purposes has been made the subject of a legislation in which the extent and the uses to which dedications of this character may be made, are precisely fixed and ascertained. The legislature has 319 declared *that permanency may be legally assured to the houses of worship, the pastoral residences, and the burial places of the various religious congregations of the country. They have given the form and sanction of law to the opinion that the good to the community likely to result from placing the title to such property on a firm and certain footing, and thus putting an end, as far as the law can, to the unseemly disorder that might otherwise arise from leaving it to the uncertain tenure by which it has been hitherto held, is of such character and weight as to overbalance any vague apprehension that the object may not be attained without furnishing occasion for ecclesiastical encroachments dangerous to the institutions of the state. This course of the legislature has been approved by the convention of 1850–51, and in the 32d section of the 4th article of our new constitution it is declared, that the general assembly may secure the title to church property to an extent to be limited by law; whilst an additional guard against the dangers adverted to is thrown around the subject by a provision that there shall not be any grants of charters of incorporation to any church or religious denomination.

In passing now, therefore, on such a deed as the one under consideration, no jealousy of the extension of ecclesiastical power can be properly allowed to exert an influence in the selection of the rules of interpretation to be applied. On the contrary, we should rather favor that interpretation of the instrument which, consistently with the rules of construction, will place it within the operation of the changed policy of our legislation.

The deed being valid, as we must, I think, hold it to be, all doubt as to the jurisdiction of the court is ended; and we have decided which of the two parties litigant are entitled to the use of the property which the deed conveys. There is no dis-320 pute between *the parties about any matter of religious faith. The doctrines of the two parties are identical. Neither party denies that the ministers of the other are, in the doctrinal sense of the word, members of the Methodist Episcopal church. But it is most obvious that "simply holding the same faith, without submitting to the government and discipline of a church, cannot make or keep a man a member of that church. To constitute a member of any church, two points at least are essential, without meaning to say that others are not so, a profession of its faith and a submission to its government." Den v. Bolton, 7 Halst. R. 215.

The local society of which both of the parties litigant claim to be members, is not a separate and independent society or congregation making its own laws, but is one of a large number of local societies belonging (prior to a division of the church which will be presently noticed) to the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States. According to the plan of church government, annual conferences were composed of the traveling preachers within certain boundaries fixed by the general conference. The preachers were received into the church by the annual conferences, and distributed or assigned to their several charges by the bishops. The general conference was composed of one for every twenty-one members of each annual conference appointed either by seniority or choice at the discretion of each annual conference; Yet so that such representatives should have traveled at least a certain number of years. The general conference elected the bishops, and had "full powers to make rules and regulations for the church under certain specified limitations and restrictions." The members of the local societies had no right to be represented by delegates either in the annual conferences or in the general conference. They had no voice in making the rules for the government of the church; none 321 in the appointment or selection *of the preacher to whose charge they might be committed. If at any time before the division of the church a controversy had arisen among the members of the society at Salem church-house, in respect to the occupancy of the house—each party under the lead of a preacher claiming its exclusive use for purposes of worship—the dispute must have been determined by enquiring, not which of the two parties constituted a majority, or represented the wishes of a majority, of the members of the society, but which of the two preachers had been appointed and assigned to the society in accordance to the laws of the church; which of the two parties was acting in conformity with the discipline of the church, and submitting to its lawful government.

These views conduct us necessarily to the enquiry as to what effect the division of the church is to have on the control of the uses of the houses of worship by the local societies.

statement of the causes which led to this division, which was effected under certain resolutions adopted by the general conference in 1844. The resolutions are preceded by a preamble setting forth that a declaration had been presented with the signatures of fifty-one delegates of the body from thirteen annual conferences in the slaveholding states, representing that for various reasons enumerated, the objects and purposes of the christian ministry and church organization could not be successfully accomplished by them under the jurisdiction of the general conference as then constituted; and that in the event of a separation, a contingency to which the declaration asked attention as not improbable, the conference esteemed it a duty to meet the emergency with christian kindness and the strictest equity.

The first resolution declares, that 322 should the delegates *from the annual conferences in the slaveholding states find it necessary to unite in a distinct ecclesiastical connection, the following rule shall be observed with regard to the northern boundary of such connection: All the societies, stations and conferences adhering to the church in the south by a vote of a majority of the members of said societies, stations and conferences, shall remain under the unmolested pastoral care of the southern church (and the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal church shall in no case attempt to organize churches or societies within the limits of the church south; nor shall they attempt to exercise any pastoral oversight therein, it being understood that the ministry of the south reciprocally observe the same rule in relation to stations, societies and conferences adhering by vote of a majority to the Methodist Episcopal church); provided also that this rule shall apply only to societies, stations and conferences bordering on the line of division, and not to interior charges, which shall in all cases be left to the care of that church within whose territory they are situated.

By the second resolution it is declared that ministers, local and traveling, of every grade and office in the Methodist Episcopal church may, as they prefer, remain in that church, or, without blame, attach themselves to the church south.

And by the ninth it is declared that all the property of the Methodist Episcopal church, in meeting-houses, parsonages, colleges, schools, conference funds, cemeteries, and of every kind, within the limits of the southern organization, shall be forever free from any claim set up on the part of the Methodist Episcopal church, so far as this resolution can be of force in the premises.

In May of the following year (1845) delegates, regularly appointed by the 323 several annual conferences of *the Methodist Episcopal church in the slaveholding states, met in Louisville, Kentucky, in a general convention, and adopted by a vote (of ninety-four to three) a resolution by which they declare the jurisdiction hitherto exercised over said annual conference by the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church entirely dissolved; and that said annual conferences shall be and they hereby are constituted a separate ecclesiastical connection under the provisional plan of separation aforesaid, and based upon the discipline of the Methodist Episcopal church, comprehending the doctrines and entire moral, ecclesiastical and economical rules and regulations of said discipline, except only in so far as verbal alterations may be necessary to a distinct organization, and to be known by the style and title of the Methodist Episcopal church south.

If this division of the church was lawful, it is obvious, I think, that the members of the local societies in the southern organization of the church stand in the same relation to the general conference, the annual conferences, the bishops, pastors, rules and discipline of the Methodist Episcopal church south, that they occupied before the division, in respect to those of the Methodist Episcopal church. There has been no change of faith, no change of doctrine, no change of discipline, no change in the mode of administering it: All remain as before. By the express terms of the plan of separation, no blame is to be attached to the pastors in the south for adhering to the church south; and the members of the local societies are to remain under the unmolested care of the southern church, as they were before under that of the Methodist Episcopal church. And the southern church is to occupy the same relation to the church property in the south that the Methodist Episcopal church before occupied in respect to it. If the division has been lawfully effected, why may not a controversy among the 324 local *members of a society in respect to the use of the church property be settled by a resort to the same mode of enquiry, (merely changing the name of the church,) that would have determined it before? Upon the hypothesis that the plan of separation is constitutional, the questions upon which such a controversy would now turn, would be, Which of the two parties is in regular connection with the Methodist Episcopal church south, recognizing its discipline, submitting to its government, and receiving its pastors? Those who can identify themselves with the party indicated in the enquiry, are entitled to the use of the property.

We have still to enquire, Whether the general conference of 1844 had the power to adopt the resolutions authorizing the division? If I had the largest freedom of time and space, I should not desire to pursue any very extended course of statement or of argument in considering this question. And I do not think that there is any necessity for my doing so. The question is one which has been deemed for some years past of such public concernment, of such vast importance in its bearing on the rights, interest and feeling of a large portion of the community, as to have been made the subject of the fullest examination. The zeal, ability and research of the most eminent men of the bar and of the church have been enlisted in its discussion. No fact or argument that could elucidate the subject remains to be stated or urged. Not only so, but the question has been decided by the Supreme court of Kentucky and by the Supreme court of the United States, upon such mature deliberation and with such unanimity, in each case, as to leave but little room for hesitating as to the propriety of regarding the question as settled. In each case the validity of the plan of separation was sustained. Smith v. Swormstedt, 16 How. U. S. R. 288; Gibson v. Armstrong, 7 B. Monr. R. 481.

325 *I deem it necessary to say but little more than that I concur in these decisions. I have not been able to perceive on what ground it is to be maintained that the general conference of 1844 was not invested with as full powers over the subject as any general conference that preceded it. The six restrictive articles adopted by the conference of 1808 and by succeeding conferences manifestly contain no limitation of power that can bear on the question. The ministers and preachers in whom resided the supreme power, had, when they assembled in 1784 to frame a government for the church, full power to place it under one or two or a still greater number of general organizations, if they had believed that the interests of the church would be thereby promoted. And I do not see how it can be said that the general conferences of 1792, 1796, 1800, 1804 and 1808, composed as they were of the body of the ministers and preachers, did not each have the same power. And when they determined at the last mentioned conference (1808) to meet no longer en masse, but thereafter, by a delegation from their own body, the provision, which they adopted, that the general conference should have full powers to make rules and regulations for the church, under the limitations and restrictions contained in the six restrictive articles just mentioned, amounted in substance to an authority to the delegates in conference thereafter to exercise all the powers (except those prohibited in said restrictive articles) that could at any time have been exercised by a full conference of all the ministers and preachers. No further limitation on the powers of the general conference having been subsequently made, it seems to me that the conference of 1844 was clothed with the power which it claimed and exercised.

The Baltimore conference sent no delegates to the Louisville convention, and 326 in 1846 adopted resolutions *declaring that they still regarded themselves a constituent part of the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States. By virtue of this action of said conference, the society at Salem church being within the limits of that conference, would have been left to stand in connection with the northern division of the church, as they stood before the division of the church; and the appellants, under the influence of the principles which I have endeavored to establish, would thus have been entitled, though a minority, to prevail in this controversy were it not for the provision in the first resolution of the plan of separation, by which the border societies have a right, by vote of a majority of its members, to choose to which jurisdictional division of the church they will belong. The members of Salem church, at a meeting which seems to have been fairly conducted, have determined, by a majority vote, to adhere to the church south.

A still further question, however, remains to be settled, viz: Whether this is a border society? The boundaries of the annual conferences have been from time to time fixed by the general conference, but no boundaries have been fixed for the societies, stations and circuits. In this state of things, it is obvious that in some cases it may be extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to carry out the plan of separation. It is next to impossible to lay down any general rule by which to define a border society. In some cases, however, as in the case of the Maysville Church, in 7 B. Monr. R. 481, and in the case of Clift Church, (which was argued with this,) the proximity of the houses of worship to a common boundary of two conferences was so close that no question seems to have arisen as to the claim of the societies to be regarded as border societies, in the meaning of the resolutions.

One of the witnesses expresses the belief that Salem society is not a border 327 society, and that a portion of *Warrenton circuit is interposed between it and the Rappahannock river, which is the common boundary of the Virginia and Baltimore conferences. But some five or six other witnesses express the belief that Salem is a border society, and that no portion of the country between the church and the river is attached to the Warrenton circuit. The weight of this testimony is in favor of the proposition that it is a border society; and upon a question of the kind the conduct of the parties interested, as showing how they have regarded the matter, is entitled to much weight. The minority, by going into a vote on the question, have treated it as one on which a vote might be properly taken; which would not be the case on any other hypothesis than that of the society's being a border society. And it seems to me, therefore, that this conduct of the parties, taken in connection with the other proofs in the cause, justifies us in treating this as a border society.

By the vote of a majority, the society has been placed, in the manner contemplated and allowed by the plan of separation, in jurisdictional connection with the ecclesiastical government of the Methodist Episcopal church south; which, by virtue of its organization under said plan, is now the lawful successor of the Methodist Episcopal church in respect to the disciplinary control and protection of the members of the church adhering to the southern division. And such members have now the same right to enjoy the church property which was held by their societies before the division, in exclusion of those who repudiate the authority of the Methodist Episcopal church south, and refuse to receive the pastors appointed by it, that they had, before the division and whilst in connection with the Methodist Episcopal church, to enjoy said property in exclusion of any who 328 might have refused *to submit to the discipline and to receive the preachers of said last mentioned church.

Such being the views which I have taken of the case, it seems to me that the decree of the Circuit court is erroneous, and ought to be reversed, and that the bill should be dismissed.

LEE and SAMUELS, Js., concurred in the results of the opinion of Daniel, J., but not in the views or reasoning.

ALLEN, P., and MONCURE, J., concurred in the opinion.

8. Settlement of Decedent's Estate—Laches of Creditor.*—Though a creditor's debt is evidenced by deed, yet where there has been gross laches in its prosecution, and the account cannot be settled without injustice to the estate of the deceased debtor, a court of equity will not give the creditor relief.

In June 1825 Fortescue Whittle, as administrator of Conway Whittle deceased, filed his bill in the late Richmond chancery court against William Tazewell, surviving executor of Littleton Tazewell deceased, in which he stated, that on the 24th of March 1803 his intestate let by deed a tract 330 of land in the county of *James City called Piney Grove to Littleton Tazewell, to hold from that time until the end of the year 1810; for which Tazewell the lessee covenanted to pay him for the remaining part of the year 1803 one hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents, and during the residue of the term an annual rent of three hundred and thirty-three dollars and thirty-three and one-third cents; and that the lessee took possession of the land and held it until the lease expired. That at the same time his intestate sold and delivered to Tazewell personal property consisting of horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, implements of husbandry and other articles, for which Tazewell covenanted to pay him one thousand two hundred and seventy-seven dollars and six cents. And that it was agreed that the lessee should retain four hundred dollars for the purpose of making certain improvements upon the farm. That the parties were relations and intimate friends, which induced Tazewell to expect and ask for time to comply with his contract; and the same consideration induced Conway Whittle to grant it; so that for rent at the death of the latter, there was due to him from Tazewell two thousand one hundred dollars, exclusive of interest. That on account of the amount due for the purchase of the property sold to Tazewell nothing was paid until 1810, when two payments were made which reduced the amount due on that account to three hundred and sixty-one dollars and seventy cents, with interest from the 8th of August 1810.

The bill, after stating the death of Littleton Tazewell, and his having left a will charging his real estate with the payment of his debts, and the qualification of his widow and William Tazewell as his personal representatives, sets out a correspondence between William Tazewell and Conway Whittle, and also a correspondence between said Tazewell and the plaintiff, in relation to this debt due from Littleton Tazewell to *Conway Whittle.
331 That he supposed that the debt was due by parol until after 1821, when he instituted an action at law to recover it; and when he learned for the first time, that the lease of the land and the sale of the property was by deed. That he therefore dismissed his action at law, being advised that he could not there find redress. That the deed had been lost, but that it was probably executed in duplicate, and if so, it was probable that one of the duplicates was among the papers of Littleton Tazewell.

The executor William Tazewell was called upon to answer the bill fully and particularly. And the prayer of the bill was for a settlement of the executor's accounts, and the payment of the amount due with interest: And if the personal estate was not sufficient for the purpose, that the real estate of Littleton Tazewell, which had been subjected by his will to the payment of his debts, might be sold for that purpose.

William Tazewell answered the bill. He objected to the jurisdiction of the court; and submitted, whether the court would enquire into the justness of a demand which had been standing upon an open account for about twenty years; and whether even should the statute of limitations not bar the claim, it might not be esteemed a stale account, especially as the same, if due at all, was due more than five years before the death of Littleton Tazewell. He admitted that the estate called Piney Grove in the county of James City, was rented by Conway Whittle to Littleton Tazewell; but at what time this was done, for what period, or on what terms, he did not know, and called for strict proof. He denied that Littleton Tazewell had ever consented for the sum of four hundred dollars to improve the Piney Grove estate to the extent that he did improve it. He said that the plantation had been unoccupied for many years; that the dwelling-house had been burned 332 down; only one *negro-house was standing, and that in so old and shattered a condition that it was not worth repairing; and the fencing entirely rotten or removed. Instead of this state of things, when the plantation was returned to Conway Whittle, beside other valuable improvements Littleton Tazewell had built on it at his cost, a good dwelling-house with two rooms on each floor and a brick chimney at each end, and a large well built barn, which together could not have been worth less than two thousand dollars.

He further stated that when he wrote the letters exhibited by the plaintiff he was acting as the agent of Mrs. Tazewell; that they supposed, as a claim had been made, that the plaintiff had some documents to sustain it; and on which if any thing was due, it was very inconsiderable, as Littleton Tazewell had been often heard to say, that on a settlement of accounts with Conway Whittle there would be little or nothing due on either side. That it was true he did request the plaintiff to furnish a statement of what appeared to be due by any documents in his hands; but that though a statement was furnished no proof of its accuracy or any documents accompanied it, or had ever been furnished.

He stated further that he knew nothing of the deed of lease. It had never been in his possession, nor did he believe that Mrs. Tazewell ever had it in her possession. And he called for proof that it ever existed, and of its contents and stipulations.

The plaintiff filed with his bill a letter from Littleton Tazewell to Conway Whittle, dated "Williamsburg, July 26th, 1809," in which he said, "I have experienced considerable uneasiness at not having been able to pay your claim against me for articles purchased at P. Grove. Until the last year I made scarcely any thing for market. By the end of this year I trust it will be 333 in my power to settle with you *without selling any other property, such excepted as can be spared conveniently. Mr. Tyler has talked of purchasing the plantation, in which case I shall have no difficulty in selling to him the stock, &c., on the place. Provided you can sell without a sacrifice, I think it will be advisable. Lands generally are not benefited by being leased; though that rule does not hold as relates to my lease."

The account of the personal property sold which was filed with the bill contained credits for two payments made, one for six hundred and fifty dollars made on the 30th of July 1810, and the other for the like sum made on the 8th of August of the same year.

The plaintiff also filed with his bill two letters of William Tazewell, one to Conway Whittle, dated the 24th of July 1816, in which he says, "You will oblige by forwarding a statement of your claim on the estate of L. Tazewell deceased to the executrix at Williamsburg." He expresses the opinion that the estate will be ample to pay all the debts, and concludes by saying, "All that is now asked of the creditors is that they will not compel a sacrifice of the property."

On this letter is an endorsement by Conway Whittle, stating that it had been answered on the 30th of July 1816, stating that he was about to start to the springs, and on his return would furnish the amount; and that he felt disposed to accommodate the executors with any reasonable time to enable them to make the most of the property.

The other letter was to Fortescue Whittle, and dated at Richmond, 30th November 1819. After acknowledging the receipt of a letter from Whittle, he says, that Mrs. Tazewell writes that she can find no documents establishing debits against your late brother, except mechanics' bills and receipts for improvements made at Piney Grove.
334 "She did not fail to *express her sensibility of the indulgence that had been extended to her by the representatives of your brother. You will oblige by furnishing a statement of what appears to be due from any documents in your hands."

It does not appear with certainty when Littleton Tazewell died; though William Tazewell states in a note addressed to the commissioner in May 1829, that he died in November 1815. His will was admitted to record on the 27th of November of that year, and by it he gave his executors power to sell his real estate for the payment of his debts.

On the 13th of January 1827 a decree was made in the cause directing the defendant William Tazewell to settle his administration account. At this time no evidence as to the deed of lease, or its terms, or of the property sold, had been filed. In the month of February several depositions were taken by the plaintiff. The only witness who proved the existence of the deed was Charles Z. Abrahams. He stated that there was a deed of lease which was executed, as he thought, in the month of May 1804. That he saw both Whittle and Tazewell execute it, and that himself and two others attested it. The last he saw of it, it was in the hands of Whittle. He was inclined to think the lease commenced in 1804; did not remember how long it was to continue; and that the rent reserved was about ninety pounds per annum.

The witness stated further that Tazewell was to be allowed for the buildings he put upon the plantation. That it was in a wretched condition, having little or no fencing around it, nor any building of any description except an old log house. That the witness did the carpenters' work of a dwelling-house on the place, and finished a dairy, for which he received from Littleton Tazewell and the executor one hundred and eighty-nine pounds, eight shillings 335 and one penny. This did *not include materials, or any other than the carpenters' work. He stated further that a smoke-house and a large barn were built on the place.

There were other witnesses, one of whom aided to build the barn, who thought that the lease commenced in 1803, and that the rent was one hundred pounds a year. It was very certain that it terminated with the end of the year 1809; and the only witness who spoke of the period of its existence fixed it at six years.

There was but one witness who spoke of the property purchased by Tazewell from Whittle. He stated that he was building a barn on the place. He thought Tazewell took possession in 1803; and he mentions a number of horses, oxen and implements of husbandry, which were received from Whittle by Tazewell; but according to his estimate of their value, they did not amount to one thousand dollars.

In April 1829 the commissioner issued a notice that he would proceed on the 25th of May to execute the order of the court directing the settlement of the executor's accounts; and in January 1834 he made his report, showing a balance in favor of the executor. This report, though certainly very defective, was not excepted to by the plaintiff until February 1846.

In 1842 the plaintiff amended his bill, and made William O. Goode, who had married the only child of Littleton Tazewell, a defendant, and he revived the suit against Edward S. Gay, executor of William Tazewell who had died previously.

Gay answered, disclaiming all knowledge of the plaintiff's claim, referring to the answer of his testator, and relying upon all the grounds of defense therein set up. Goode also answered in 1843, setting up the statute of limitations, if there was no deed, objecting that no sufficient excuse had been shown for the failure to produce it, 336 and no affidavit made that it *was lost; and also objecting that the court had no jurisdiction of the cause.

In February 1846 the plaintiff filed an affidavit that he had not been able to find the deed of lease among the papers of Conway Whittle; and did not know what had become of it. And in July following the cause came on to be heard, when the court made an order directing one of the commissioners of the court to take an account of the moneys due from Littleton Tazewell to Conway Whittle, under the contracts of lease and sale in the bill mentioned.

In January 1848 the commissioner made his report, in which he stated the amount due on the lease on the 31st of December 1809, at one thousand four hundred and seventy dollars and thirty cents of principal, and two hundred and six dollars and two cents of interest; and the amount due on the 8th of August 1810, for the property purchased, at the sum of four hundred and sixty-three dollars and thirty-two cents.

In 1852 the defendant Gay filed various exceptions to this report, and especially relied on the statute of limitations as a bar to so much of the claim as related to the purchase of property.

The report of the executor's account, made in the case of Saunders v. Tazewell's ex'or, was by consent filed in this case. That report had been twice recommitted, and there were numerous exceptions to it. It stated an amount due from the executor William Tazewell sufficient to pay the debts in both cases, if all the exceptions of the defendant were overruled.

In February 1853 the cause came on to be finally heard with the case of Saunders' ex'or v. Tazewell's ex'or, when the court overruled all the defendant's exceptions to the report of the plaintiff's debt, and having had a special statement made showing the amount of the debt due to be, on 337 the 1st of January *1853, seven thousand and sixty-five dollars and fifty-five cents, made a decree in favor of the plaintiff for that amount, with interest on one thousand nine hundred and thirty-five dollars and sixty-two cents, from the 1st of January preceding till paid; to be paid by the defendant Gay out of the assets of his testator in his hands to be administered. From this decree Gay applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

There were a number of questions in the cause elaborately argued, which, as they are not involved in the decision of this court, will not be noticed further.

Grattan, for the appellant:

The claim of the plaintiff as stated in his bill arises from two sources, though both were stated to be embraced by the same deed. Let us first consider the claim arising out of the sale of property. This sale according to the bill was made in 1803, and was evidenced by deed, and amounted to one thousand two hundred and seventy-seven dollars and six cents.

Now it is very clear that none of the witnesses who have been examined in the cause, and that no paper filed, gives the slightest ground even to suppose that this sale was evidenced by deed. Abrahams who is the only witness who speaks of the deed, not only does not speak of it as embracing the sale of the property, but says that he knew nothing about the sale. Then is not this branch of the plaintiff's claim barred by the statute of limitations.

It is said that the statute of limitations is no defense unless it is pleaded; and further that the precise time which will bar must be stated in the plea. And the cases of Hickman v. Stout, 2 Leigh 6, and Hudson v. Hudson, 6 Munf. 352, are cited. The latter of these cases is relied on for the 338 last branch of this proposition; *and if the case is really an authority for it, then it stands alone in its requirements. Aylett v. Robinson, 9 Leigh 45; Harpending v. The Dutch Church, 16 Peters' R. 455, 486. Although the bill charges that the sale was by deed, yet the answer of William Tazewell refers to the statute; the answer of Goode who married the only daughter and principal devisee and legatee of Littleton Tazewell, sets it up; and the defendant Gay in his exceptions to the commissioner's report expressly relies upon it. Now although it is a general rule that the statute must be pleaded, yet where from the mode of proceeding this cannot be done, it may be relied on without plea. Thus in Shewen v. Vanderhorst, 4 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 458, it was held that any party interested might set up the statute against a creditor in the master's office. So in Purcell v. Wilson, 4 Gratt. 16, an action of ejectment, the defendant was permitted to rely on the statute upon the trial in order to limit the recovery of mesne profits, as he had no opportunity to plead it. In Trimyer v. Pollard, 5 Gratt. 460, and Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110, a plaintiff was held entitled to rely upon the statute on the trial, to defeat a set off; and in Jincey v. Winfield, 9 Gratt. 708, a party was allowed to set it up by exception to the report of a commissioner.

If, then, the statute of limitations has been properly relied on, the question is, Does it apply? According to the plaintiff's pretensions, the debt was due in 1803, and this suit was instituted in 1825. Unless, therefore, the plaintiff can show something which will take the case out of the operation of the statute, it must bar his recovery. But there is nothing in the record which can have that effect. Even if the letter of Littleton Tazewell of July 26th, 1809, or the two letters of William Tazewell in 1816 and 1819, were acknowledgments of the debt sufficient to remove the bar of 339 *the statute, still the suit was not brought within five years from the date of the latest of these letters. But the letters of William Tazewell are wholly insufficient for that purpose. They, in fact, admit no debt; and certainly not this claim on account of property sold to Littleton Tazewell. It does not appear that he knew that there had been such a purchase. Whatever may have been the case formerly, certainly at the present day these letters are wholly inoperative to take the case out of the statute. On this point the court is referred, without comment, to the cases of Bell v. Morrison, 1 Peters' R. 351, 360-1-2; Butcher v. Hixton, 4 Leigh 519; Farmers Bank v. Clarke, Id. 603; Aylett v. Robinson, 9 Leigh 45; Sutton v. Burrus, Id. 381; Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110, 116-17-20.

But further. If these letters were sufficient in the case of a debtor to revive his own debt, they are not sufficient in the case of an executor to revive the debt of his testator. In such a case there must be an express acknowledgment of the debt, and as it would seem, an express promise to pay. Braxton v. Harrison, 11 Gratt. 30, 56, 57; Tullock v. Dunn, 21 Eng. C. L. R. 478. Indeed, although an executor may revive a debt by his acknowledgment made before the debt is barred by the statute, yet after a debt is barred it is not competent for an executor to revive it by any acknowledgment. Braxton v. Harrison, supra; Thompson v. Peter, 12 Wheat. R. 565.

The only other ground which can be resorted to for the removal of the bar of the statute is the charge for the payment of debts in the will of Littleton Tazewell. It does not appear when he died, though William Tazewell states that he died in November 1815. If this shall be considered as evidence, then it is apparent that even admitting that the letter of Littleton Tazewell of July 1809, is a sufficient acknowledgment of the debt, yet that was 340 more than five years before *his death, and the debt was therefore barred when he died. But if the statement of William Tazewell is not evidence, then the burden being upon the plaintiff to remove the bar of the statute, he has failed to show that Littleton Tazewell died and the charge in his will took effect before the debt was barred.

Then will a charge in a will revive a debt barred by the statute? At one time this seems to have been supposed to be the law. Roane, J., in Lewis v. Bacon, 3 Hen. & Munf. 89; and that judge seems to have supposed that it extended even to personal estate. As to the latter point, it certainly is not the law here now. Braxton v. Woods, 4 Gratt. 25. And indeed the general question is now settled in the negative too firmly to admit of any further discussion of it. Burke v. Jones, 2 Ves. & Beame 275; Hargreaves v. Michel, 6 Madd. 326; Fergus v. Gore, 1 Sch. & Lef. 107; Roosevelt v. Mark, 6 John. Ch. R. 266, 293.

The second ground of the plaintiff's claim is the lease. This was by deed, and therefore the statute of limitations does not apply to it. The question, however, still arises, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, a court of equity will give the plaintiff a decree?

The counsel then went into an examination of the facts to show that there had been gross neglect on the part of the plaintiff, and that the account could not now be taken without doing great injustice to the estate of Littleton Tazewell. He referred to Carr v. Chapman, 5 Leigh 164; Hayes v. Goode, 7 Id. 452; Page v. Booth, 1 Rob. R. 161; West v. Thornton, 7 Gratt. 177; Smith v. Thompson, Id. 112; Hillis v. Hamilton, 10 Id. 300; Crawford v. Patterson, 11 Id. 364.

Stanard, for the appellee:

The counsel for the appellant has correctly stated that the claim of the 341 plaintiff arises from two sources; *one the lease of the land, and the other the sale of the property. And in the first place, let us consider the questions connected with the sale of the property.

The letter of Littleton Tazewell, written in July 1809, is conclusive to prove a sale of property by Conway Whittle to Tazewell, and that the purchase money of that property was still due at the date of that letter. There are moreover witnesses who prove the property sold, which may well be supposed to have been sold for the sum stated in the plaintiff's bill. But if there was doubt upon this point, there can be none on the proposition that the defendant, if he relies upon the credits stated in the account filed by the plaintiff with his bill, must take that account altogether; and therefore if the defendant is to be credited for the payment of one thousand and three hundred dollars in 1810, he must be charged with the sum of one thousand two hundred and seventy-seven dollars and six cents in 1803. Robertson v. Archer, 5 Rand. 319.

But the principal reliance of the defendant as to this part of the plaintiff's claim is the statute of limitations. To entitle a party to the benefit of this defense, he must plead it or rely upon it in some form in his pleadings, and the time prescribed by the statute should be particularly pleaded or relied on. Hudson v. Hudson, 6 Munf. 352; Hickman v. Stout, 2 Leigh 6. Then the first question is, whether the statute has been sufficiently pleaded; and that question is clearly settled in the negative by a reference to the defendant's answer.

It is insisted on the other side that the defendant was entitled to set up the defense of the statute by an exception to the commissioner's report, and that such an exception had been taken to the report in this case. The report in this case was made in 1848, and during the whole time that the case was before the commissioner, 342 *it does not appear that the defendant attended him, and certainly no such objection was taken before him; and in fact it was not taken in court until 1852. Now if this defense of the statute may be set up in this mode, it must be done before the commissioner, so that the plaintiff may have an opportunity to repel it by proof.

But if the objection of the statute is properly taken, then the next question is, Does it constitute a bar? We have the letter of Littleton Tazewell in July 1809 admitting the debt, and we have the payments made by him and credited in the account as late as August 1810. And we have the death of Littleton Tazewell and his will admitted to probat in November 1815 creating a trust for the payment of debts.

In considering the question whether the trust of the will for the payment of debts will repel the bar of the statute in this case, we should look to the law as it was then understood and expounded; and clearly at the time of the death of Littleton Tazewell the trust of his will would have repelled the bar of the statute to the extent of the trust subject, though the debt was barred at his death. Lewis v. Bacon, 3 Hen. & Munf. 89. Judge Roane went even further, and held that the debt was revived to the fullest extent. It is true that such is not now the doctrine of the courts; Burke v. Jones, 2 Ves. & Beame 275; but the question is, what was the law of Virginia in 1815, not what it is now.

But take the doctrine as stated in Burke v. Jones, supra, as the law of this case. We show that in August 1810 our debt was admitted to be due by Littleton Tazewell, and that he then made a payment upon it; and we show his will admitted to probat in November 1815, creating a trust which it is conceded prevents the running of the statute against all debts not then barred.

Having done this, we have made
343 *out our case, and it is for the other side to show that the debt was barred at the time. The party pleading the statute must bring himself within it.

If the debt has not been revived by the will, has it not been revived by the acts of the executor. It is said by the counsel for the appellant that an executor cannot revive a debt barred by the statute. In this, however, he is mistaken. Baxter v. Penniman, 8 Mass. R. 134; Emerson v. Thompson, 16 Mass. R. 429; Northcutt v. Wilkinson, 12 B. Monr. R. 408. An admission by an executor will take a case out of the statute, when such an admission made by the debtor would have that effect. There is some difference in the English cases where there is more than one executor, and the admission is by one. But in this case the executors were acting together. Both the letters of William Tazewell show that he was acting for both, and the last was written after an examination of the papers of their testator with reference to the plaintiff's claim. This letter, too, was answered, and the account asked for furnished, as admitted by William Tazewell's answer; and that was never objected to until this suit was commenced. None even of the modern cases would reject this evidence as an admission of the debt sufficient to revive it. Ault v. Goodrich, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 740; Smith v. Poole, 35 Eng. Ch. R. 16; Townes v. Birchett, 12 Leigh 173.

The counsel then went into an examination of the facts of the case, and endeavored to maintain that it was not a case in which the court would refuse relief. He referred to Baker v. Morris, 10 Leigh 284.

MONCURE, J. The debt for which the decree in this case was rendered consists of two parts; first, a balance claimed to be due for personal property sold by Conway Whittle to Littleton Tazewell in March 1803; and secondly, a balance claimed 344 to be due for *rent of a tract of land called Piney Grove, leased by said Whittle to said Tazewell from that time until the end of 1809.

First: As to the balance claimed on account of the sale of personal property. This debt was due by parol contract. The original cause of action accrued in 1803 or 1804. The suit was brought in 1825. It is of course barred by the statute of limitations; if the appellant had a right to avail himself of that defense, and if the debt has not been taken out of the operation of the statute.

It is objected that the appellant had no right to avail himself of the statute; not having relied on the same by plea or answer. It is certainly true, as a general rule, that this defense must be made by plea or answer: and the rule applies as well to a court of equity as a court of law. If this case comes under the rule, I think the defense was sufficiently made by answer. The same strictness of pleading is not required in equity as at law. It is not common to plead the statute specially or formally in equity; but only to rely upon it, in general terms, in the answer. The only reason for requiring the defense to be made by plea or answer is that the plaintiff may have an opportunity, if he can, to take the case out of the operation of the statute. Anything in an answer which will apprise the plaintiff that the defendant relies on the statute will be sufficient, if such facts be averred as are necessary to show that the statute is applicable. In this case the executor of Littleton Tazewell in his answer submits to the court, "Whether, even should the statute of limitations not bar the claim, it may not be esteemed a stale account, especially as the same, if due at all, was so more than five years before the death of the testator." This plainly shows that if the statute should be a bar to the claim, the respondent intended to rely upon it. And the facts necessary
345 *to sustain the defense are here set forth. In this respect the case differs from that of Hudsons v. Hudson's adm'r, 6

Digitized by Google

Munf. 352. It is certainly an informal mode of pleading the statute: but proceeded no doubt from the fact that the plaintiff had alleged the debt to be due by specialty; to which of course the statute would not have applied. Again: the defendant Goode expressly and formally relies on the statute in his answer; and as he, in right of his deceased wife, is sole residuary legatee of Littleton Tazewell, his defense enures to the benefit of the executor. In Shewen v. Vanderhorst, 4 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 458, a creditor applied, under the common decree in an administration suit, to prove a debt which was barred by lapse of time; and the executors refusing to interfere, the plaintiff a residuary legatee, insisted on setting up the objection of the statute: Held, that it was competent for the plaintiff or any other party interested in the fund to take advantage of the statute, notwithstanding the refusal of the executors. In this case the executor, instead of refusing, manifested his intention to rely on the statute if it should be applicable.

But I do not think this case comes under the general rule. The plaintiff averred in his bill that the debt was due by specialty; which was alleged to be lost. It afterwards appeared that the debt was not due by specialty, but by simple contract: or at least that was the presumption from the absence of any proof on the subject. Until then, it did not appear that the statute afforded a bar to the claim. The proper mode of making the defense, therefore, was by exception to the commissioner's report of the claim; which exception was accordingly taken.

The appellant then had a right to avail himself of the statute; and the next question is, Whether the debt has been taken out of its operation? The counsel for the appellee contended that it has; 1st, 346 by the *will, which charges the whole estate of the testator with the payment of his debts; and 2dly, by a new promise or acknowledgment, made by the personal representatives or one of them, within five years before the institution of the suit.

As to the charge created by the will. It raises no trust in regard to the personal estate; and is merely inoperative, so far as that is concerned. It cannot therefore prevent the statute from being a bar to a suit brought to obtain payment of a debt out of the personal estate. Jones v. Scott, 4 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 413; S. C. 4 Clarke & Fin. 382; Brown's adm'r v. Griffiths, 6 Munf. 450; Braxton v. Wood's adm'r, 4 Gratt. 25. But the charge creates a trust in regard to the real estate. Formerly it was supposed that such a trust embraced all debts of the testator, whether barred or not by the statute at the time of his death. But since the decision of Burke v. Jones, 2 Ves. & Beame 275, it has been considered to be well settled that a debt barred at the time of the testator's death, is not revived by such a charge, in regard to real any more than personal estate. The able judgment of Sir Thomas Plumer in that case, as Ch. Kent has said, is well founded upon principle and upon the authorities, and puts an end to the question. Roosevelt v. Mark, 6 John. Ch. R. 266. See the principles stated and the cases collected on this subject in 1 Rob. Pr. new ed. p. 566-571. "The doctrine, then, (in the language of that writer,) is narrowed down to this, that where there is a devise of real estate for the payment of debts, there is, as to the proceeds of such real estate, a trust created (according to Lord Redesdale's opinion) for those creditors whose debts, at the testator's death, were not barred by the statute; and after that event the statute does not so run as to affect the claim of those creditors upon these proceeds." It is unnecessary to deter-347 mine the construction and effect *of the provision on this subject in the Code, p. 592, ¶ 9, as it does not apply to this case.

In Lewis' ex'or v. Bacon's legatee, 3 Hen. & Munf. 89, it was held that a debt barred at the time of the testator's death was, to some extent, revived by such a trust. But that case was decided in 1808, before the decision of Burke v. Jones, and ought not to be considered as settling the law of this state in opposition to the sound doctrine of the latter case. It was decided by three judges, who differed among themselves and made a compromise decree; and was decided at a period when the statute was almost entirely frittered away by the course of adjudication here and elsewhere. A striking illustration of this is afforded in the opinion of Judge Roane, who says, "It has been established, (and if it has not it ought to be,) that an advertisement by a debtor notifying all those who have any just debts owing to them, that they may apply at such a place and get payment, is such an acknowledgment as will bring a debt out of the statute." Id. 109. He was for considering the debt revived as to the personal as well as the real estate.

Then was the debt barred by the statute at the time of the testator's death? There is nothing in the record to show the precise period of his death; except the statement made by his executor and returned with Commissioner Green's report, from which it appears that he died in November 1815; in which month also his will was admitted to probat. Regarding that as the period of his death, the debt in question was barred, in any view which can be taken as to the time when the cause of action accrued; whether it was in March 1804, when it is said the debt first became due, or July 26, 1809, the date of his letter to C. Whittle, or August 8, 1810, the date of the last credit given on account of the debt. But it was contended (and perhaps properly) that 348 there is no sufficient evidence of *the period of his death, or that it happened within five years after the cause of action accrued. Concede this, and still it does not help the objection to the bar of the statute. The appellant relies on the statute; which is certainly a bar, unless the claimant can show something which will take the case out of its operation. The burden of doing this devolves on the latter. He seeks to do it by producing the will. But that is not enough; as the will was admitted to probat more than five years after the cause of action accrued. He ought further to have proved, if he could, that the testator died within five years after the cause of action accrued. This he has not done, and therefore he has failed to repel the bar of the statute by means of the will.

As to any new promise or acknowledgment by the personal representatives, or either of them. The debt, as we have seen, was barred at the time of the testator's death; and if the counsel for the appellant was right in maintaining that a personal representative cannot revive such a debt, then there is an end of the question. But without expressing any opinion upon that point, and conceding, so far as this case is concerned, that such a debt may be revived by a personal representative, let us enquire whether this debt has been so revived.

The letters of W. Tazewell of the 24th of July 1816, and 30th of November 1819, are plainly insufficient, according to all the recent authorities, to revive the debt. Even if they were sufficient; more than five years elapsed between the date of the last, and the institution of the suit; so that the debt was then again barred, unless in the mean time revived by some other promise or acknowledgment. The only evidence of any such promise or acknowledgment is the fact admitted in the answer of W. Tazewell; that, in compliance with the re-
349 quest contained in his letter of *the 30th of November 1819, Whittle would furnish a statement of what appeared to be due from any documents in his hands, "a statement was furnished, but no proof of its accuracy or any documents accompanied it, and none have been furnished to this day." This fact, whether taken by itself, or in connection with the letters, cannot amount to such a promise or acknowledgment as will take the debt out of the statute. The only authority relied on to give it that effect, is Townes v. Birchett, 12 Leigh 173; decided by two judges in a court of three, and of course not a binding authority. The majority, Judges Tucker and Cabell, were of opinion that the rule, that "an account current rendered by one party to another, received and held without complaint or objection, shall be deemed a stated account," is not confined to accounts rendered by merchant to merchant of mutual dealings between them as merchants. The third judge, Allen, was of opinion that the rule is so confined. Whether it be so or not, it cannot apply to this case; in which an account current is not rendered by one party to another, of transactions of which they are both cognizant; but in which an account is rendered against the estate of a decedent to his personal representative, wholly ignorant of the nature or amount of the debt. A promise by the executor to pay the debt cannot be inferred from his receiving and holding the account without objection; and more especially, if the debt be barred by the statute. If an executor can revive a debt so barred, he can only do it by an express promise; or, at least, by such an express acknowledgment as plainly implies a promise to pay the debt. Indeed, in Tullock v. Dunn, 21 Eng. C. L. R. 478, Chief Justice Abbott said, "As against an executor, an acknowledgment merely is not sufficient; there must be an express promise." See also 1 Rob. Pr. new ed. 575. But even if the statement ren-
350 dered *could be considered as an account stated, and sufficient to revive the debt, it does not appear that it was rendered within five years before the institution of the suit. In every view of the case, therefore, the claim which arose from the sale of personal property, is barred by the statute.

Secondly: As to the claim for rent. The complainant alleged in his bill that the land was leased by deed on the 24th of March 1803, to be held from that time until the end of 1810, at the rent of one hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six and two-thirds cents for the remaining part of 1803, and three hundred and thirty-three dollars and thirty-three and one-third cents per year for the residue of the term; that it was agreed that the lessee should retain four hundred dollars for the purpose of making certain improvements on the land; and that the deed contained a covenant for the payment of the rent, but, by some accident or misfortune unknown to the complainant, had been lost: And he claimed the whole amount of the rent, subject only to a credit for the four hundred dollars. W. Tazewell in his answer admitted that the land was rented of C. Whittle by L. Tazewell; but at what time, for what period, or on what terms, he did not know, and called for the strictest proof. He denied "that L. Tazewell ever consented, for the sum of four hundred dollars, to improve the Piney Grove estate to the extent which he did improve it. For the plantation had been unoccupied for many years; the dwelling-house had been burnt down; only one negro-house was standing, and that in so old and shattered a condition that it was not worth repairing, and the fencing entirely rotten or removed. Instead of this state of things when the plantation was returned to C. Whittle, besides other valuable improvements, L. Tazewell had built on it at his cost, a good dwelling-house with two rooms on the floor, and a brick chimney at each 351 *end, and a large well built barn, which together could not have been worth less than two thousand dollars." He denied all knowledge of the deed of lease, and demanded proof that it ever existed, and of its contents. The evidence shows that a deed of lease was executed, but does not show what were its contents. It shows that the annual rent was probably one hundred pounds, though Abrahams, the witness mainly relied on to sustain the claim, thinks the rent was ninety pounds. It further shows that the lease probably commenced in 1803, though Abrahams thinks it was in 1804; and that it determined at the end of 1809 instead of 1810, as alleged in the bill. There is no evidence of the loss of the lease, or of any search having been made for it. Abrahams, who proves its execution, thinks he last saw it in possession of C. Whittle, and advised L. Tazewell to take a copy; but does not know whether he did or not. There is no evidence that L. Tazewell agreed to make the improvements for four hundred dollars. On the contrary, Abrahams proves that the plantation was in a wretched condition, having little or no fencing around it, nor any building upon it except an old log house; that during the term he built a dwelling-house and smoke-house, and completed a dairy, and other workmen built a very substantial barn; and that under the agreement between C. Whittle and L. Tazewell, the cost of building all the said houses was to be deducted from the rent. His bill alone amounted to six hundred and ninety-six dollars and thirty-five cents; and included no charge for materials. It does not appear what was the cost of materials, nor what the cost of the barn and other improvements made upon the land. There is reason, however, for believing that the whole cost of improvements made by L. Tazewell under the agreement was equal, or nearly so, to the whole amount of the rent, and that at the termination of the 352 lease he owed little *or nothing on account of rent. That this was the opinion of the parties, or at least of L. Tazewell, is manifest from the tenor of his letter to C. Whittle of July 26, 1809, in which he says, "I have experienced considerable uneasiness at not having been able to pay your claim against me for articles purchased at Piney Grove," excuses himself for not having done so, and expresses a hope that he would be able to do so by the end of the year; but makes no allusion whatever to any debt on account of rent. Is it credible that he would not have made such an allusion if he had owed all the rents (except four hundred dollars for improvements) according to the pretension set up in this suit; or even if he had owed any material part of them? He lived six years after the date of that letter, and C. Whittle survived him; and yet it does not appear, and is not pretended, that he ever admitted his liability, or that application was ever made to him for anything, on account of rent. Nor was any account for rent ever rendered to him or his representatives until after W. Tazewell's letter of November 30th, 1819. If C. Whittle intended to make any claim on account of rent, the circumstances required him to make it promptly, and to prosecute it with diligence. Instead of doing so, no claim was asserted during the lives of the parties, nor until 1819, nor any suit brought until 1821; when, it seems, a suit at law was brought, which was pending two or three years and then dismissed; the executor of C. Whittle having then, for the first time, discovered that the debt was not due by parol, as he had supposed, but by a specialty which had been lost. In 1825 this suit was brought in equity. In 1827 an order was made for the settlement of the account of L. Tazewell's executor. Afterwards, in the same year, for the first time, depositions were taken to sustain the claim. In 1829 the order of account was placed in 353 the hands of a commissioner, *whose report was not made until 1834; after which nothing further was done until 1841, when leave was obtained to file an amended bill, which was accordingly filed, but more than a year thereafter. In 1846 an order was, for the first time, made, to take an account of what was due from the estate of L. Tazewell to the estate of C. Whittle; and it was not until 1853 that the decree was made from which this appeal was taken. It would be difficult to excuse such gross laches in such a case. The excuse assigned for it is wholly inadequate for the purpose. A just account cannot now be settled. The proper parties to make the settlement are not in esse, but have long been in their graves. Their representatives know little or nothing about the facts; and even the original representatives of the alleged debtor have long since passed from the stage. There may or may not be something due. It is matter of conjecture merely; and the most probable conjecture is that nothing is due. I think we must so conclude; and, at all events, that no relief can now be given on account of the claim for rent.

For the foregoing reasons, I am of opinion that the decree ought to be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Decree reversed.

*Prosecution of Claim—Laches.—For the proposition that laches in the prosecution of a claim is not always sufficient to defeat it, but that the laches must be such as to afford a reasonable presumption of the satisfaction or the abandonment of the claim, the principal case is cited and approved in the following cases: Tunstall v. Withers, 86 Va. 900, 11 S. E. Rep. 565; Armentrout v. Shafer, 89 Va. 569, 16 S. E. Rep. 726.

In Terry v. Fontaine, 83 Va. 455, 2 S. E. Rep. 743, the rule is approved, but the court held in that case that the bill should be dismissed for laches. See, on the subject of laches, foot-note to Hill v. to afford a reasonable presumption of the satisfaction or abandonment of the claim; or such as to prevent a proper defense by reason of the death of parties, loss of evidence or otherwise.

2. Chancery Practice—Interest beyond Penalty of Bond.—Courts of equity will decree interest upon a bond or judgment beyond the penalty, against the principal debtor.

3. Appellate Practice—Omission of Credit by Commissioner—Correction of.—A commissioner having by mistake omitted a credit in ascertaining the amount due upon a bond, the appellate court will correct the decree in this respect, and affirm it with costs.

On the 20th of July 1795 Littleton Tazewell executed to John Bracken and Robert Saunders, executors of James Carter deceased, a bond in the penalty of one thousand two hundred and fifty-three pounds six shillings and seven and a half pence, with condition to pay one-half of that sum on the 1st day of the next January, with interest from the date. Upon this bond there was a credit of two hundred and fifty pounds, under date of October 24th, 1796.

Littleton Tazewell died in 1815; and by his will, which was duly admitted to probat, he authorized his executors to sell any part of his estate real or personal for the payment of his debts; and he directed that his estate should be kept together for the support of his widow and only child until the latter should marry. Mrs. Tazewell and Dr. William Tazewell qualified as executors of the will.

In September 1817 Bracken and Saunders recovered a judgment by default upon the bond aforesaid, against Mrs. Tazewell as executrix of her husband. In April 1818 this judgment was enjoined by Mrs.
355 Tazewell *and Dr. Tazewell; and it was not dissolved until August 1836. In the meantime Mrs. Tazewell died, and an order was made in the injunction cause, requiring Dr. Tazewell to consent to the revival of the judgment against him as executor; and this was done in April 1832. In August 1836 the injunction was dissolved, but without damages, and with costs to the plaintiff, which were directed to be credited on the judgment; the court being of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to come into equity against a judgment for the purchase money for land, to a part of which he could not otherwise obtain title. The only part of this injunction cause which is in the present case is the final decree. From that it appears that the land on which the judgment enjoined had been obtained, was given upon the purchase of a tract of land called "Secretaries," the title to a part of which had not been made when the injunction was obtained, but was perfected by a conveyance decreed in the cause. And the final decree directed that the land should be conveyed to the surviving husband and heirs at law of Sarah Tazewell, the only child of Littleton Tazewell; and further, that if the judgment was not satisfied within three months after the date of the decree, the land called Secretaries should be sold to satisfy the judgment.

In January 1837 an execution was issued on the judgment, which had been revived against Dr. Tazewell as the executor, and was returned "no effects." In October 1842 Robert Saunders, executor of Robert Saunders deceased, and administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of James Carter, instituted this suit in the Superior court of chancery for the Richmond circuit, for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction of the said judgment out of the estate of Littleton Tazewell deceased. He made Edward S. Gay, executor of William Tazewell deceased, and William O. Goode, in his 356 *own right and as executor of Mrs. Tazewell, defendants. The accounts of the executors of Littleton Tazewell were referred to a commissioner; and his report was twice recommitted. One of the questions of controversy before the commissioner was, as to which of the executors was to be charged with the personal estate of their testator. The executor of Dr. Tazewell insisted, as Dr. Tazewell had insisted in his lifetime, that he had not acted as executor in the time of Mrs. Tazewell; whilst the commissioner held that he was the sole acting executor; and therefore charged him with the whole estate, except a very small portion of it. There were other questions also, and several exceptions to the report of Dr. Tazewell's executor. These questions were, however, only important, with reference to the preceding case of Whittle v. Tazewell; as there was no question that Dr. Tazewell had acted as executor after the death of Mrs. Tazewell, and as such had sold the real estate, the proceeds of which in his hands were more than sufficient to pay the debt of Saunders.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 1st day of February 1853, with the case of Whittle's adm'r v. Tazewell's ex'or, when the court, adopting a special statement which made the assets of the estate of Littleton Tazewell in the hands of Dr. Tazewell to amount to fourteen thousand four hundred and fifty-three dollars and fifty-five cents, which was more than sufficient to pay both debts, rendered a decree in favor of the plaintiff Saunders for the sum of five thousand two hundred and ninety-two dollars and twenty-five cents, with interest at five per cent. per annum on the principal sum due him, from January 1st, 1850; to be paid by the executor of Dr. Tazewell out of the assets in his hands, that being the amount of the sum mentioned in the condition of the bond on which the judgment had been recovered, with in-

*Chancery Practice—Interest beyond Penalty of Bond.—The proposition laid down in the principal case that courts of equity will decree interest upon a bond or judgment, beyond the penalty, against the principal debtor, was approved in Perry v. Horn, 22 W. Va. 385, citing the principal case, and the doctrine extended to the surety also. The principal case is cited in Stuart v. Hurt, 88 Va. 345, 13 S. E. Rep. 438. 357 terest from its date, *subject to the credit for two hundred and fifty pounds, paid in October 1796. The amount of the decree exceeded the whole penalty of the bond; and there was an omission to credit the amount of the costs in the injunction suit, as directed by the decree in that case. From this decree Tazewell's executor applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Grattan, for the appellant, commented on the facts of the case, and insisted that the laches of the plaintiff below forbade the interference of a court of equity in his behalf; and that on that ground the bill should have been dismissed. He then proceeded:

But if the bill is not to be dismissed, then the question arises as to the amount of the plaintiff's recovery. The decree in the cause is for more than the whole penalty of the bond; and that although two hundred and fifty pounds had been paid upon it in October 1796. We insist that, except under special circumstances, a court of equity cannot decree beyond the penalty of a bond, or the amount of the judgment. In an early case in Virginia it was held that a debtor might discharge a judgment by paying the penalty and the costs. Downman v. Downman, 1 Wash. 26. We know that at law interest beyond the penalty of a bond can only be recovered by the verdict of a jury giving the excess of interest in the shape of damages. By the act of 1804, 1 Rev. Code, p. 208, § 58, the court is put in the place of a jury; but that is only in those cases, where the court could before give interest up to the decree; and by the act it may give it to the time of payment. Deanes v. Scriba, 2 Call 415; Snickers v. Dorsey, 2 Munf. 505. And this act was not applicable to judgments. Mercer v. Beale, 4 Leigh 189.

But although interest beyond the penalty of a bond was allowed at law to be recovered in the shape of damages for the detention of the debt, the courts of 358 *equity of England have by a long course of decisions refused to follow the common law courts, and have limited the recovery to the amount of the penalty, unless the creditor had been delayed by the improper conduct of the debtor in the recovery of his debt. Nor have they limited the doctrine to cases where the debt was due by bond alone. Thus it will be seen that in cases of judgments the same rule has been followed. Denny v. Ld. Enniskillen, 12 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 609; Gaunt v. Taylor. 9 Id. 47; Tunstall v. Trappes, 5 Id. 123, 129-30; Booth v. Leycester, 15 Id. 247; Deschamp v. Vanneck, 2 Ves. jr. R. 716. So in the case of annuities. Creuze v. Hunter, 2 Ves. jr. R. 157; Mackworth v. Thomas, 5 Id. 329; Crosse v. Beddingfield, 35 Eng. Ch. R. 31; Anderson v. Dwyer, 1 Sch. & Lef. 301. Among the many cases in which the rule has been applied to bonds, are Tew v. Earl of Winterton, 3 Bro. C. C. 489; Clarke v. Seton, 6 Ves. R. 411; Hughes v. Wynne, 6 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 477. There are cases, it is true, in which interest has been allowed beyond the penalty in England; but they are cases which come within the exception before stated; as Grant v. Grant, 5 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 144; or the debt and not the bond has been secured by a mortgage, and satisfaction has been sought out of the mortgage subject; as Clarke v. Ld. Abingdon, 17 Ves. R. 106. In Virginia, interest beyond the penalty was allowed in Beall v. Silver, 2 Rand. 401; a case of gross fraud; and in Baker v. Morris, 10 Leigh 284. This last case was decided by but two judges in a court of three, and is therefore not an authority. The question, too, was obviously not considered, and was decided upon the authority of the case of Tennants v. Gray, 5 Munf. 494, a case at law, without adverting to the difference in the rules prevailing at law and in equity.

It is true that President Pendleton said in an early case that it was natural 359 justice that a man who had *the money of another should pay interest upon it. Whether that observation be correct or not as a moral proposition we need not stop to enquire. It is equally true that it is the business of courts to enforce the contracts of parties as made by them, and not to change them according to their own notions of natural justice. And certainly, however just it may be to pay interest on money, there are cases in which the law does not authorize it. Thus no interest is allowed on an unliquidated account, on estimated hires of slaves, and, until a late day, on rents. McConico v. Curzen, 2 Call 358; Waggoner v. Gray's adm'rs, 2 Hen. & Munf. 603; Baird v. Bland, 5 Munf. 492; Shields v. Anderson, 3 Leigh 729; Kyle v. Roberts, 6 Id. 495.

The question then is, Has the creditor been delayed by the improper conduct of his debtor? He was certainly not delayed by his debtor until the judgment was recovered in 1817, near twenty-two years after the bond became payable. The injunction obtained in 1818 was properly obtained, as is proved by the decree dissolving it. And indeed that decree shows that the title to the land for which the bond was given was not perfected until 1836, when the injunction was dissolved. It is true the execution issued in 1837 was returned No effects; but the assets in the hands of the executor were equitable assets; and there were other suits pending by other parties, claiming to be creditors, all of whom were equally entitled to their share of these assets. This suit was not commenced until 1842, when Dr. Tazewell was dead; and this record abundantly proves that his executor resorted to no improper means to delay the cause; but only made such a defense as justice to his testator's estate required and demanded.

Stanard, for the appellee, referred to the facts of the case to show that the 360 plaintiff below was not subject *to the imputation of laches in the prosecution of his claim.

On the question as to the extent of the plaintiff's recovery, he said: All the cases cited on the other side are cases in which the party comes in to enforce a bond, and are not cases of judgments: and a distinction has been taken between the two classes of cases. This distinction is stated by Mr. Leigh in Baker v. Morris, 10 Leigh 284, and it is in strict accordance with McClure v. Dunkin, 1 East's R. 436, and Tennants v. Gray, 5 Munf. 494. According to this last case, a party is entitled to recover interest beyond the penalty in the shape of damages, in a court of law. And here, when we are forced into equity to recover, the court of equity is in the place of the jury. We know that prior to the act of 1804, 1 Rev. Code, p. 208, § 88, the court could only give interest up to the decree; but that act authorized the interest to be continued up to the time of payment. And in Beall v. Silver, 2 Rand. 401, which was a suit in equity to enforce a judgment which did not carry interest, the court gave it.

But if this is to be treated as a case upon a bond, this court cannot refuse to give interest beyond the penalty without overruling Baker v. Morris, 10 Leigh 284. In that case the question was elaborately argued by the counsel, and two of the judges affirmed the decree of Judge Parker, who had decided the cause in the court below, but was then a member of the court. And Judge Stanard was for reversing the decree and dismissing the bill on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief; and expressed no opinion on the question as to the interest beyond the penalty. The case then had the concurrence of three of the judges of the court; and no judge dissented on this point.

But if this court should be of opinion
361 that Baker v. *Morris is not an authoritative decision of this question, still it is a decision to be respected; and that especially as it is in accordance with other decisions. Smeedes v. Hooghtaling, 3 Caines' R. 48; Tennants v. Gray, 5 Munf. 484. Nor is the case of Hughes v. Wynne, 6 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 477, inconsistent with the decision in Baker v. Morris, though there is a dictum of Sir John Leach in that case, which may be against it. In Clarke v. Lord Abingdon, 17 Ves. R. 106, there was a bond and mortgage, and Sir William Grant said, the creditor had two securities. If he sued on the bond he was limited to the penalty; but that the mortgage did not secure the bond but the debt. Upon the principle of that case we are entitled to the interest under the trust of the will of Littleton Tazewell, which directs his whole property to be sold if necessary for the payment of debts.

But further. All the cases hold that if the creditor is hindered in the recovery of his debt, he is entitled to interest beyond the penalty. Mr. Leigh in Baker v. Morris specifies the case of an injunction as one which entitles the creditor to the recovery. And here he was delayed by an injunction from 1818 to 1836. And although it appears there was some difficulty about the title to the land for which the bond was given, it does not appear that the difficulty was occasioned by either Carter or his executors.

Again. In 1836 the injunction was dissolved, and in 1837 an execution was issued on the judgment, when the interest was less than the penalty of the bond. What excuse was there at that time for the failure to pay? In Bodily v. Bellamy, 2 Burr. R. 1094, the penalty of the bond having been more than the principal and interest due, when the debtor delayed the recovery improperly he was compelled to pay all the interest. There is in fact no distinction between this case and that of Beall v.
362 Silver, 2 Rand. 401. In *that case interest was allowed because of a fraudulent conveyance. Here the executor improperly refuses to pay, though he had ample assets in his hands.

In Jones' ex'or v. Williams, 2 Call 102, Judge Pendleton says, "It is natural justice that he who has the use of another's money, should pay interest upon it." This is the sense and spirit of our legislation, as well as of our judicial decisions. To effect this object, courts of law allow the interest to be given in the shape of damages; and it will be an anomaly indeed, if courts of equity which, to effect justice, relieved the debtor from the penalty which he incurred by failing to pay according to his contract, should hesitate to compel him to do justice even after courts of law have set them the example.

MONCURE, J. The first question presenting itself for consideration in this case is, Whether Saunders' executor is entitled to any relief at all against Littleton Tazewell's estate? That a claim for which the cause of action accrued in 1796, against a debtor who died in 1815, leaving apparently an ample estate for the payment of his debts, has not yet been prosecuted to a recovery, would seem to impute great laches to those whose interest or duty it was to prosecute the claim. But laches in the assertion or prosecution of a claim is not always enough to defeat it. The laches must be such as to afford a reasonable presumption of the satisfaction or abandonment of the claim; or such as to prevent a proper defense by reason of the death of parties, loss of evidence, or otherwise. In this case it cannot be said that the claim has been satisfied or abandoned. The debtor died within twenty years after the cause of action accrued, and before any presumption of payment had arisen from lapse of time. The debt was due by specialty, to which no act of limitations then applied. The 363 debtor by his will created *a trust of his real estate for the payment of his debts, which as to the trust subject, would keep alive a debt against which no presumption of payment or act of limitations had then run. In less than two years after his death, to wit, in September 1817, a judgment at law was recovered against his executrix for the debt. Very soon thereafter, to wit, in April 1818, the judgment was enjoined. The executrix having died thereafter, (but at what time does not appear,) the judgment was in 1832 revived against the surviving executor, by his counsel, though it seems in pursuance of an order made in the injunction suit. In August 1836 the injunction was dissolved. Robert Saunders, one of the original obligees in the bond and sole plaintiff in the revived judgment, having died, it appears to have been again revived in the name of his executor. In January 1837 an execution was sued out on the last revived judgment, and returned "No effects found." In October 1842 this suit was brought in equity for a discovery and account of assets and satisfaction out of the same. There has been no unnecessary delay in the prosecution of the suit. The only delay since the death of the debtor which can justly be imputed to the creditor, or tend to raise a presumption against the claim, is that of five or six years between the return of the execution and the institution of this suit. That delay, though not well accounted for, is wholly insufficient to repel the force of the other circumstances; which conclusively show that the claim has been neither satisfied nor abandoned, but that it was promptly asserted after the debtor's death, and has at different times since been thrice recognized and established by a court of law, and once by a court of equity. Nor can it be said that the debtor or his personal representatives have been prevented from making a proper defense by any laches of the creditor or his representative. The 364 only difficulty which exists on *that subject has resulted from the neglect of duty of the debtor's representatives. That difficulty is, not in ascertaining what is due on account of the debt, or whether there were assets enough for its payment, but in ascertaining what part of these assets came to the hands of the representatives respectively, and what disposition has been made of them. It was their duty to have returned a full inventory of the estate, to have settled just and regular accounts, and thus to have furnished record evidence of the amount of assets, and the disposition made of them. They were early warned of the existence of this claim, and it was their duty to have provided for its payment. These plain duties they neglected, and the consequence of their neglect must not fall on the creditor; who, I therefore think, is entitled to relief against his debtor's estate.

The next question is, What is the measure of that relief? Does it extend to the whole principal and interest claimed, or is it limited by the amount of the penalty of the bond?

In Lord Lonsdale v. Church, 2 T. R. 388, Buller, J., after reviewing the authorities, expressed a decided opinion that in an action on a bond, damages may be recovered for the excess of principal and interest over the penalty of the bond; though the case went off without an adjudication of the question. Afterwards, however, in Knight v. Maclean, 3 Bro. C. C. 496, which came on to be argued before the same judge sitting for the lord chancellor, he sustained an exception to a master's report not allowing interest beyond the penalty of a bond. "There may be cases (he said) that say the interest shall only be to the amount of the penalty; but they are very old cases, and were determined in conformity to the rule of law. But it is now held otherwise even there." "Then, if it be so at law, where is the equity to prevent it being so here? Will a court of equity narrow 365 the remedy of creditors whom *in general it favors more than a court at law does?" This decision of Judge Buller, notwithstanding the strong reasons with which it was enforced, was reversed on reargument before the lord chancellor, Thurlow; who, about the same time, decided Tew v. Winterton, Id. 489, in the same way. And in Wild v. Clarkeson, 6 T. R. 303, Lord Lonsdale v. Church, supra, was denied by the Court of king's bench. Without reviewing all the cases, (which are numerous,) it must be admitted to be now settled in England, as a general rule, that no more than the penalty of a bond can be recovered, either at law or in equity. See 1 Saund. Rep. 58, (b,) and the cases cited in the notes, and also in the note to Hellen v. Ardley, 14 Eng. C. L. R. 186. But many exceptions have been established to the rule. As in McClure v. Durkin, 1 East's R. 436, in which it was held that in an action on a judgment it was competent to the jury to allow interest to the amount of what was due, although it exceeded the penalty of the bond on which the action was brought. So if the party be by injunction prevented from recovering his debt at law while the demand was under the penalty. Show. P. C. 15, 6 Ves. R. 79. So interest will be given beyond the penalty of a bond upon a mortgage for the same debt, though by a surety. Clarke v. Ld. Abingdon, 17 Ves. R. 106; or upon a promissory note bearing interest and given for the same debt. So if an obligor goes into a court of equity for relief as plaintiff, although he submits to nothing, yet by the mere circumstance of filing the bill, he would be taken to submit to every thing conscience and justice require. Pultaney v. Warren, 6 Ves. R. 73, 92. See the note to Hellen v. Ardley, supra.

This case might perhaps, if it were necessary, be brought within one or more of the foregoing exceptions. It might be contended that it comes within the exception established by McClure v. Dunkin, of 366 a *suit upon a judgment; or that established by Show. P. C. 15, and 6 Ves. R. 79, of a party prevented by injunction from recovering his debt at law while the demand was under the penalty. It was argued that the injunction was properly awarded; and though dissolved, yet it was without damages, and with costs to the plaintiff in the injunction; and therefore that the creditor, and not the debtor, is responsible for the consequences of the injunction. A copy of the decree of dissolution is the only part of the record in the injunction case that is before us; from which it appears that there were two causes of litigation in the case, one of which was decided in favor of the plaintiffs, and the other in favor of the defendants; but it does not appear which was the principal cause.

But I do not think it necessary to maintain that this case comes within any exception to the general rule, as now settled in England. I think no such general rule exists here; and that the decided preponderance of the American cases, so far as I have seen, is against its existence, and in favor of the doctrine as laid down by Buller. Many of those cases are cited in Perkins' note to Tew v. Winterton, 3 Bro. C. C. 489. In one of them, Mower v. Kip, 6 Paige's R. 88, the chancellor, after laying down the limitation under which a surety may be liable beyond the penalty, says, "Such a limitation of liability, however, is not applicable to the principal debtor in a money bond. As to him, the amount secured by the condition of the bond is the real debt which he is, both legally and equitably, bound to pay; and if he neglects to pay the money when it becomes due, there is no rule of justice or of common sense which should excuse him from the payment of the whole amount of the principal and interest, whether it be more or less than the formal penalty of the bond." "The general current of the American cases (he says) is in favor of allowing 367 *interest by way of damages beyond the penalty; and in many cases this principle has been extended to the case of a surety." In this state, Tennants v. Gray, 5 Munf. 494, is admitted to be an express authority in favor of the right at law to recover interest beyond the penalty in the shape of damages. That was a unanimous decision of the court, and it is believed has ever since been regarded as having settled the law of this state; which is an answer to the objection that it stands as a solitary case. If solitary, it is because it has never been questioned. But it has been incidentally recognized by this court in several cases; and never has, I believe, been questioned in any case. In Roane's adm'r v. Drummond's adm'r, 6 Rand. 182, the principle was applied to a judgment for a penal sum. In Baker v. Morris' adm'r, 10 Leigh 284, (in which there was very great delay in the assertion of the claim,) full interest was given by a court of equity, though, with the principal, it exceeded the penalty of the bond. It was said, in the argument of this case, that that was a decision of two judges in a court of three, and therefore not a binding authority. The third judge, as was properly answered in the argument, expressed no opinion on this question, but dissented on another ground. And Judge Parker, who was then on this bench, had decided the case in the court below. It therefore comes up as nearly as possible to a binding authority. But admitting the doctrine at law to be settled by Tennant's ex'or v. Gray, as I think it certainly is, the same doctrine in equity results as a necessary consequence. The doctrine at law and in equity has, I think, run on all fours in England. Or perhaps it would be more proper to say that the doctrine in equity was built upon the doctrine at law. The difficulty arose at law, where the penalty was considered the debt. There would otherwise have been no difficulty in equity, which generally 368 regards *substance and not form. But in this instance it at length determined to follow the law, and consider the penalty as the ultimatum of the debt. Knight v. Maclean, supra; Mackworth v. Thomas, 5 Ves. R. 329; Clarke v. Seton, 6 Id. 411. It is like the case of a judgment; on which, in England, interest is not generally recoverable, either in an action at law or suit in equity; but may be recovered in the former under certain circumstances in the shape of damages, and will be given in the latter under the same circumstances. Equity in this respect follows the law. Gaunt v. Taylor, 9 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 47.

In this state, interest is generally recoverable on a judgment, both at law and in equity. Beall v. Silver, 2 Rand. 401; Roane's adm'r v. Drummond's adm'rs, 6 Id. 182; Clarke's adm'r v. Day, 2 Leigh 172; Mercer's adm'r v. Beale, 4 Id. 189; Laidley v. Menifield, 7 Id. 346. But if the judgment does not carry interest on its face, it can only be recovered by action or suit upon the judgment. It is not part of the judgment, and of course cannot be recovered by execution thereon, nor does the lien of the judgment extend to it. Mercer's adm'r v. Beale, supra; Michaux's adm'r v. Brown, 10 Gratt. 612; Mower v. Kip, 6 Paige's R. 88. I think, therefore, the true doctrine with us is, that full interest on a bond, or judgment for a penalty, is generally recoverable at law or in equity, though the principal and interest exceed the penalty. The only difference between the two forums being, that according to the strict rules of law the penalty must still be regarded in form as the debt, and the excess of interest can only be recovered indirectly in the shape of damages; while equity takes no notice of the penalty, but gives a direct decree for the principal and running interest, as in other cases. Full interest should always be given, though there be a penalty, and the principal and interest exceed it, wherever full interest would be 369 *given if there were no penalty. In other words, the penalty should have no effect on the question of interest, except in regard to the form of recovering the excess in an action at law upon the bond. What I have said on this subject has reference only to the case of a principal debtor. I express no opinion in regard to the liability of a surety beyond the penalty, it being unnecessary to do so. I think this doctrine is more reasonable than the English, and more consistent with our course of business, the uniform tendency of our adjudications,

and the spirit of our legislation. The penalty of the bond, in its origin, was intended for the benefit of the obligee, and became the debt due to him when the condition was broken. It never was intended for the benefit of the obligor and to limit his liability in case of his long continued default. Courts of equity, at an early period, interposed for his relief, by compelling the obligee to receive the principal and interest in discharge of the penalty. And courts of law have long since been authorized by statute to give the same equitable relief. The penal part of the obligation has thus lost its function, and become an unmeaning form. Why should an effect be now given to it, which was never intended by the contracting parties; and which converts what was designed as a penalty on the obligor for his default into a penalty on the obligee for his indulgence? In England even, ascertained debts bear interest only in particular cases. Here they bear interest generally. According to our notion, it is "natural justice that he who has the use of another's money should pay interest." Pendleton, P., in Jones' ex'or v. Williams, 2 Call 106. In England, as we have seen, interest will not generally be given on judgments; while in this state it will. A debtor who is restrained by attachment from paying the debt will generally be compelled, in this state, to pay interest on the money while in his hands, "because the 370 *owner of the debt has a right to the interest; because money is worth its interest, and if the holder does not think so, he has always the privilege of bringing the money into court." 2 Rob. Pr. 206, and cases cited. Other cases might be cited to show the general inclination of our courts in favor of the allowance of interest. As to the spirit of our legislation on the subject. At an early period running interest was made recoverable, first, in actions at law upon contracts, 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 508, § 80; and then in suits in equity. Id. 208, § 58. It was a general rule formerly that interest was not recoverable on rent in arrear; but it has since been directed to be allowed by statute. Acts 1826–7, p. 26, ch. 27, § 3. By the Code, p. 673, § 14, the jury is authorized to allow interest even in an action founded in tort. And it is provided, that "if a verdict be rendered hereafter which does not allow interest, the sum thereby found shall bear interest from its date," and judgment shall be entered accordingly. I am therefore of opinion that the relief to which the creditor is entitled in this case is not limited by the penalty of the bond, but extends to the whole principal and interest of the judgment, subject only to the proper credits.

The remaining question is, Against whom ought the decree to be rendered? The debtor charged his whole estate for the payment of his debts; and it was ample for that purpose. The great controversy in the case has been as to what has become of the estate, and what portions thereof are properly chargeable to the personal representatives respectively. On the one hand, it was contended that W. Tazewell was the sole acting executor, and is chargeable with all the estate not affirmatively appearing to have come to the hands of Mrs. Tazewell the executrix. On the other, it was contended that she, during her life, was the sole acting representative; that W. Tazewell qualified only to 371 *unite in the sale and conveyance of the real estate, which he was advised required the co-operation of both executors; that he only acted during her life as her agent, and that, not in her character of executrix only, but chiefly in her character of devise and legatee entitled with her daughter to the possession and use of the whole estate, and that he is chargeable only with such portion of the estate as appeared to have come to his hands as executor. The difficulty of determining this controversy is apparent from the fact that three several reports were made by the commissioner under three several decrees of the court; the commissioner on each occasion being satisfied, and making his report on the basis, that W. Tazewell was the sole acting executor, while the court, not being satisfied on the subject, twice recommitted the report with the exceptions to the commissioner to be re-examined and restated by him. And at last the court, not being able to settle the whole controversy to its satisfaction, but being of opinion that assets properly applicable to the claims of the plaintiffs in this case and that of Whittle's administrator, which came on for hearing with it, and sufficient to discharge both of the said claims, did come to the hands of W. Tazewell as executor, decreed that the appellant, executor of W. Tazewell, out of the assets of his testator in his hands to be administered, should pay both of the said claims and the costs of the claimants respectively. The court did not pass upon the report and exceptions further than was necessary to make the said decree. If it were necessary for this court to decide all the questions raised by those exceptions, it would be difficult if not impossible to do so. But I think it is not. If there were any doubt as to the sufficiency of the assets which came to the hands of W. Tazewell to satisfy both of the aforesaid claims, there can be none as to their sufficiency to 372 satisfy the claim of Saunders' *executor, which alone will remain to be paid if the bill of Whittle's administrator be (according to my opinion in that case) dismissed. Without saying any thing of the personalty, the proceeds of the real estate alone, sold by W. Tazewell as executor, on or before the 1st of January 1832, are much more than sufficient to satisfy that claim; and that too, after deducting one hundred and eighty-nine dollars and twenty cents with interest on one hundred and fifty-five dollars and twelve cents from December 31, 1831, appearing to be due to said executor on his own account settled before commissioner Green in the case of Whittle's administrator. That certainly is the most favorable view which can be taken of the case for the said executor. He cannot therefore be prejudiced by the decree, and cannot complain of it. He cannot complain that the court did not decide questions of difficulty raised by his own default, when it certainly appears that there is in his hands a fund properly applicable to the payment of the decree, and sufficient for the purpose. Full power was given him by the will to sell the whole or any part of the testator's estate, real or personal, for the payment of his debts. The real estate was sold by him for that purpose in 1831 or 1832, and he or his representative yet holds the proceeds, or is liable for them. It may be said that the other creditors are entitled to participate with the claimant in this case in the application of these proceeds, which are equitable assets. No other creditors have claimed since the testator's death in 1815, more than forty years ago; and it is now too late for them to come in, if there be any. It may be said that the personal estate is first applicable, and should be accounted for and applied, before the proceeds of the real estate are applied to the payment of debts. The decree is not in rem against the proceeds of the real estate, but against the executor personally, who 373 is, *beyond all question, liable to a personal decree in respect to the real if not the personal estate; and it matters not which, in this case. It cannot devolve on the creditor to continue an already long protracted and expensive litigation, merely for the purpose of ascertaining the order in which a fund is liable to the payment of his claim, to which the whole fund is certainly liable. It is enough that this decree will leave that question open and untouched; to be raised and litigated by any person who may have a right, or choose to do so. I think, therefore, the Circuit court did not err in rendering a decree in favor of Saunders' ex'or against W. Tazewell's ex'or. But there is a small error in the amount of the decree. The claim was subject to a credit for fifty-three dollars and forty-eight cents, the costs recovered by L. Tazewell's representatives in the injunction suit. Commissioner Poitiaux, in his statement of the claim, added instead of subtracting the amount of this credit. Afterwards, Commissioner Davis, in making a special statement of the claim on which the decree was founded, deducted the same amount from the balance reported due by Commissioner Poitiaux; thus leaving the matter where it stood at first, without any credit for these costs. The error must now be corrected, by deducting fifty-three dollars and forty-eight cents from the amount of the decree; which can be amended in this respect, under the provisions of chap. 181 of the Code, p. 680.

Besides a decree against W. Tazewell's executor, Saunders' executor was entitled to a decree against C. Tazewell's administrator, payable out of her assets in his hands. He probably did not take such a decree, because he was satisfied there were no such assets, which appears to be the fact, from the answer of the said administrator. At all events, Saunders' executor does not complain of the decree of the Circuit court in this respect; and as it is interlocutory, he may still 374 *apply to that court for a further decree against the said administrator. It is therefore unnecessary for this court to render such a decree.

Before concluding my opinion, it may be proper to notice an objection taken in the argument, that no account had been given of the sale of the tract of land called "Secretaries," decreed to be sold for the satisfaction of the claim of Saunders' executor, by the decree which dissolved the injunction. That objection was raised for the first time in this court; which would probably be a sufficient answer to it. But a better answer is, that the decree unconditionally dissolved the injunction, and left the creditor free to enforce his judgment at law. The decree for the sale of "Secretaries" was collateral; and if any thing ever arose from it which could benefit the representatives of L. Tazewell, it was for them to show it.

I am therefore of opinion that the decree ought to be amended as aforesaid; and as amended, ought (so far as it applies to this case) to be affirmed with costs.

375 *Richmond and York River R. R. Co. v. Wicker.

April Term, 1856, Richmond.

1. Dissolution of Injunction—Appeal—When Allowed.—An appeal may be taken from an order made in vacation, overruling a motion to dissolve an injunction, when the principals of the cause are thereby adjudicated.
2. Statute—Case at Bar.—The act, Code, ch. 56, § 4, p. 292, does not apply to a case in which a rail road company is not entering upon the land of the owner of a dwelling-house.†

The Richmond and York river rail road company were authorized by the council of the city of Richmond, to bring their road into the city by a route and in a mode agreed upon by the council and the company. This route passed through a lot purchased by the company of Freeman, which adjoined a lot owned by Lucy Ann Wicker and her children, upon which there was a dwelling-house which was rented out

*The principal case is cited in Hodges v. Seaboard, etc., R. R. Co., 88 Va. 658, 14 S. E. Rep. 380; McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 145.

†Code, ch. 56, § 4, p. 292, after authorizing a rail road company to enter upon lands for the purpose of laying out its road, says, "Nor shall any company, under any provision in this chapter, invade the dwelling-house of any free person, or any space within sixty feet thereof, without the consent of the owner."

by them. The company having commenced to excavate the track for their road on the lot purchased of Freeman, at the distance of about fifteen feet from the dwelling-house on Wicker's lot, Mrs. Wicker, for herself and her children, applied to the judge of the Circuit court of Richmond for an injunction to restrain the company from invading the said dwelling-house or any space within sixty feet thereof. She charged in her bill that the company had blocked up the access to her property, destroyed its value as a dwelling-house 376 *without giving her any notice of their purpose, and without tendering her any compensation; thus doing to her great damage, and to her children irreparable mischief. The injunction was granted.

The company demurred to the bill; and also answered, insisting that having obtained permission to bring their road into the city, they had a right to locate it on their own ground, though it should pass within sixty feet of the plaintiff's dwelling-house.

The court overruled the demurrer. And thereupon the defendants having given the plaintiff notice, moved the court to dissolve the injunction; which motion the court also overruled. The defendants then applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Lyons, for the appellant.
Crump, for the appellee.

SAMUELS, J. In this case the question is presented, Whether the general assembly intended by the statute, Code, ch. 56, § 4, p. 292, to forbid the construction of works of internal improvement within the space of sixty feet about any dwelling-house whatever, by whomsoever that space may be owned, or only to protect the owners in the enjoyment of their dwelling-houses, and of a space of sixty feet of their own land lying about such dwelling-houses? In my opinion, the terms of the statute, standing alone, import that a dwelling-house and a space of sixty feet about it are exempt from invasion by internal improvement companies, as being reserved to the owner thereof. Without such invasion the owner enjoys his dwelling-house and circumjacent land to the extent of his boundary, however large. If, however, public necessity requires that a portion of his property be taken from him, it may be done, but not so as to invade his 377 dwelling-house *or a space of sixty feet about it. The law merely reserves to the owner a limited extent of his own property, but does not confer on him any control whatever over the land of the coterminous owner. The law gives to every owner of land a right to use it as he may please, if he take care to do nothing to impair the right of individuals or of the public. In our case, before the location of this road the appellee had no control over the lot belonging to Freeman, on which the rail road is located. Her only right in regard to it was to have it kept clear of nuisance. Yet it is not alleged in the bill, as any part of the appellee's equity, that the rail road is or will be a nuisance. The damage and irreparable mischief alleged are only such as will result from the construction of the road within the sixty feet; but no specification is made of the reasons to apprehend that damage or mischief may ensue. This is asserting a power of control over the property of another, not known in law, unless it be conferred by this statute. It was perfectly competent for the general assembly to exempt from the operation of the internal improvement laws any portion of an individual's property, and to secure him in the enjoyment thereof. If, however, the general assembly should go beyond this, and attempt to confer on such individual the right to control this coterminous neighbor in the use of his property, in any mode theretofore lawful, it may be doubted whether the attempt would not be against the constitution. The attempt, however, has not been made in this case, and it would be out of place to consider what would be the law if such had been the purpose of the statute.

In construing a statute, which is itself a revisal of former statutes, if there be any doubt about its meaning, we should look to the former laws, of which it 378 is *a revisal. They are allowed weight in settling the construction in such case. The statute, 2 Rev. Code, p. 213, § 7, in regard to turnpike roads, enacted before rail roads were used in Virginia, protected only the dwelling-house, yard, garden and curtilage, from invasion by turnpike companies. It said nothing whatever about the use which might be made of coterminous land. The general rail road law, enacted March 11, 1837, Sess. Acts, p. 104, § 5, provides, "that no dwelling-house or space within sixty feet of one, belonging to any person, be invaded without his consent:" and the present statute in its terms is substantially the same as that of 1837. Looking to the distinct, well defined rights of property as between coterminous land holders, that one has no right to control the use which the other may make of his property, so long as he keeps within the law against nuisances, we must hold, upon the facts of this case, that the appellee has no right to control the use made of the coterminous lot by the owners thereof; and the injunction should therefore have been dissolved. It is thus unnecessary to decide whether the charter of the appellant and the arrangement made with the council of the city of Richmond withdraws the case from the general rail road law, and gives the appellant rights not conferred by that law, seeing that, in the opinion of the court, the general law gives the right asserted by the appellant, and that it is not compelled to rely on its charter for any right not conferred on all rail road companies. Nor is it necessary to decide what power the general assembly would have to confer on the appellee a new right to control the use to be made of the lot occupied by the appellant, seeing that the law does not confer, nor attempt to confer, such new right. Nor is it necessary to decide whether under the law a distinction is to be made be-379 tween a dwelling-house *occupied by the owner as such, and a dwelling-house let to a tenant; seeing that in regard to either no protection is afforded beyond the limits of sixty feet of the land occupied with it.

Digitized by Google

I am of opinion to reverse the order, and to dissolve the injunction.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

380 Steed v. Baker & al.

July Term, 1855, Lewisburg.

Adverse Claim to Land—Case at Bar.—Bill by vendee of land to enjoin the payment of purchase money on the ground of defect of title to a part of the land. The bill states that the adverse claimant bought a part of the land under a sale for taxes, and another part from the attorney of his vendor, and charges generally that the deeds for the land sold for taxes were null and void, and the purchase from the attorney was fraudulent: And he makes his vendor and the adverse claimant defendants. The vendor in his answer charges, and sets out fraud in his attorney and the adverse claimant. The latter was in possession under his deeds, and this was known to plaintiff before his purchase. HELD:

1. Same—Allegation of Fraud.—The general allegation of fraud in the bill is not sufficient to raise that question.
2. Same—Decree between Codefendants—Case at Bar.—That there is no privity between plaintiff and the adverse claimant, and the equity between the latter and the vendor does not arise upon the pleadings and proofs between plaintiff and defendants, and is not therefore the proper subject of a decree between codefendants.
3. Same—Jurisdiction to Try.†—That the adverse claimant being in possession under his deeds, the question of their validity, independent of the ground of fraud, is proper to be tried in a court of law; and a court of equity has no jurisdiction to try it.

The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion of Judge Allen.

Fry, for the appellant.
Fisher, for the appellees.

ALLEN, P. In this case the appellee Baker, the purchaser of the interest of A. Bauseman in certain lands in Wood county, and which had been conveyed 381 *to him by a deed with special warranty, filed a bill to enjoin the collection of the purchase money unpaid, upon the ground of a defect of title to a large portion of the land.

The bill alleges, amongst other things, that prior to his purchase, a portion of the land, two hundred acres, was sold by the sheriff of Wood county in February 1835 for the nonpayment of taxes, at which sale Josiah M. Steed became the purchaser; that he assigned the interest so acquired to his father Henry Steed the appellant, to whom the clerk of Wood county conveyed the two hundred acres on the 22d of May 1837. The bill also avers that the said Adam Bauseman, on the 20th of November 1837, executed a power of attorney to said J. M. Steed to sell and convey his interest in said lands, and that J. M. Steed, under such power, sold to his father Henry Steed the interest of A. Bauseman in and to one of the tracts of land in question, and conveyed the same, estimated to be one hundred acres, by deed dated the 11th of September 1840; and that under said deed Henry Steed had taken possession of the land, and held and claimed the same against the appellee Baker. The bill further avers, that on the 19th of October 1840 the appellant H. Steed purchased a further portion of three hundred acres of said lands, at a sale for taxes, and received a deed therefor from the clerk of the court on the 7th of September 1843. The conveyance from A. Bauseman and wife to Baker is dated the 16th of October 1841, and purports to convey one equal undivided moiety of two tracts of land, each containing five hundred acres, with covenants of warranty against themselves and all persons claiming under them.

The bill further charges in general terms, that the sale made by J. M. Steed to the appellant was fraudulent, and that the 382 appellant had not, so far as the *appellee Baker knew, paid a cent of the purchase money to the agent J. M. Steed or his principal A. Bauseman.

It further charges in general terms, that the sale of the two hundred acres for taxes was illegal, without showing in what particular; and also charges that the sale and conveyance thereof to Henry Steed was illegal, fraudulent and void. And it further avers, that the appellant was employed by J. M. Steed the agent of Bauseman, to buy in the land for the heirs of the original patentee Jacob Bauseman, at the last sale

*This case should have been reported in 12 Grattan; but the opinion was not in the possession of the reporter.

†Adverse Claim to Land—Jurisdiction to Try.—In Johnston v. Jarrett, 14 W. Va. 235, it is said: "A court of equity has no jurisdiction to settle the title, or boundaries, of land between adverse claimants, unless the plaintiff has an equity against the adverse claimants; and equity against other persons will not give the jurisdiction. Stuart's Heirs v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74; Lange v. Jones, 5 Leigh 192; Steed v. Baker, 13 Gratt. 380; Wolfe v. Scarborough, 2 Ohio St. 361. In this cause the plaintiff has no equity against the adverse claimants. His equity is against the purchaser, James Jarrett." The principal case is also cited and approved in Sulphur Mines Co. v. Boswell, 94 Va. 485, 27 S. E. Rep. 24. In the dissenting opinion of BRANNON, J., in Davis v. Settle, 43 W. Va. 37, 26 S. E. Rep. 564, the principal case is cited and the rule approved. for taxes: but that instead of giving to the purchase its proper destination, he and his son were fraudulently combining to enable him to retain the said three hundred acres under said purchase. It is further alleged by the appellee Baker, that he is in the actual possession of but a small portion of said tracts of land; and that he does not hold that portion free from the claims of others. Conceiving that the sale of land by J. M. Steed the agent, to Henry Steed, and the sales by the sheriffs for taxes if valid, are within the covenants of A. Bauseman, the appellee Baker insists he would be entitled to an abatement of the purchase money, or a rescission of his contract of purchase; and he makes the Steeds and Bauseman parties, and asks for an injunction until Bauseman removed the liens and claims of the Steeds, and for general relief.

The Steeds answer, denying the general allegations of fraud and illegality charged in the bill; and Henry Steed relies upon his legal title, and insists that the complainant had no just cause, on his own showing, to bring him into chancery; and avers that he then held the tracts of one hundred and two hundred acres in possession.

Bauseman answers, and by his answer and the exhibits filed therewith, attempts to show that J. M. Steed was either his agent, or that he stood in such a 383 *confidential relation to him and the other heirs of Jacob Bauseman the claimants of the land, and had been guilty of such concealment as agent, as to render his purchase of the two hundred acres for taxes fraudulent; that the purchase of three hundred acres by Henry Steed for taxes was made under some understanding and arrangement with the agent, and was made for the heirs; and that the sale of J. M. Steed to the appellant of the one hundred acres and the conveyance thereof as attorney in fact of Bauseman, was without consideration and void.

At the final hearing, the court being of opinion that J. M. Steed, under the circumstances, was not entitled to hold the two hundred acres purchased at the sale for taxes against the codefendant Bauseman, and that Henry Steed occupied the place of his vendor, ordered and decreed that the deed from the clerk to Henry Steed should be canceled, set aside and annulled. And being further of opinion, that the record disclosed a state of facts which forbids the sale of J. M. Steed as attorney in fact of Bauseman, to be binding, it also annulled his deed, from the clerk to Henry Steed for the three hundred acres purchased by him at the sheriff's sale. And having thus cleared away the defects of title so far as the appellant was concerned, the decree proceeded to dissolve the injunction to the collection of the purchase money, suspending the effect of the order of dissolution, until certain deeds were properly acknowledged for record, or security for indemnity given.

The first, and as it seems to me, fatal objection to this decree, is, that it has proceeded entirely upon facts alleged in the answer of a codefendant, to which the Steeds had no opportunity whatever of responding.

The alleged fraud of J. M. Steed, owing to the fact of his agency and the supposed confidential relation in which he stood to the parties interested in the land, 384 *before the date of the power of attorney from A. Bauseman, his subsequent concealment of his purchase, and the confidential relation between him and his father, and their alleged co-operation in the supposed fraudulent arrangement to vest the latter with the legal title to the most valuable portions of the land, seem to have been the grounds of the decree.

No issues of this kind were raised by any specific allegations in the bill. The existence of these adverse claims constituted the grounds of relief on the part of Baker against his vendor. The equities between A. Bauseman and his codefendants did not arise out of the pleadings and proofs between Baker and the defendants in the court below. The claims of Henry Steed the appellant, have been finally adjudicated, and the title asserted by him under his various deeds, annulled, upon a state of facts not averred in the bill, and to which therefore neither he nor J. M. Steed have had an opportunity of responding. They were not bound under any allegation in the bill to state their own case as against the codefendant Bauseman. If a decree was sought against them upon the grounds relied on in that answer, they should have been averred either by a cross bill or an amended bill, so as to entitle the appellant and J. M. Steed to the benefit of their answers. If the appellant and J. M. Steed could be decreed against in this suit under any state of the pleadings, the decree rendered was erroneous under the authority of the case of Blair v. Thompson, 11 Gratt. 441, and the cases there cited. But it seems to me there is a fatal objection to this whole proceeding, so far as the interests of the appellant were involved. He was in possession, claiming the legal title under a deed of the clerk for land sold for taxes, and under a deed from A. Bauseman, through his attorney in fact. His deed for two hundred acres purchased at the sheriff's sale in 1835, was exe-385 cuted on *the 22d of May 1837. His deed from J. M. Steed as attorney in fact of A. Bauseman, preceded the deed to Baker; and the second purchase at the sheriff's sale by the appellant Henry Steed was before Baker's deed; although the last conveyance to Henry Steed by the clerk was subsequent to the conveyance by A. Bauseman to Baker.

There was no privity whatever between Baker and the appellant Henry Steed. The latter is averred to be in possession of the land, claiming under conveyances purporting to vest him with the exclusive title. The appellee Baker had no equity against him; he purchased with full knowledge of the adverse claim. His equity to enjoin the payment of the purchase money, until his vendor complied with the covenants of his deed, gave him no equity against this adverse claimant, whatever equity might have existed in favor of his vendor, growing out of the alleged fraud of J. M. Steed and notice thereof or participation therein by the appellant.

As to the charge that the sales for taxes and the deeds from the clerk were illegal, independent of the question of fraud; such illegality would avoid them at law, and a court of law was the proper forum to test the legal validity of those deeds. It would be against all just principles to sanction a proceeding whereby a third person was permitted and encouraged to intervene in a controversy with which he had no concern; to purchase with a full knowledge of the adverse claim, that he might thereby be enabled, under pretense of having an equity against his vendor, to assert the equity of his vendor against others, and against whom the complainant himself had no equity whatever.

So far as respects the alleged illegality of the tax deed, this case cannot be distinguished in principle from the case of Lange v. Jones, 5 Leigh 192. That 386 *was a bill exhibited by the vendee against the vendor alleging a contract for the purchase of eight hundred acres of land, the payment of a portion of the purchase money, and the withholding of the residue because the vendee had discovered that a third person claimed a portion of the land under a purchase from another claiming under a different title, and had actually taken possession thereof; and praying that the rights of his vendor and the conflicting claimant might be ascertained, and if his vendor has no right to the part of the land held by the conflicting claimant, that there should be an abatement from the purchase money.

Upon hearing, the chancellor dismissed the bill as to the conflicting claimant, continuing the case as between the vendee and vendor, for further proceedings.

Judge Carr was of opinion that the case fell within the principle of Stuart's heirs v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74, which, he remarks, was well considered, and from which, therefore, he was opposed to departing. That case decided that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to settle the title or bounds of land between adverse claimants, unless the plaintiff has an equity against the defendant claiming adversely to him: An equity against other persons will not give such jurisdiction. I have already observed that the alleged fraud upon A. Bauseman constituted no equity in favor of his vendee, purchasing under the circumstances disclosed in this case, as against the appellant. And as to the supposed illegality of the tax sales and deeds, there could, as Judge Tucker observed in the case of Lange v. Jones, have been no difficulty in having a trial of the legal title before the proper tribunal by the institution of an ejectment in the name of the vendor against the adverse claimant; until the decision of which the vendor might have been enjoined by bill in equity.

The cases of Allen v. Smith, 1 Leigh
387 231; Ruffners v. *Lewis' ex'or, 7 Leigh 720; and Wagner v. Dyer, 11 Leigh 384, were cases of the sale and purchase of mere equitable rights; of purchasers made, not by a stranger voluntarily intervening in the controversies of others, but by creditors to save themselves from loss; and under the peculiar circumstances, were sustained.

In this case the purchase was made by a stranger of the legal title to property then in the adverse possession of the appellant claiming the legal title under conveyances, the validity of which could have been readily settled in an action at law.

The case of Allen v. Taylor, referred to by Tucker, president, in Ruffners v. Lewis' ex'or, 7 Leigh 720, as decided by this court, seems, from the statement of the judge, to have resembled this case in its circumstances; and the principle of that decision was approved.

So in this case, if the legal validity of the deeds under which the appellant claims is admitted, but they are to be assailed for the alleged fraud affecting the conscience of the appellant, either upon the ground of notice, or participation therein, or want of consideration, that is an equity to be asserted by Bauseman, the party defrauded, and not by one voluntarily intervening with full knowledge of the adverse claim. Or if relief is sought upon the ground of the alleged illegality of the tax deeds, that is a question to be tried at law.

I think the court should have dismissed the bill as against the appellant and J. M. Steed, without prejudice to the right of the appellee A. Bauseman, to file a bill in equity to impeach the deeds, or any of them, under which the appellant claims, for fraud; or to the right of the appellees, or either of them, to show the illegality of said deeds, or either of them, at law. That the injunction should have been continued a reasonable time to enable the said A.
388 Bauseman to institute *proper proceedings to test the validity of said deeds; and upon his failure to institute such proceedings or to prosecute the same to a successful issue, there should be an abatement of the purchase money, or a rescission of the contract of sale, as the rights of the parties may require.

MONCURE, J. I am so well satisfied as to the justice of the decree of the Circuit court in this case, and so doubtful as to the validity of the objections made to it, that I am very reluctant in agreeing to reverse it. I cannot concur with the majority in dismissing the bill as to the Steeds. The farthest I can go for the appellant is to reverse the decree and remand the cause, with liberty to the appellee Baker to amend his bill and charge more specifically fraud and illegality in the conveyances under which the appellant claims title to the land in controversy, or any part thereof. I think the Steeds were properly made parties to the suit, and that the case materially differs in principle from those of Stuart's heirs v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74, and Lange v. Jones, 5 Leigh 192, relied on by the appellant's counsel.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, P.

Decree reversed.

389 *Hamilton v. McNeil & als.

July Term, 1856, Lewisburg.

1. Caveat—Record of Cause—What Constitutes.—In a case of caveat all the facts agreed by the parties, or found by the jury, or, if a jury is dispensed with, ascertained by the court, necessarily become and should be made a part of the record of the cause.
2. Same—Evidence Certified—Procedure.—In a case of caveat, if the court shall certify the evidence instead of the facts, yet if there is no conflict in the parol evidence, and taking the whole as true, the appellate court may proceed safely to judgment upon the same, it is the duty of such court to proceed and give judgment according to the very right of the cause.
3. Same—Jury Dispensed with—Procedure to Obtain Appeal.—In a case of caveat, where a jury is dispensed with and the whole cause is submitted to the court, it is not necessary for the losing party to file a bill of exceptions to the judgment of the court, or to move for a new trial, and if it is refused to except to the opinion of the court refusing it; but it is sufficient that the Circuit court shall make the facts agreed and ascertained, or the evidence, where the parol evidence is in no respect conflicting, a part of the record by its order to that effect upon rendering judgment.
4. Same—Boundary between Counties—What Court May Look to.—In a case of caveat upon a question involving the boundary line between two counties, the court in construing the acts in relation to their boundaries, may look to the acts forming other counties both before and subsequent, for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the legislature as to said boundary line.
5. Acts Forming New Counties—Construction of.—The acts forming new counties are not to be construed with the same strictness which is to be observed in the construction of a grant or a contract between individuals affecting rights of property; but a more liberal rule should be adopted; the object being to ascertain the true meaning and intention in any given act by considering the same in connection with all others in pari materia and with the general policy of the legislature, and to effectuate such intention.
6. Same—Same.—In determining the territorial boundaries specified in said acts due weight should be given to the cotemporaneous interpretation placed upon them by the courts and other lawful authorities within the same, and by the population at large residing therein. And maps of such territory made out and published by authority of law, may properly be referred to as evidence on the question.
7. Same—Same—Case at Bar.—It has been the general policy of the legislature to establish and preserve the top of the Main Alleghany mountain as the line of boundary between the adjacent counties on either side: And in the construction of these acts this policy should be respected, and no intention to depart from it should be imputed to the legislature, unless it be plainly expressed, or the purpose be sufficiently manifested.
8. Same—Same.—To carry out this policy, a call in one of these acts which if taken literally would conflict with the intent, should be disregarded or modified, and any error in the same arising from an imperfect knowledge of the topography of the country or any other fortuitous cause, should be corrected.
9. Same—Same.—In the arrangement of counties it has been the policy of the legislature to avoid inconvenient elongation or awkward or undue contractions, of the territory of a county, and to preserve the same in as compact a form as practicable: and especially to keep the same in one body, not separated by the interposition of another county. And in construing such an act it should be presumed that such was the intention of the legislature, and no different interpretation should be admitted, unless a contrary intention is clearly manifest.

*The principal case is cited and approved in Shank v. Town of Ravenswood, 43 W. Va. 246, 27 S. E. Rep. 224.

This was a caveat filed by Paul McNeil and Charles C. See to prevent the emanation of a patent for a tract of land to William Hamilton. On the 10th of October 1849 the caveators entered and located with the surveyor of the county of Pendleton, three thousand acres of land as lying in that county. A part of this land had been entered and located by Hamilton with the surveyor of the county of Pocahontas, in the previous September, as lying in the county of Pocahontas. The caveators stated several objections to the entry and survey of Hamilton; but the only question considered by the Circuit court or this court, was whether the land lay in the county of Pendleton or in the county of Pocahontas. That question depended upon the construction of various acts of the general assembly forming the counties of Bath, Pendleton and Pocahontas, and fixing their boundaries.

The tract of country in relation to which this question arose, lies between the 391 Main Alleghany mountain *on the east and the Back Alleghany on the west. These two mountains run north and nearly parallel for some fifteen or twenty miles, and then the Back Alleghany turns nearly at right angles and runs to the Main Alleghany. The distance between the two mountains is about twelve miles. At the southern end of this tract the Greenbrier river forks, one branch running near the base of the Main Alleghany and having its source near the point where the two mountains approach each other, and the other branch runs near the Back Alleghany. The land in controversy lies between the latter branch and mountain, and extends nearly to the northern termination of the valley.

Digitized by Google

This territory prior to 1796 was a part of the county of Bath. In that year, upon the petition of the people living between the two mountains, a part of it was attached to the county of Pendleton, and that part in which the land in controversy lies was afterwards recognized not only by the courts and officers of Pendleton county, but also by those of the county of Randolph, which lay west of the Back Alleghany, as belonging to the county of Pendleton. In 1822 the county of Pocahontas was formed; and after that time this territory was treated by the courts and officers of that county as being a part of it. The boundaries of these counties cannot however be understood without a map: but the principles applied to the construction of the statutes may be understood without a knowledge of the boundaries.

The cause was removed to the Circuit court of the county of Alleghany; and when it came on to be tried the parties waived a jury and submitted the case to the court both upon the law and the evidence. On the trial some of the facts were agreed by the counsel, and the parol evidence was in the form of depositions. And the court having rendered a judgment 392 for the caveators *on the ground that the land in controversy lay in the county of Pendleton, Hamilton excepted to the opinion of the court, and put into his bill of exceptions all the evidence introduced on the trial which had reference to the question of boundary; and the court made an order directing that it should be made a part of the record. And he thereupon applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Skeen and Fry, for the appellant.
Price and Reynolds, for the appellees.

LEE, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion that in a proceeding by way of caveat to prevent the emanation of a grant for lands under the provisions of the act of March 1, 1819, or those of the Code of Virginia, all the facts material in the cause and not agreed by the parties should be found by the jury, or if a jury be dispensed with and the whole case submitted to the court upon the law and the facts, should be ascertained by the court; and that the facts so agreed, if any, and those so found by the jury or ascertained by the court necessarily become and should in every case be made a part of the record to the end that in the absence of pleadings in writing and a general verdict, the nature of the controversy and the character and effect of the judgment may distinctly appear and that the latter may be reviewed by the proper appellate tribunal.

And the court is further of opinion that if in such statutory proceeding by caveat the inferior court shall fail to certify and make part of the record, the facts proven by the evidence, but shall in lieu thereof certify the evidence itself, yet if it shall appear to the appellate court that there is no conflict in the parol evidence and that accepting the whole as true, it may 393 *proceed safely to judgment upon the same, it is the duty of such court so to proceed and to give judgment according to the very right of the cause.

And the court is further of opinion that in the parol testimony certified by the Circuit court in this cause there is no conflict nor discrepancy in any material particular, but that the same may fairly and properly be regarded as entirely consistent throughout and as devolving no duty or necessity upon the court to distinguish between the different witnesses or the different degrees of weight and credibility to which their testimony may be entitled; and that this court may safely proceed to review the judgment upon the certificate of the judge of the Circuit court together with the facts agreed in the cause, and that it is its duty so to proceed and to render its judgment between the parties upon the whole case.

And the court is further of opinion that to entitle the appellant to a review of the case upon the facts in this court, it was not necessary that he should have filed a bill of exceptions to the judgment of the Circuit court given in favor of the appellees nor that he should as upon a verdict by a jury in an ordinary action at law, have moved for a new trial of the cause, and if refused, have taken an exception to such refual; but that it was sufficient that the Circuit court should, as it did, make the facts agreed and its certificate of all the evidence documentary and parol, the latter being in no respect conflicting, part and parcel of the record (as a quasi special verdict) by an express order to that effect made upon rendering judgment, and that the same should now be considered by this court in the same manner and to all intents and purposes as fully as if such facts agreed and evidence had been made part of the record by a formal bill of exceptions signed and sealed for that purpose.

And the court is further of opinion
394 that in passing *upon the matters in controversy in this cause, it is proper to consider, in connection, the act forming the counties of Ohio, Yohogania and Monongalia, passed in October 1776, (ch. 45,) the act forming the county of Greenbrier passed in October 1777 (ch. 18), the act for dividing Monongalia county, passed May 1784 (ch. 6), the act of October 1786, (ch. 101) for dividing the county of Harrison, the act of the 4th of December 1787 (ch. 94) forming the county of Pendleton, the act of the 14th December 1790 (ch. 43) forming the county of Bath, the act of December 3, 1796 (ch. 56) annexing part of Bath to Pendleton, the act of December 21, 1821 (ch. 27) forming the county of Pocahontas, and the act of the 19th of March 1847 (ch. 56) forming the county of Highland, as being in a certain sense acts in pari materia, and aiding in the proper construction of the acts relating to Pendleton and Pocahontas counties and in defining the precise territory embraced within the limits of the same, respectively.

And the court is further of opinion that these acts being intended merely for the division and arrangement of the territory which they embrace for local municipal purposes and the convenient and economical administration of the government within the same should not be construed with the same strictness which is to be observed in the construction of a grant or of a contract between individuals affecting rights of property, but that a more liberal and beneficial rule should be adopted the object being to ascertain the true meaning and intention of the legislature in any given act by considering the same in connection with all others in pari materia and with the general policy of the legislature and such intention to effectuate and carry out whensoever and wheresoever the same can be discovered.

And the court is further of opinion that in determining the territorial boundaries specified in said acts *due weight should be given to the cotemporaneous interpretation placed upon the same by the courts and other lawful authorities within the same and by the population at large residing therein: and that maps of such territory made out or published by authority of law may properly be referred to as persuasive evidence in support of the pretensions of either party to have such weight as consistently with the other testimony in the cause they shall appear to be entitled to.

And the court is further of opinion that the lands embraced by the entries of both parties in this cause were prior to the passage of the act entitled "an act adding part of the county of Bath to the county of Pendleton" passed December 3, 1796, clearly within the boundaries of the county of Bath, but that by the provisions of said act, all that part of the said county of Bath within which said lands were situate, must be held and taken to have been stricken off from the county of Bath and annexed to the county of Pendleton. For although upon the terms of said act it might appear to be doubtful whether the call for beginning "on the top of the Alleghany mountain, the northwest side of the line of the county of Pendleton," would not require that the beginning should be at some point on the Main Alleghany mountain (that lying east of the eastern fork or branch of Greenbrier river) as contended for by the appellant, or could be satisfied by beginning at a point on the mountain lying west of the north or western fork or branch of said river, (the same being from ten to fifteen miles distant from the line of Pendleton county as it then ran) as contended for by the appellees, yet considering that said last mentioned mountain was also recognized as a range of the Alleghany and was commonly known as the "Back Alleghany," and that by the cotemporaneous construction placed upon the calls of said act by the County court of Pendleton in its order directing *the running of the lines supposed to be called for in said act, and the actual running of the same beginning at letter R on the plats of surveyors Johnson and Holloway thence S 68 E, 500 poles to a chesnut oak on a mountain at the lower end of John Slaven's plantation, at the point designated by letter S, and that a report of such running was made to the said County court of Pendleton and was by said court accepted and recorded, as evidencing the true courses of the lines between the counties of Bath and Pendleton as established by said act: considering also that after the passage of said act exclusive jurisdiction over the territory in question was exercised by the courts and officers of Pendleton county without claim or contestation on the part of the authorities or people of Bath county, which jurisdiction was recognized by the court of the adjoining county of Randolph in its official acts, as within the rightful authority of the court of Pendleton county: and further, as in the acts erecting the county of Pocahontas passed on the 21st of December 1821, there is a call for a straight line from the top of the mountain between the Valley river and mouth of the Dry fork of Elk river where the road from Clover Lick to Randolph court-house crosses said mountain, to where the line of Pendleton county intersects the line of Bath and Randolph counties on the top of the mountain between Greenbrier and Cheat rivers, and a call to run thence with the top of the said mountain to where the road leading from Slaven's to Randolph court-house crosses it, which calls cannot be satisfied by running the lines of the territory annexed to Pendleton by the act of 1796 according to the pretensions of the appellant but are fully satisfied by the points R and P and the line on the top of the Back Alleghany between them, according to the pretensions of the appellees, and are therefore to be regarded as a legislative interpretation of the act of *1796 and as demonstrating that the beginning of the boundary of the territory thereby proposed to be annexed to Pendleton was and is upon the Back Alleghany and not the Main Alleghany and at or near the point R as claimed by the appellees; and, moreover, as there is no sufficient nor scarcely any conceivable reason why the legislature should have annexed that portion of the county of Bath lying south of a line running from some point on the top of the Main Alleghany mountain to the lower end of John Slaven's plantation to the county of Pendleton leaving out and retaining as part of the county of Bath though connected with the body of the county only by the narrow neck of land on the mountain from S to R, all that territory lying north of said line according to the pretensions of the appellants; and as that construction which annexed the whole of said territory to the county of Pendleton was accepted by the population within its boundaries, generally, and by the people of the adjoining counties, as expressing the true intent and meaning of said act, the conclusion to which the court must be brought is that the call for the northwest side of the Pendleton line must be rejected as conflicting with the intention of the legislature or that it must be so corrected or its literal meaning so modified, that the beginning of the boundary of the annexed territory must be placed at or near letter R, running thence to S, thence to Dinwiddie's gap thence with the other calls designated in the act to the Pendleton line and that all the territory north of the lines from R to S and thence to Dinwiddie's gap comprehending the whole of both forks of the Greenbrier up to the lines of Randolph county including all the lands covered by the entries of the parties in this cause was thus annexed to and made part of the county of Pendleton.

396

Digitized by Google

But the court is further of opinion
398 that at the time *of the passage of the act of the 21st of December 1821 for the formation of the county of Pocahontas it would appear to have been the general policy of the legislature as evinced by various acts of legislation before and after, to establish and preserve the top of the Main Alleghany mountain as the line of boundary between the adjacent counties on either side, from which policy at the date of said act there appear to have been no existing variations except in the instances of the counties of Montgomery and Monroe as to which from the depression and flattening of the Alleghany ridge in that particular section, the reasons founded on the greater convenience and accessibility to the population did not apply with equal force, and except the instances of the counties of Bath and Pendleton which latter county embraced so much territory west of the Alleghany as lay between the Main Alleghany and the Back Alleghany northwardly of the lines from R to S and from thence to the Main Alleghany in the direction of Dinwiddie's gap and which had been annexed to the said county of Pendleton by the act of 1796; and that in the construction of the various acts touching the territorial boundaries of counties, this policy should be duly considered and respected, and no intention to depart therefrom should be imputed to the legislature except it be plainly expressed or its purpose to do so be sufficiently manifested; and in the absence of such plain expression or manifest purpose the general intent to establish the top of the Alleghany as the line of county boundaries, should be effectuated, and that the calls in such acts should be reconciled and harmonized, for that purpose a particular call which taken literally would conflict with the intent of the act should be disregarded or modified and any error in the same arising from an imperfect knowledge of the topography of the country or any other fortuitous cause should be corrected.

399 *And the court is further of opinion that in the arrangements of the territory of the state for county municipal purposes, it has also been the general policy of the general assembly to avoid inconvenient elongations and awkward or undue contractions of the territory of a county, and to preserve the same in as compact a form as practicable, and especially for reasons of high public necessity and convenience, to keep the same in one body and avoid the detachment of any part of a county from the residue by the interposition of any other county; and that in the construction of such acts it should be presumed that such was the intention of the legislature and no different interpretation should be admitted unless the contrary be plainly expressed or it shall appear that the legislature did intend to depart from the policy which had hitherto prevailed upon that subject.

And the court is further of opinion that there was no sufficient or conceivable reason why the legislature in forming the said county of Pocahontas should have left that portion of territory on the head of the two forks of Greenbrier (the territory northwardly of the line P Y) within the limits of the county of Pendleton and that the reason why it is to be supposed it was the intention of the act of 1796 to annex the said territory to Pendleton comes with equal or greater force to demonstrate that it was the intention of the act of the 21st of December 1821 to embrace the same within the limits of the county of Pocahontas, thereby erected. And the court is of opinion that the legislature did intend by said act to restore to the county of Pendleton its former boundary along the top of the Alleghany mountain and to embrace all of its territory which lay west of that line within the said county of Pocahontas; and that the legislature believed it had done so is plainly inferrible from the provisions of the act forming Highland county out 400 of parts of Pendleton *and Bath counties passed March 19, 1847. This act erects the new county out of territory on the east side of the Alleghany without including any lying on the west side; and it is impossible to suppose, if a portion of Pendleton county had at that time lain on the west side of the Alleghany, the legislature would not have included it in the county of Highland but would have suffered it to remain part and parcel of Pendleton county though detached and separated from it by the intervening county of Highland when it might just as well and every consideration of public policy and convenience required that it should form part of the county of Highland which it adjoined. That such was the belief of the legislature is also apparent from the act of the 24th of March 1838 providing for a reassessment of the lands in this commonwealth; for whereas by the third section of the act of February 18, 1817, the counties of Bath and Pendleton, as well as the counties of Monroe and Montgomery, are described as lying on both sides of the Alleghany, yet after the passage of the acts forming said counties of Bath and Pocahontas, by the said act of 1838, when the legislative mind was directed to the very question, the counties of Bath and Pendleton are embraced in a district composed of counties lying between the Blue Ridge and Alleghany and the counties of Monroe and Montgomery, only, are still described as lying on both sides of the Alleghany. And these acts may fairly and properly be considered in connection with the act forming Pocahontas county as supplying a legislative interpretation of the meaning and intent of the legislature in the provisions of said last named act.

And the court is further of opinion that in giving locality to the points called for as corners in said act, the terminus of the line from the top of the mountain between the head of the Valley river and the 401 mouth *of the Dry fork of Elk river to where the line of Pendleton county intersects the line of Bath and Randolph counties is to be placed at or near letter R on the plats, and that of the line thence with the top of the mountain to where the road leading from Slaven's to Randolph court-house crosses it, is at letter P; but that the terminus of the line to the top of the Alleghany mountain opposite the head of the East fork of Greenbrier river is not at a point opposite the head of an eastern branch of the fork of Greenbrier known as the East or South fork as claimed by the appellees, but is to be sought on the top of the Alleghany mountain opposite to the head of the main or longest branch of said fork: that the East fork of said river intended by said act was the main fork running along the foot of the Main Alleghany, the head of which was the head of its longest branch; and consequently the boundary line between the top of the Back Alleghany or Greenbrier mountain and the top of the Main Alleghany is not the line P Y as contended for by the appellees, such line neither satisfying the literal call of the act nor in the opinion of this court being the boundary intended by the legislature, inasmuch as it would according to the appellant's pretensions entirely cut off from the body of the county of Pendleton a portion of its territory lying west of the Alleghany mountain, or if as the appellees contend, it would not entirely sever it, it would yet even according to their pretensions leave it connected with the rest of the county by a narrow neck of land not exceeding one hundred poles in width and stretching out from such neck in a southwestern direction from fifteen to eighteen miles; and if such portion were not so severed and disconnected by that line, it would certainly be so upon the formation of Highland county which took off all the southern part of Pendleton east of the Alleghany, all which would be contrary to the general policy
402 and plain intention *of the legislature. Whilst in running the boundary from P to the top of the Alleghany opposite to the head of the East or South fork of the Greenbrier, to carry out the intention of the legislature, it would seem not unreasonable, and would do no violence to the approved rules of construction to assume that one or more calls may have been omitted or that the call for a straight line from P was made in mistake arising from the very imperfect knowledge, as it is proven to have been, of the exact topography of the mountain region in question, and to supply such omitted calls or disregard such repugnant call or so correct it or modify its literal import that the said boundary might be run along the top of the Back Alleghany or Greenbrier mountain, with the Randolph county line until it reaches the top of the Main Alleghany at a point opposite to the head of the longest branch of the South or right hand fork (ascending) of the Greenbrier river, so as to embrace the whole of the territory annexed to the county of Pendleton by the act of 1796 which lay northwardly of the line from P to the top of the Main Alleghany in the direction of Dinwiddie's gap, and between the boundary of Randolph county on the Back Alleghany and the top of the Main Alleghany, within the limits of the county of Pocahontas.

And it appearing to the court that this construction of the act forming Pocahontas county is supported by the cotemporaneous exposition thereof by the courts and other authorities of Pocahontas county in exercising immediately after its passage exclusive jurisdiction over said territory without question in any quarter, by the complete surrender of such jurisdiction by the courts and other authorities of Pendleton county, by its recognition by the general assembly in repeated acts of subsequent legislation, by the representation of county boundaries on maps prepared and published under the authority of the legislature and 403 *in conformity with the provisions of laws requiring the exterior boundaries of the counties to be laid down by actual survey or by reference to one or more actual surveys and strict accuracy to be observed in denoting the true position of the corners of adjacent counties, and by its universal acceptance as the true construction by the people generally from the passage of the act until the origin of the present litigation, the court is of opinion that this construction should prevail and should be adopted by this court as the true exposition of the act in question.

And it appearing to the court that the foregoing views and opinions of the court are decisive against the pretensions of the appellees, it is deemed unnecessary to express an opinion upon any other question arising in the cause.

The judgment of this court therefore must be that the judgment of the Circuit court be reversed with costs to the appellant, and that the caveat be dismissed with costs to the caveatee in the Circuit court.

Judgment reversed.

404 *Summers & al. v. Bean.

July Term, 1856, Lewisburg.

1. Specific Execution — Contracts — Slaves — Proof of Peculiar Value.—As a general rule a court of equity will decree the specific execution of a contract for the sale or delivery of slaves at the suit of the purchaser, without any allegation or proof of peculiar value.

2. Same—Same—Inadequacy of Remedy at Law.—The purchase of slaves being for the life or widowhood of the vendor, upon her refusal to execute the contract, the inadequacy of the purchaser's remedy at law will give equity jurisdiction to relieve him.

3. Same—Same—Life Estate in Slaves—Parties.—In a suit in equity by purchaser of slaves for the life or widowhood of the vendor, there being no controversy as to the right of the remaindermen in the slaves, they are not necessary parties.

4. Wills—Case at Bar.—Testator bequeaths to his widow land, slaves, &c. for her life or widowhood for the support of herself and her younger children. One of these children grows up and marries, and the widow contracts with her husband to sell him two of the slaves for her life; and these two slaves are not more than will be the share of his wife in the slaves. This is no breach of the trust of the will, and a court of equity will enforce the sale at the suit of the purchaser, with a provision that the slaves shall be surrendered for division if the widow shall marry.

Samuel Summers died prior to November 1845, having made his will, which was duly admitted to probat in the County court of Kanawha. The seventh clause of his will is as follows: "For the purpose of enabling my affectionate wife Wilelmira to rear and educate my younger children, as well as to secure to her and such of my children a comfortable home, as may remain with her after my death, after paying off my debts and the specific legacies herein before given, I give and devise to my beloved wife all the rest and residue of my estate, both real and personal, for and during her widowhood; but if my said wife shall marry again, then in that event she is to 405 have a *child's part in my estate for and during her natural life, and no more."

The property devised to Mrs. Summers consisted of a valuable farm on which the testator lived, a number of slaves and all the stock, &c. upon the land. She seems to have lived upon and cultivated the farm until 1850; when one of her daughters having married John J. Bean, in July 1850 Mrs. Summers leased to Bean for five years the farm, slaves, and every thing upon the land; for which he covenanted to pay all debts which she had theretofore contracted, to support the family in the style they had been accustomed to live, to pay for the schooling of Nancy and Blackburn, two of the younger children, as long as Mrs. Summers chose to send them to school within the said five years, and to pay over to Mordecai A. Summers, (one of the children, one-half of all the profits arising from the leased property "as long as the said M. A. Summers continued to take an interest for the family." And he bound himself to return every thing at the end of the five years in as good condition as when he took possession.

Within the first year of the lease the parties became dissatisfied; and on the 31st day of July 1851 three papers were executed. One of these was executed by Bean and Mordecai A. Summers; and it recited that Mordecai Summers had bought out Bean's lease; and provided for the division of the growing crop. Another was a bond of Mordecai A. Summers, by which he bound himself to pay to Bean on the 1st of the next September, eight hundred dollars for his interest in the real estate of Samuel Summers. And the third was a writing under seal by which Mrs. Summers and Mordecai Summers "for various considerations," bound themselves to secure to Bean the services of Caroline, a negro girl about twelve years of age, and McKendry, a black boy living with D. Surbaugh—the 406 *girl then and the boy at Christmas—the services of which two slaves the said Bean was to have during the life of Mrs. Summers.

The girl was put into the possession of Bean; but she was afterwards taken possession of by Mordecai Summers; who also took possession of the boy McKendry a few days before Christmas.

In April 1852 John J. Bean filed his bill in the Circuit court of Putnam county, against Mrs. Summers and Mordecai A. Summers, in which he set out the foregoing facts, and charged that the transfer of the two slaves to him was in consideration in part of his surrender of his lease. And he prayed that the defendants might be compelled to execute specifically their covenant, by delivering to him the said two slaves.

Mrs. Summers answered the bill. She denied that the surrender of the lease was any part of the consideration for the covenant to let the plaintiff have the two slaves. She said that the difficulties which arose in the family by the unreasonable acts and conduct of the plaintiff, rendering it impossible for them to live together, by mutual consent the lease was canceled, and plaintiff voluntarily surrendered his interest in it. That no consideration was ever asked or required for this surrender, and none was ever agreed to be given. That the covenant in relation to the two slaves was wholly independent of, and had no connection whatever with, the lease. That the plaintiff having surrendered the lease, claimed that he was entitled to a portion of the estate of Samuel Summers deceased, in right of his wife. That failing to get what he claimed he threatened that unless his demands were complied with he would sue the respondent, and would remove with his wife to a distant state; and by means of these threats and the entreaties of his wife, respondent agreed to give him the two slaves, and executed the covenant, which the plaintiff insisted should be 407 *also executed by Mordecai A. Summers. She also objected that she had no authority to execute the contract; and that the court had not jurisdiction to enforce it.

All the three papers hereinbefore mentioned, were attested by John Bowyer, who was examined as a witness. He stated that they were all executed at the same time; and the lease was to be given up or destroyed on the same day. The consideration mentioned for the covenant as to the two slaves, as well as he could recollect, was in part the surrender of the lease, and as he supposed from the fact of Bean's wife being the daughter of Mrs. Summers. In answer to a question by defendant, whether he could state positively that a surrender of the lease was in part consideration of the aforesaid covenant, witness said, "I was under that impression, though not expressly mentioned at the time; and that the land contract, (the sale of Bean's wife's interest in the real estate,) I think, was also part of the consideration."

The defendants introduced a witness, T. R. Middleton, who testified that the plaintiff told him he had said to Mrs. Summers, that if she did not do something for him, he would rent out the farm and take the negroes off.

The cause came on to be heard in September 1853, when the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to a specific execution of the contract to the extent of the interest of Mrs. Summers in the two slaves: And it was decreed that the defendants, or whosoever of them had control of the said slaves, should deliver them to the plaintiff, to be held by him for the life of Mrs. Summers, unless she should again marry. In which last event the slaves were to be restored to her, to be disposed of as directed by the will of Samuel Summers deceased. From 408 this decree the defendants *applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Fitzhugh and Price, for the appellants, insisted:

1st. That the court would not enforce a specific execution of the contract. That slaves were personal property; and that although the courts had in some cases interposed to restrain the sale of slaves, this was on account of the relation of the parties to them, they being of peculiar value to them; and not on account of the character of the property. They referred to Farley v. Farley, 1 McCord's R. 506; Sarter v. Gordon, 2 Hill Ch. R. S. Car. 121; Horry v. Glover, Id. 515. That the courts of South Carolina had afterwards extended their jurisdiction further, in Young v. Burton, 1 McMul. Equ. R. 255, which was a case in the Court of errors; and this decision had been followed in Bryan v. Robert, 1 Strobh. Equ. R. 334. That the like rule was followed in Georgia; Dudley v. Mallery, 4 Georg. R. 52; and in the later cases in this court; Kelly v. Scott, 5 Gratt. 479; Sims v. Harrison, 4 Leigh 346; though previous cases had limited the interference of the court to family slaves. Allen v. Freeland, 3 Rand. 170; Randolph v. Randolph, 6 Rand. 194. But that all these cases put the jurisdiction on the ground of the relation; and in Virginia at least, none of them was for the specific performance of a contract.

2d. That the will of Samuel Summers deceased created a trust for the benefit of all his younger children, as well as their mother; and that Mrs. Summers had no power to dispose of the trust property. To show that it was a trust, they referred to 1 Jarm. on Wills, p. 334, 335, marg.; Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves. jr. R. 333; Harrisons v. Harrison, 3 Gratt. 1. To show that it being a trust Mrs. Summers could not 409 dispose *of the property, they referred to Batton on Specific Performance 221, 67 Law Libr.; Nickell & Miller v. Handly, 10 Gratt. 336; Perkins' trustee v. Dickinson, 3 Gratt. 335; Markham v. Guerrant, 4 Leigh 279; Stinson v. Day, 1 Rob. R. 435; Wallace v. Dold, 3 Leigh 258.

3d. That if there was not a trust, but a simple life estate, the remaindermen should have been parties. Nickell & Miller v. Handly, 10 Gratt. 336; Code, ch. 103, § 7, 8, p. 458.

4th. That there was no valuable consideration for the covenant. That the bill only set up a valuable consideration, which was denied in the answer. The plaintiff cannot therefore rely upon a good consideration: And if he could, it is not sufficient. They referred to Batton on Specific Performance, p. 39, 67 Law Libr.; Darlington v. McCoole, 1 Leigh 36; Reed v. Vannorsdale, 2 Leigh 569; 2 Rob. Pr. 169, 170; Seymour v. Delancey, 6 John. Ch. R. 222; Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Peter's R. 263; St. John v. Benedict, 6 John. Ch. R. 111; 1 Madd. Ch. 405.

Parks and Fry, for the appellee, insisted:

1st. That the contract was such an one as Mrs. Summers could legally make, Mrs. Bean being one of the children to be supported out of the estate left to Mrs. Summers; and there being but six children to share the property, and some nine slaves, beside a valuable tract of land, and stock upon it, the slaves contracted to be put into the possession of Bean was not more than a reasonable share.

2d. That there was both a valuable and a meritorious consideration; and that the cases cited by the other side from 1 and 2 Leigh, showed that a meritorious consideration was sufficient to sustain the contract. They also referred to Jones v. Obenchain, 10 Gratt. 259; and Ellis v. Nimmo, 10 Cond. E. C. R. 534.

410 *3d. That a court of equity would enforce a specific performance of the contract: And they referred to the cases cited by the counsel for the appellants, and insisted that they established the proposition. They also referred to Adderley v. Dixon, 1 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 311; 2 Story's Equ. Jur. § 716 to 718 and 726. They insisted further that the will did not create a trust. 2 Story's Equ. Jur. § 1068, 1069; Lewin on Trusts, p. 77, 24 Law Libr.

MONCURE, J. The first objection taken to the decree of the Circuit court is that the appellee has an adequate remedy at law, and that a court of equity has therefore no jurisdiction of the case. In answer to this objection it is contended that he has not an adequate remedy at law, first, because of the nature of the subject of the contract, being slaves; and secondly, because of the contingent and uncertain interest contracted for, being an estate for life or widowhood. I will consider these answers in their order. And first, as to the nature of the subject of the contract.

This is believed to be the first case in which the question has been distinctly presented for decision to this court, Whether a court of equity will specifically execute a contract for the sale or delivery of slaves, unless it be shown that they are of peculiar value, or that adequate compensation for them cannot be obtained at law: Though there are several decisions of the court, which will be hereafter noticed, having an important bearing upon the question. The English books throw no light on the subject. The only English case I have seen in which the question was involved, is that of Pearne v. Lisle, Amb. R. 75; which was a suit to compel the delivery of certain negroes which had been hired by the defendant in the island of Antigua. In that 411 case Lord Hardwicke is repotted *to have said, "As to the merits, a specific delivery of the negroes is prayed; but that is not necessary, others are as good; indeed in the case of a cherry-stone very finely engraved, and likewise of an extraordinary wrought piece of plate, for the specific delivery of which bills were brought in this court, they could not be satisfied any other way; their value arose on circumstances peculiar to themselves; but in other things, as diamonds, one may be as good as another." His lordship rightly considered negroes as property; but seems not to have considered them as human beings, of greater peculiar value than "a cherry-stone very finely engraved," or "an extraordinary wrought piece of plate." Certainly that case can have no influence on the decision of this; which must be decided on principle, and with such aid as may be derived from our own decisions, and those of our sister states in which the institution of slavery exists.

How stands the case on principle? It is a general rule that a party cannot come into equity for relief if he has an adequate remedy at law; but if he has not, he is entitled, for that very reason, to come into equity. On this rule, the doctrine of specific performance rests. Courts of equity have long, if not always, exercised a general jurisdiction in the specific execution of contracts concerning real estate; "not upon any distinction between realty and personalty, but because damages at law may not, in the particular case, afford a complete remedy." Adderley v. Dixon, 1 Sim. & Stu. 607, 1 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 311, 2 Story's Eq. Jur. § 717. Although in some cases of contract for the purchase of real estate a party may have an adequate remedy at law, yet he is not bound to resort to it, but may, at his election, sue in equity. Where such a contract is unobjectionable, it is as much of course for a court of equity to decree a specific performance, as it is for a court of law to give damages for the breach of the 412 *contract. Hall v. Warren, 9 Ves. R. 605. The party need not show that the land is of peculiar value, or that he could not be adequately compensated in damages for the loss of it. It is enough that he so considers, and prefers to have the land in specie. And that he does so is conclusively shown by his suit for specific performance. His right to bring such a suit in all cases is founded on the nature of the subject, and on the advantage of having a general rule and the difficulty and inconvenience of forming exceptions thereto.

Generally an adequate remedy may be had at law for the breach of a contract concerning any other personalty than slaves; and therefore, as a general rule, a court of equity will not enforce the execution of such a contract. But sometimes an adequate remedy at law cannot be had for the breach of such a contract; and then, its specific execution will be enforced in equity. As, however, it would be presumed, from the general nature of such other personal property, that an adequate remedy may be had at law for the breach of a contract concerning it, the contrary ought to be made to appear in any case in which the specific execution of such a contract may be sought.

Now let us apply the test to the peculiar species of property under consideration. Are slaves, in their very nature, such property as that an adequate remedy at law cannot generally be had for a breach of a contract to sell and deliver them? If they are not, then the same principle applies to them which applies to other personal property. But if they are, then the same, or nearly the same, principle applies to them which applies to real estate; and in a suit for specific execution it will be presumed, from the very nature of the subject, and without any allegation to that effect, that an adequate remedy cannot be had at law. I am of opinion that they are. Slaves are not only property but rational beings; and are generally acquired with 413 *reference to their moral and intellectual qualities. Therefore damages at law, which are measured by the ordinary market value of the subject, will not generally afford adequate compensation for the breach of a contract for the sale of slaves. There is at least as much reason for enforcing the specific execution of a contract for the sale of slaves, as of a contract for the sale of real estate. The only difference between the two cases seems to be this, that while in the latter specific execution will always be enforced if the contract be unobjectionable and the suit be brought in due time, it will not in the former, if it appear that the slaves were purchased as merchandise, without reference to their peculiar value to the purchaser, or that the plaintiff is a mere mortgagee or other incumbrancer: in which case, as the slaves are to be sold at all events, damages at law assessed according to their market value, would be adequate compensation.

Thus stands the case on principle, as it seems to me. Let us now see how it is affected by any decisions in this and other southern states. And first, in regard to the latter.

In South Carolina the subject has received fuller consideration than in any other state; and the law is now firmly settled in precise accordance with what I have stated. There is some apparent contradiction in the earlier cases, as might naturally be expected in the application of principle to a new subject. The line between real and personal estate in regard to the specific execution of contracts had been so long drawn, and was so well marked in the English books, that the courts were at first inclined to apply the same rule to slaves as to other personal estate. Accordingly, Farley v. Farley, 1 McCord's Ch. R. 506, was decided on that principle. But in Sarter & wife v. Gordon, adm'r, 2 Hill's Ch. R. 121, it was laid down as a general rule that a bill will lie 414 for the specific delivery *of slaves as for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. In Horry v. Glover, Id. 515, the same rule is laid down, and many forcible observations are made to show the injustice, uncertainty and inconvenience of any other rule. It is also stated as an exception to the rule, that if a purchaser contract for slaves generally, with no view to any particular individuals, or as merchandise, to sell again, the remedy is at law. In Young v. Burton, 1 McMul. Equ. R. 255, the subject was fully considered by the Court of errors, and the cases of Sarter v. Gordon and Horry v. Glover were entirely approved. In reference to those cases the court say, that although they were attended with the peculiar, or rather common circumstance that the slaves in controversy were family slaves, it was the intention of the court to lay down and establish a general rule. And in reference to Farley v. Farley, and the other early cases on the subject, they say, that those cases were decided without reference to that distinction which obviously exists between slaves and other chattels, and were based on a servile adherence to the English rule, and a total disregard to the principle on which it was founded. The whole opinion of the court in that case is very able, and I think conclusively demonstrates the correctness of the principle it affirms. There is nothing in conflict with it in any subsequent case. There has been, so far as I have seen, no subsequent case on the subject in the Court of errors. There have been several in the Court of appeals in equity; but they all recognize and follow Young v. Burton, which is regarded as finally settling the law on the subject in that state. Ellis v. Commander, 1 Strobh. Equ. R. 188; Bryan v. Robert, Id. 334; Sims v. Shelton, 2 Id. 221. The same doctrine prevails in North Carolina. Williams v. Howard, 3 Murph. R. 74. Also in Tennessee. Loftin v. Espy, 4 Yerg. R. 84; Henderson v. Vaulx & wife, 10 Id. 30.
415 *Also in Mississippi. Murphy v. Clark, 1 Smeades & Marsh. 221; Butler v. Hicks, 11 Id. 78; Hull v. Clark, 14 Id. 187. In Georgia a different doctrine prevails; and it is held, in conformity with the English rule in regard to chattels, that to give a Court of equity jurisdiction to enforce a specific delivery of slaves, it is necessary to charge and prove peculiar circumstances; as that they are family servants, a carpenter, blacksmith, wagoner, hostler, &c. Dudley v. Mallery, 4 Georgia R. 52, 65. Also, it would seem, in Alabama; Savery v. Spence, 13 Alab. R. 561; though I have not seen the case itself, the volume containing it being out of place in the library. The foregoing are all the decisions of our sister states, within my knowledge, which appear to have a material bearing on the subject. There may be others: But I think it may be safely concluded that the decided preponderance of authority to be derived from that source is in favor of the general jurisdiction of equity to enforce the specific execution of a contract to sell or deliver slaves.

I will now refer to such of our own decisions as seem to me to affect the question. They are all cases in which the question was, whether a court of equity would enjoin the sale of one man's slaves under an execution against another man's goods. In Wilson v. Butler, 3 Munf. 559, the affirmative of the question was held; the court being of opinion that the remedies of the owner at law are not in exclusion of a proceeding in equity, having for its object the retention of the property in specie. The case was expressly placed on the same ground, in regard to equitable jurisdiction, with a suit for specific performance; thus admitting, as it seems to me, that in such a suit to enforce the delivery of slaves, the jurisdiction of equity exists. Scott v. Halliday, 25 Id. 103, and Sampson v. Bryce, Id. 175, were cases of the same kind, and decided in the same way. In Bowyer 416 v. Creigh, 3 Rand. *25, the plaintiff was an incumbrancer merely, and it was held that he had an ample remedy at law, and therefore no right to come into equity. What is said by Judge Carr in delivering the opinion of the court, on the general question of the jurisdiction of equity in such cases, is obiter dictum, and in conflict with subsequent decisions, which will be presently noticed. In Allen v. Freeland, Id. 170, which was decided before, though reported after Bowyer v. Creigh, the court was unanimously of opinion that the appellant claimed the slaves in controversy under a fraudulent sale, and therefore affirmed the decree dissolving his injunction. Three of the judges intimate their opinions on the question of jurisdiction in such cases. Judge Carr's conforms with the views expressed by him in Bowyer v. Creigh, and takes the ground that peculiar value must be shown to give the court jurisdiction. Judge Green inclined to think that slaves ought prima facie to be considered as of peculiar value to their owners, and not properly a subject for adequate compensation in damages, as land is considered to be to a purchaser; but that this presumption may be repelled, as in the case of a person purchasing slaves for the avowed purpose of selling them again. And he inclined to think it was repelled by the circumstances of that case; though he said it was not necessary to decide the case on that ground. Judge Brooke, after commenting on the peculiar nature and value of the property, said that in all such cases this court had exercised a restraining power, except a case in which, whatever may be the decision of it, the property is to be sold and the only controversy is as to the proceeds of sale; and he therefore thought the injunction was properly awarded; though upon the merits he concurred with the rest of the court in affirming the decree. In Randolph v. Randolph, 6 Rand. 194, the question, whether slaves are prima facie of such peculiar value 417 as to give a court of *equity jurisdiction to restrain a wrongful sale of them under execution, was fairly presented for decision: And four out of the five judges concurred in opinion that they are. Judge Green said, "This prima facie presumption may however be repelled by circumstances. As if the slaves were necessarily to be sold, (as in the case of their being pledged for the payment of debts,) and the question is between a creditor claiming under a specific lien, and one claiming under execution; or, if they were in the hands of the owner as a subject of traffic; in such cases the injury done to the owner by seizing and selling them, under an execution against another, would be precisely and accurately measured by their market value." Judge Cabell said, "It should be regarded as a general rule, that the courts of chancery are bound to interpose whenever the slaves of one man are about to be sold to pay the debts of another. The exceptions to this general rule, whatever they may be, are to be brought forward and established in each particular case by those who claim the benefit of them." The other two concurring judges were Brooke and Coalter. Judge Carr delivered a dissenting opinion, in which he adhered to his former views. In Sims v. Harrison, 4 Leigh 346, the case of Randolph v. Randolph was approved; and was declared as having determined, that in every case in which the owner of slaves wrongfully taken under execution applies to a court of equity to inhibit the sale of them, the court ought to award an injunction, and if the case be made out to give relief, though it be neither alleged in the bill, nor proved that the slaves have any peculiar value. The only remaining case, I believe, is Kelly v. Scott, 5 Gratt. 479, which follows the principle settled in the two cases last cited. The result of these decisions, it seems to me, is to maintain the general jurisdiction of equity to enforce the specific execution of a 418 contract *to sell or deliver slaves. There is at least as much reason for enforcing the specific delivery of slaves according to contract, as for protecting them from a wrongful sale under execution after their delivery. The reason in each case is, that the legal remedy is inadequate. But it is less so in the latter than the former case. In the latter, the party would generally have his choice of several remedies at law, as detinue or trover for the recovery of the property or its value, or an action on the indemnifying bond provided for by law in such cases. While in the former, his only legal remedy would be an action for damages. It can make no difference in principle, that in the latter he is already owner of the slaves, while in the former he has only contracted for the ownership. It is true that in the latter he may have formed an attachment to the slaves from long connection with them; but that connection may have existed only for a day. A purchaser of slaves for his own use, looks to their qualities, and generally buys such only as will suit him. In each case, peculiar value will alike be presumed.

I am therefore of opinion, both upon principle and authority, that it may be laid down as a general rule, that a court of equity has jurisdiction to enforce the specific execution of a contract for the sale or delivery of slaves, though it be neither alleged in the bill nor proved that they have any peculiar value. The exceptions to this rule, whatever they may be, (as was said by Judge Cabell in Randolph v. Randolph,) are to be brought forward and established in each particular case, by those who claim the benefit of them. It is unnecessary to define them in this case, as it falls within none of them.

I am also of opinion that the appellee has not an adequate remedy at law, because of the uncertain and contingent interest 419 contracted for. His remedy at *law is an action upon the covenant of the appellants to secure to him the services of the slaves in controversy during the lifetime of the female appellant. There is no safe or certain rule whereby the damages could be measured in such an action; and they could only be conjectured by the jury. If there were no other remedy, that, from necessity, would have to be resorted to, and the best attainable result arrived at, by the aid of tables of longevity or otherwise. After all, such result would probably be wide of the true mark. At least it must be admitted that such a remedy is inadequate; and that is sufficient reason for a suit in equity to obtain the very thing contracted for, which will do exact justice to both parties. If the covenant be construed to be for the use of the slaves during the widowhood of the female appellant, (which was the extent of her interest therein, and all that can be recovered of her in a suit for specific performance,) then it would be still more difficult to estimate the damages in an action at law, and there would be greater reason for a suit in equity. For the authorities on this branch of the case, see the notes to Cudder v. Rutter, in Leading Cases in Equity, 65 Law Libr. p. 529, 532-537; Batten on Contracts 234, 67 Law Libr. 138-144.

If the appellee could recover the slaves by an action of detinue, he would have an ample remedy at law and could not come into equity for relief. Armstrong v. Huntons, 1 Rob. R. 323, and cases therein cited. But he cannot maintain that action, at least for both of the slaves. The legal title was not vested in him by the covenant, which is merely executory. That he obtained, and for a short time held, possession of the girl, cannot take the case out of the jurisdiction of equity. He never obtained possession of the boy; and was soon dispossessed of the girl by the appellants, who now hold both against him. Even if 420 *he could maintain detinue for the girl, (which, from the peculiar terms of the contract, may be doubtful,) he cannot for the boy, and may therefore sue in equity for both. The covenant is joint, and a court of equity having jurisdiction of the subject may give complete relief.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity being maintainable in this case on the ground of specific performance, and the party having a remedy at law though inadequate, the application, as in every such case, is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, which will enforce the contract if no good cause be shown or appear to the contrary. It was insisted, in behalf of the appellants, that the contract in this case ought not to be enforced for several reasons. The first of which is, want of consideration. The appellee contends that the contract was founded both on valuable and meritorious consideration, and that either is sufficient to authorize the specific enforcement of a contract. The valuable consideration relied on is, the surrender of the lease. The appellants do not deny that this would be a valuable and adequate consideration, supposing that the female appellant had authority to make it—a question which will be presently considered; but they deny that the contract was founded on that consideration, and aver that the lease was voluntarily surrendered. The lease was for the term of five years, and was surrendered at the end of one year. The surrender and the contract for the services of the two slaves in controversy bear date on the same day, and were executed at the same time. The inference from this fact, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, is almost irresistible that the two instruments were dependent upon and in consideration of each other. The inference is supported and not opposed by other evidence. At the same time with the execution of the 421 said surrender and contract two *other instruments were executed by the parties or some of them; one of the said instruments being the obligation of the appellant Mordecai A. Summers for the purchase money of the appellee's interest in the real estate of Samuel Summers; and the other, an agreement between the said M. A. Summers and the appellee in regard to the crop on the demised premises. The latter recites that M. A. Summers, (who was evidently acting for his mother,) had bought out the appellee's lease, which was then surrendered. This shows that the surrender was not voluntary, and no other consideration appears than the cotemporaneous contract for the services of the two slaves. The contract itself recites that it was executed "for various considerations." Being under seal, it would be an estoppel at law to a denial of the consideration; and though not an estoppel in equity, it is yet prima facie evidence of the fact it recites against the parties thereto. In addition to all this, Bowyer the attesting witness to all these instruments, and who was present at their execution, being asked what were the various considerations mentioned in the covenant, said in his deposition, "The consideration mentioned, as well as I can recollect, was in part the surrender of the lease agreement, and I supposed from the fact of said Bean's wife being the daughter of Mrs. Summers." And being asked by the appellants whether he could state positively that a surrender of the lease was part consideration of the covenant, said, "I was under that impression, though not expressly mentioned at the time, and that the land contract I think was also a part of the consideration." Upon the whole, I think it manifestly appears that these acts and instruments were all parcels of one family arrangement; and mutually dependent upon, and in consideration of each other; and that the appellee would not have surrendered the lease but for the exe-
422 cution of the covenant. *I am therefore of opinion that the covenant was founded on valuable and adequate consideration: Which renders it unnecessary to consider the question, whether it is founded on meritorious consideration; or such as would authorize a court of equity to decree its specific performance.

Another reason assigned for not enforcing the specific execution of the contract is, that it would be a breach of trust; and that a court of equity will not aid any person in obtaining the performance of an agreement, which, if executed, would be a breach of the trust reposed in the other party. Batten 221, 67 Law Libr. 132. The supposed trust is created by the 7th clause of the will of Samuel Summers. It was contended in behalf of the appellee that this clause creates no trust; or at least none that can be enforced; and only indicates the motive of the testator for giving the residuum of his estate to his wife during her widowhood; and Wallace v. Dold's ex'ors, 3 Leigh 258, and Stinson, ex'or, v. Day & wife, 1 Rob. R. 435, were relied on to sustain this view; while Markham v. Guerrant, 4 Leigh 279; Perkins' trustee v. Dickinson, 3 Gratt. 335; Nickell v. Handley, 10 Gratt. 336, and 1 Jarm. on Wills 334-5, were relied on by the counsel for the appellant to sustain the contrary view. But I think it will be unnecessary to decide this question; being of opinion that another position taken on behalf of the appellee is sustainable, to wit, that even if the supposed trust exists, it would not be violated by the specific enforcement of the contract. The testator certainly intended to give his wife a considerable personal interest in the residuum of his estate during her widowhood—more then a child's part, for life, to which he limits her interest in the event of her marrying again. And he certainly intended to give her during that period, if not the uncontrolled disposition, at least a very large discretion in the management of the 423 subject*—as large as possible, consistently with the declared purposes of the supposed trust. It does not appear that the execution of the lease was a violation of the trust; but rather that it was reasonably supposed to be a convenient mode of executing the trust. The trustee was not bound to keep the property together, and cultivate the land herself; but might, if it was the interest of the parties concerned to do so, rent out the land and hire out the negroes. She might have leased out the trust subject for a term of years, even to a stranger. She leased it for five years to the appellee, her son in law, whose wife was one of the four children who were living with her, and one of the objects of the supposed trust. In consideration whereof, he stipulated to pay all her debts, to support the family, to pay for the schooling of the two younger children, and provide them with books; in fine, to fulfill all the purposes of the trust during his term, and at the end of it to restore the subject in as good or better condition than when he received it. He also stipulated to pay to M. A. Summers, another and the oldest of the said four children, one half of all the profits arising from the subject, as long as he continued "taking an interest in the family." It is not pretended that the consideration thus stipulated for, would have been an ample rent for the property; and supposing the stipulations to be faithfully performed, it is impossible to regard the arrangement as a beach of trust. On the contrary, it seemed to be the best mode of effectuating the trust. All the family continued to live together in the mansion-house of the testator; the property was kept together, and under the management of the son in law; and, if there should be any profits, after paying the expenses of the operation and supporting the family, they were to be equally divided between the son and son in law. It turned out, however, that some disagreement arose between the parties;

424 *and they found it necessary to make a different arrangement. The consequence was, that about a year after the execution of the lease it was surrendered, the appellee sold his wife's interest in the real estate to the appellant M. A. Summers, and the appellants executed the covenant in regard to the two slaves in controversy. The question now is, Was the execution of that covenant a breach of the supposed trust? If the trustee has a right to make the lease, she had a right to accept its surrender, and to pay a reasonable consideration therefor out of the trust subject, if required by the interest of the beneficiaries. It does not appear that the use of the two slaves for her life or widowhood, was an unreasonable consideration to pay for the surrender of the lease. But whether it was or not, the covenant was not a breach of trust, if the remaining trust subject, retained in the hands of the trustee, is ample for all the purposes of the trust; for the use during her widowhood of all beyond that, certainly belongs to her. It is not pretended that the remaining trust subject is not ample for those purposes. It would be strange, indeed, if she had so little individual interest in the subject, and so little power over it, that she could not part with the use during her widowhood of a boy and girl, 11 and 13 years of age, when she retained, subject to the purposes of the trust, all the other personal estate, including nine slaves and all the real estate. And that too when her son, one of the beneficiaries, joined in the act of alienation, and the husband of another was the alienee; thus leaving only two of the beneficiaries who could have any cause to complain, and they, only if the subject retained should be inadequate to their support. It is not pretended that, if there had been no other consideration for the covenant than to make an advancement out of the personal estate to the wife of the appellee, the two slaves in controversy would have been an excessive advancement,
425 *or such a one as it was not altogether proper to make, under the circumstances. She was one of the children for whom a comfortable home was provided by the trust, if trust it was. And when she married and left the maternal roof, it was nothing more than meet and right, and seems to be consonant with the purposes of the trust, that her mother, if she chose to do so, should make her a fair and reasonable advancement out of the trust subject; taking care to do no injustice to the remaining beneficiaries. In no view of the case, therefore, can the covenant be regarded as a violation of the supposed trust.

Another reason assigned for not decreeing the execution of the covenant is, that it was extorted from the appellants by the use of harsh and unjust means. The only foundation for this objection in the record is the evidence of Middleton, who testifies that the appellee said he had told the appellant Mrs. Summers, that he would rent out the farm and take the negroes off if she would not do something for him. This must have occurred while he held the lease; and the only tendency of the evidence is, to show that the covenant was executed in consideration, in part at least, of the surrender of the lease. The evidence is inconsistent with the answer of Mrs. Summers, who says the lease was voluntarily surrendered, and that the means by which the covenant was obtained were used after the surrender of the lease; although the surrender and covenant bear date on the same day, and it is proved were executed at the same time. It is not pretended that any other means were then used than the cotemporaneous execution of both instruments; and it appears that none other were, from the evidence of the attesting witness. This objection therefore is unsustained.

Digitized by Google

I have noticed all the reasons assigned for not enforcing the specific execu-426 tion of the covenant; and *considering them insufficient, I think the appellee is entitled to have that mode of relief.

Before closing this opinion it is necessary to notice an objection taken to the decree for want of parties. It was contended that the persons entitled in remainder to the slaves in controversy on the death or marriage of the appellant Mrs. Summers, are proper parties to this suit. I do not think so. The estate in remainder is not in controversy in this suit, and cannot be affected by the result of it. The rights of the remaindermen will be the same, whether the particular estate be held by the appellants or the appellee, and are amply protected by law in either case. A court of equity will interpose for their protection whenever they are endangered by the act of the particular tenant, in attempting or threatening to remove the subject out of the state or otherwise. But, consistently with those rights, the particular tenant has the same right of enjoyment of his estate that any other has, including the right of alienation. Otherwise, it would always be necessary for remaindermen to join the particular tenant in an act of alienation of his estate.

I think the decree ought to be affirmed.

ALLEN, P., and DANIEL and LEE, Js., concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

SAMUELS, J., dissented.

Decree affirmed.

427 *Wickham and Goshorn v. Lewis Martin & Co.

July Term, 1856, Lewisburg.

1. Deeds of Assignment—To Secure Creditors—Trustee a Purchaser for Value.—An insolvent merchant purchases goods not intending to pay for them, and after getting possession of them he conveys them and all his other estate in trust for the payment of his debts, the trustee having no notice of the fraud. The trustee is a purchaser for value without notice.

2. Same—Same—Conflict of Laws—Case at Bar.†—In such a case the grantor and trustee live in Virginia, the goods were sold in Baltimore, and were sent by the purchaser to Ohio apparently for the purpose of concealing them; and the seller of the goods there gets possession of them after the trustee had taken possession; and trustee sues the seller in Virginia for the goods. The deed is to be construed according to the law of Virginia.

3. Same—Same—Case at Bar.‡—The deed after conveying the debtor's property, describing it by its location, which does not include the goods in controversy, and after stating the trusts upon which it is conveyed; in the conclusion of the deeds says, "And it is further expressly understood, that if through accident or forgetfulness or inadvertence the said M G (the grantor) may have omitted to mention any claim or property that the same shall be understood as being conveyed hereby to the said trustees, to all intents and purposes as fully as if specifically mentioned." The goods in Ohio passed by the deed.

4. Fraud of Purchaser—Quære.—QUÆRE: What fraud in the purchaser of goods will authorize the seller to reclaim them whilst in the possession of the purchaser.

5. Case Submitted to Court—Form of Bill of Exceptions—Quære.§—QUÆRE: What should be the form of a bill of exceptions to the refusal of the court to grant a new trial, where the whole case has been submitted to the court.

This was an action of trover in the Circuit court of Ohio county by Wickham and Goshorn against Lewis Martin & Co. The parties agreed, and entered of record, to waive a trial of the issue in the cause by a jury, and to submit the same to the court, who was to determine all matters of law and fact, and to give judgment accordingly.

Upon the trial, beside the documen-
428 tary evidence, *there was a large mass of parol evidence submitted in the form of depositions on the part both of the plaintiffs and the defendants, but no witnesses were examined before the court. The plaintiffs claimed under a deed bearing date the 19th of November 1851, executed by Marx Graff, late a merchant in Wheeling, by which, reciting that he is largely indebted to various firms and individuals, and is desirous to provide a fund for the payment of his said liabilities, and for this purpose to devote all the property of every kind he possesses or is entitled to possess to the creation of such fund, he conveys to William S. Wickham and William S. Goshorn all the stock of dry goods, fixtures and store furniture now in and about his store on the east side of Main street in the city of Wheeling; also all the bonds, notes, accounts, books of account, evidences of debt, and choses in action of every description, due or coming due to the said Marx Graff from any and all persons or corporations whatsoever; also all the household goods and furniture in and about his dwelling-house, and the unexpired lease of his store and dwelling-house: Upon trust to take immediate possession, and sell the goods either at public or private sale, for cash or on credit, as they shall deem it expedient and proper. To collect the debts and also to compromise or compound disputed or doubtful claims. That the said Graff was to be allowed to occupy the dwelling-house and use the household and kitchen furniture until the 1st of the next April, when he was to surrender it to the trustees, and they were to sell it for cash or on credit, as they should think best. That out of the proceeds of sale, after paying the expenses of executing the trust, including a commission of seven per cent. to themselves, the trustees should disburse the residue in the payment pro rata of all the just debts due or coming due from the said Graff to any creditor who 429 should within six months from the date of the *deed assent to the terms thereof, by subscribing a release of all further claim against Graff or his representatives on account of said debt.

In the conclusion of the deed followed the following provision: "And it is further expressly understood, that if through accident or forgetfulness or inadvertence, the said Marx Graff may have omitted to mention any claim or property, that the same shall be understood as being conveyed hereby to the said trustees, to all intents and purposes as fully as if specifically mentioned."

This deed was admitted to record on the day of its date, in the clerk's office of the County court of Ohio county, upon the acknowledgment of the grantor.

The subject in controversy in this cause was seven boxes of goods, which had been sold in August 1851 by the defendants, who were merchants in Baltimore, to Graff, and forwarded to him to Wheeling. It was §Case Submitted to Court—Form of Bill of Exceptions.—In Nutter v. Sydenstricker, 11 W. Va. 541, it is said: "In this case, the law and the facts were both submitted to the court. There was a judgment for the plaintiff and the defendant moved for a new trial, which was overruled. The evidence is certified to this court. There has been much doubt and controversy upon the powers and duties of the appellate court in such cases: Pryor v. Kuhn, 12 Gratt. 615; Wickham v. Lewis Martin & Co., 13 Gratt. 427, 444; Rep. Rev. 816. But, finally, in Mitchell v. Baratta, 17 Gratt. 445, the court settled the practice, and announced the law as follows:

"1st. That in such cases the evidence, and not the facts proved, should be certified.

"2d. That the case should not be reversed by the appellate court, unless it is plainly erroneous, particularly if the evidence, or a part of it, be oral, especially if it be conflicting.

"3d. That the whole case, being before the appellate court, it would not remand the case for a new trial, but enter final judgment upon the law and the evidence. Harrison v. Farmers' Bank, 6 W. Va. 1.

"Under these decisions, this court will not consider objections to the admissibility of evidence; but it will simply inquire whether or not there is sufficient competent evidence in the record, treating the appellant as a demurrant to the evidence, to sustain the judgment of the court below; and unless the judgment is plainly erroneous, it will affirm it: Claflin v. Steenbock, 18 Gratt. 842; Wright v. Rambo, 21 Gratt. 158; Newlin v. Beard, 6 W. Va. 110."

The principal case is also cited in Ramsburg v. Erb, 16 W. Va. 783; Mitchell v. Barrata, 17 Gratt. 463, and note; Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Faulkner, 4 W. Va. 188; Griffie v. McCoy, 8 W. Va. 208. And in Joslyn v. State Bk. of Hartford, 86 Va. 289, 10 S. E. Rep. 166, it is said: "Properly speaking the appeal is always from the judgment of the court and not from the verdict of the jury. Wickham & Goshorn v. Lewis Martin & Co., 13 Gratt. 446. In each case there must be a bill of exceptions pointing out the alleged error, and a certificate of evidence showing what testimony was before the court or jury. Paul v. Paul, 2 H. & M. 525; Lee v. Boak, 11 Gratt. 182; Bart. Chy. 857 et seq."

As to whether the evidence or the facts proved should be set out in the bill of exceptions, where a jury has been waived and the cause heard by the court, see a review of the Virginia decisions in Western Union, etc., Co., v. Powell, 94 Va. 275, 26 S. E. Rep. 828, where the principal case is cited. See also, monographic note on "Bills of Exception" appended to Stoneman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 887.

proved by both parties that these boxes of goods, with others, were sent by Graff to a commission merchant in Steubenville in the state of Ohio; who gave a receipt for them, and that they remained in his possession until the execution of the deed to Wickham and Goshorn. That on the next day Wickham went to Steubenville, and producing and delivering to the commission merchant his receipt, he had obtained possession of the goods, and they were in the act of being transported to the boat which was to carry them to Wheeling, when the sheriff of the county in which Steubenville is located, took possession by virtue of an attachment which issued at the suit of the defendants, and the goods were returned to the possession of the commission merchant, who, upon being indemnified by the defendants, delivered to them the seven boxes of goods which they had sold to Graff.

These goods the defendants took back
430 to Baltimore, where they were *sold, after having been opened, examined and valued by merchants called in for the purpose; and the valuation amounted to three thousand two hundred and ninety-four dollars and twenty-two cents. The other facts in the cause which are of any importance will be found stated in the opinion of Judge Daniel; except the fact that all but two of the creditors of Graff executed the release required by the deed.

The court below rendered a judgment for the defendants; and the plaintiffs excepted; but instead of stating the facts proved on the trial, the bill of exceptions gave all the evidence introduced by both parties. From this judgment the plaintiffs applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Russell and Fry, for the appellants.

SAMUELS, J. I am of opinion that it is not necessary for the decision of this case, to determine what manner of fraud practiced by a vendee in obtaining goods on credit, will justify the vendor in retaining the goods and annulling the sale thereof. Whether a purchase by an insolvent vendee without intention to pay will justify reclamation by the vendor, or whether the vendor must have industriously used artifice and stratagem in the purchase to warrant such reclamation, are questions which become immaterial in this case from the fact that the goods were subsequently sold by the vendee Graff to Wickham and Goshorn, purchasers for value without notice. If therefore, whether Graff had been guilty of no fraud in buying the goods, or had bought them, knowing his own insolvency, and without the purpose of paying for them, or had industriously used devices to deceive the sellers, still Wickham and

Goshorn, subsequent purchasers for 431 *value without notice, have a title better than that of Martin Lewis & Co. the original sellers. See Williams v. Given, 6 Gratt. 268.

I am further of opinion that the case of Pryor v. Kuhn, 12 Gratt. 615, was correctly decided, and should be followed in all cases in which it applies. That the rule of Bennett v. Hardaway, 6 Munf. 125, as modified by Ewing v. Ewing, 2 Leigh 337, Green v. Ashby, 6 Leigh 135, Rohr v. Davis, 9 Leigh 30, and Pasley v. English, 5 Gratt. 141, should give the rule in cases wherein the courts perform the functions of a jury, as well as in those wherein juries are impanelled. Ascertaining the facts of this case by the rule prescribed by these cases, I am of opinion that the deed of trust given in evidence by the plaintiffs, the making of which is not questioned, and the proof offered by the defendants admitting it to be all true, fully establish the plaintiffs' right to recover. I therefore concur in the judgment to be rendered.

LEE, J. I concur in these results of the opinion delivered by Judge Daniel and in much of the reasoning by which he is brought to his conclusions. I do not think it necessary however in this case to review the decision of this court in the case of Pryor v. Kuhn, 12 Gratt. 615, or to determine what must be the frame of the exception or certificate which shall enable this court to review the action of a Circuit court in a case in which the parties have waived a jury and submitted the whole matter of law and fact to the judgment of the court. For if in such a case the same rule be adopted which has obtained in cases where there is a general verdict and a motion for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and the exception or certificate in general, be required to set out the facts and not the evidence merely, the same modification

432 should be also *adopted which has prevailed in the latter case; and if in a given case the evidence only and not the facts has been certified, yet if this court looking to the documentary evidence and the parol evidence of the party prevailing only, rejecting that of the party excepting, can see enough to enable it to say that the judgment of the court below is erroneous and to render judgment for the party excepting, I think it is its duty to reverse the judgment and to render judgment for the plaintiff in error. And as I think that in this case rejecting all the parol evidence offered by the plaintiffs and taking the documentary evidence and the parol evidence of the defendants alone, the proof is abundant to show the plaintiff's right to recover and also what should be the amount of their recovery, I consider it unnecessary to consider the frame of the bill of exceptions because in any view the reversal of the judgment and final judgment for the plaintiffs in error are inevitable.

There is another question discussed by Judge Daniel which I think not necessary to be decided in this case. It is as to the nature and character of the circumstances attending a sale and purchase of goods which shall so vitiate the same as to enable the vendor to avoid the transaction on the ground of fraud in the vendee and reclaim the property. For although there may have been such fraud in the conduct and representations of the vendee inducing the vendor to part with the goods as will enable the latter to avoid the transaction and reclaim the property from the vendee, yet if the goods have gone into his possession as upon a sale in the regular course of business, and have since come to the hands of a purchaser from the vendee without notice of the fraud, such purchaser will not be affected by the vice in the former sale; and as in this case the plaintiffs representing the creditors provided for by the deed of 433 the 19th of November 1851 *under the terms and conditions of that deed, are to be regarded as purchasers of the goods for value and no notice to them or to the creditors of any fraud in the purchase of the goods by Graff is proved or alleged, they cannot be affected by the alleged vice in the transaction between Graff and the defendants. Upon this question therefore I decline to express any opinion.

DANIEL, J. In this case the parties, after making up the issue, availed themselves of the provisions of the 9th section of chapter 162 of the Code, and by consent entered of record, "agreed to waive a trial of the issue by a jury, and to submit the same to the court, who was to determine upon all matters of law and fact, and to give judgment accordingly." And the court having found the issue for the defendants and given judgment accordingly, the plaintiffs excepted to the judgment, and moved the court to set aside the judgment and enter the same for the plaintiffs, or to award them a new trial on the ground that this judgment was contrary to the law and the evidence. But the court adhering to its judgment, and refusing to grant a new trial, the plaintiffs again excepted, and prayed the court to certify all the evidence; which the court accordingly did.

In this state of things the question has been raised here as to what ought to be the character of the certificate to be made by the court when the trial has been had, and the judgment rendered, under the provisions of the section just mentioned, viz: Whether it ought to be a certificate of the evidence or of the facts.

In the view I have taken of the case, the decision of this question is not essential in enquiring whether the circuit court was correct in its judgment. For if we wholly disregard all the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs except the deed, and give full credit and weight to all the evidence adduced by the defendants, certain 434 *propositions of law are presented by the case so made, the decision of which will show either the error or correctness of the judgment. In other words, all the elements material to determine the question of the right of the plaintiffs to recover, appear as fully from an inspection of their documentary evidence, the deed and the parol evidence of the defendants, as they do on looking also into the parol evidence of the plaintiffs. If the plaintiffs are entitled to recover at all, they must, in the view I have taken of the case, recover by force of the deed of trust, or of the transaction with Myerson, proved by himself on his examination as a witness by the defendants, and possession of the goods in controversy, acquired under the circumstances detailed in depositions taken by the defendants. No fact is deducible from the parol testimony of the plaintiffs, (which is not also found in that of the defendants,) furnishing any additional support to the grounds of their claim above indicated.

In opposition to these grounds, the defendants say that Graff the grantor in the deed acquired the goods by a purchase from them, which was made under such circumstances of fraud, on his part, as gave them a right, on the discovery of the fraud, to cancel the sale, assert their original ownership, and reclaim the goods. And they also assail the title of the plaintiffs as defective, for reasons which will be hereafter noticed.

It is proved that the goods were purchased of the defendants; and it becomes necessary at the very threshold of the case to enquire whether Graff by virtue of said purchase acquired a title to the goods which he could pass to third persons.

That fraud, practiced by the vendee in the procurement of the sale, may so far vitiate it as to confer on the vendor a right, on the discovery of the fraud, before the rights of innocent third parties have 435 intervened, *to avoid the sale and demand restitution of the property, is a proposition well established by decisions in England and in this country. 2 Rob. Pr. 499, and cases there cited. There is, however, much conflict of authority as to the nature of the circumstances, the character of the elements, essential to the constitution of such fraud. Where the fraud to be enquired into is of the character alleged in this case, numerous decisions may be found, in which it has been held that the insolvency of the vendee, at the time of the sale, known to himself and not disclosed to the vendor, accompanied by a design on the vendee's part not to pay for the property, is sufficient to constitute the fraud, whilst in some of the more recent cases it has been held that conscious insolvency, though not disclosed, and an intention not to pay, on the part of the buyer, at the time of the contract, are not of themselves sufficient to vacate a sale, on the score of fraud: But that in order to justify the rescission of the sale, it is essential to be shown that the dishonest purpose of the buyer was consummated by some artifice, contrivance or false representations, intended and calculated to deceive. I do not deem it necessary to decide in which of these two lines of conflicting authorities the best exposition of the law is to be found, inasmuch as the application to this evidence, of the rules most favorable to the rights of the vendee, will, I think, result in showing that the sale was procured by fraud. The embarrassed pecuniary condition of Graff; his practice before and after and about the time of the sale, of purchasing goods in the northern cities on credit for the Wheeling market, and after they reached Wheeling, having the goods immediately sent to Pittsburg and Steubenville, and probably other places, to be sold at auction for cash—first effacing his own name from the boxes in which they were contained, and marking in the place thereof the name of an irresponsible 436 *person; his purchasing from other merchants, about the time of his purchase from the defendants, large quantities of goods, constituting in the aggregate an amount of stock wholly disproportioned to the ordinary and legitimate demands of the business in which he was engaged; his getting the same kinds of goods from different merchants, (or as, in the language of one of the witnesses, the duplicating of his goods,) without any apparent motive connected with the style, quality or price of the goods, are circumstances which, taken in connection with the representations made by him to one of the defendants at the time of the sale, in respect to the flourishing state and prospects of his business, and the proof of his real pecuniary condition at the time and shortly after, would have well warranted a jury in finding that the defendants were defrauded in the sale. And if they had pursued the goods and reclaimed them (as it seems some other merchant from whom he bought goods about the same time, did) before there was any intervention of the rights of third persons, I know of no legal impediment that could have been placed in the way of their obtaining restitution. It is, however, well settled in England, that fraud in a sale does not absolutely avoid the contract, but only renders it voidable at the option of the party defrauded; that though the fraud gives a right to rescind, the property, in the subject matter, passes in the first instance to the vendee. And that an innocent purchaser from the vendee may acquire an indisputable title to the property. Stevenson v. Newnham, 16 Eng. L. & Eq. R. 408. And such was the decision of this court in the case of Williams v. Given, 6 Gratt. 268.

There is some contrariety in the decisions of other states as to whether a deed of trust, by the vendee, for the security of pre-existing debts simply, places the assignees in any better position to dis-
437 pute the *claim of the cheated vendor than the fraudulent vendee had, at the date of such assignment. In most of the cases, however, I think it will be found that the question turned on the further question, whether the trustees or creditors ought to be treated as purchasers for value; and that when the latter question has been decided in favor of the assignees, they have been generally protected against the claim of the original vendor.

And I think it has been the constant course of the courts in this state to regard the creditors in a deed of trust, made by their debtor, bona fide for their indemnity, in the light of purchasers for value.

The judgment which has been obtained by the defendants cannot be vindicated, therefore, unless it can be shown that the conveyance under which the plaintiffs claim labors under some defect or vice which prevents its operating, or destroys its validity, as a deed of trust. And in anticipation of such a difficulty in the way of their success, the defendants have contended here that the goods in controversy are not embraced in the deed, and that they are not brought within its operation by force of the transaction between the plaintiffs and Myerson. They also assail the deed because of certain provisions which it contains, which, they say, if not by the laws of Virginia, at least by the laws of Ohio, in which state the goods were at the date of the conveyance, render it fraudulent and void, and therefore inoperative against their claim. I shall proceed to examine each of these positions in the order in which they have been mentioned.

It is conceded that the goods in controversy do not pass by the first clause of the deed, which conveys only certain property, rights and interests therein, specifically mentioned and described. But in the clause next to the last it is provided, that "if through accident, or forgetfulness, or inadvertence," the said Marx Graff may have omitted to mention any claim 438 *or property, the same shall be understood as being conveyed to the trustees, as fully as if specifically mentioned. It is perhaps difficult to believe that so large and valuable a portion of his property as these goods constituted, (supposing them his,) could have been omitted by Graff, through "accident, forgetfulness or inadvertence;" and it is thence argued that they should not be held to be embraced in and conveyed by the deed. Such a construction would, however, it seems to me, be plainly at war with the leading intent of the parties and the obvious scheme of the deed, to be derived from an inspection of the instrument taken as a whole. For in the commencement of the deed the grantor, after reciting his indebtedness to "various firms and individuals, expressly states his desire, by the execution of the deed," to provide a fund for the payment of his said liabilities, and for this purpose to devote all the property of every kind, which he possesses, or is entitled to possess, to the creation of such fund. He then proceeds to convey all his stock of goods in Wheeling, all his household and kitchen furniture, all his bonds, notes, accounts and evidences of debt, and also an unexpired lease of his dwelling and store-house. And then, after setting out the trusts upon which the property is conveyed, he makes provision, in the manner already mentioned, for any of his property which may have been omitted.

It is I think manifest, from an examination of the whole instrument, that the scheme proposed was a dedication by the grantor of his entire property of every description to the payment of his debts, on the condition that his creditors should release him from any balance that might remain due to them after receiving respectively their pro rata shares of the proceeds of his estate.

Expressions in the deed of an equivocal character should receive such a con-439 struction as will support *rather than one which might defeat the scheme. And under such a rule of interpretation there is, I think, no serious difficulty in holding that the words in question were designed not to control or limit the operation of the other words in the clause, but simply to indicate some of the cases through which the grantor may have failed to mention, specifically, property that might thereafter be found to have belonged to him at the date of the deed; and that the true meaning and effect of the whole clause was so to extend the deed as to make it embrace all of the grantor's property, whether specifically mentioned or not, and thus to carry out fully the purpose declared in the recital. The determination therefore of the question whether these goods are conveyed by the deed, must properly be the result of the simple enquiry, whether at the date of the deed the grantor had any property in or right to them, which he could convey, uninfluenced by any speculation as to how or why, or whether through "accident, forgetfulness or inadvertence," or otherwise, there was a failure to mention them in the first clause of the deed.

The purchase of the goods by Graff has been already examined and commented on, and there is no evidence tending to show that he had divested himself of the property therein, so acquired, at any time previous to the date of the deed, unless he parted with them by force of the transaction of September 1851, between him and Myerson, disclosed in the deposition of the latter, on his examination by the defendants. But if, as argued here, the legal effect of that transaction was so to devest Graff of title to the goods, and to vest Myerson with it, as that a conveyance of the goods thereafter to his creditors by Graff, would not pass them, I do not see how the claim of the plaintiffs is in any regard impaired thereby.

For it is, I think, obvious that the 440 same rule of law which, in *the view of the case taken by the defendants. would give to the transaction the force of depriving Graff of the right thereafter to assign or convey the goods, would at the same time give effect to the transfer and assignment of the note, which was given by Myerson on receiving the goods. Graff acquired, by the colorable sale or arrangement between him and Myerson, a title to the debt evidenced by the note, in all respects equal, in force and extent, to the title vested in Myerson to the goods. The deed, as we have seen, assigns, with specific mention, all of the grantor's bonds, notes, &c.; and confers on the trustees not only the power to collect them by suit or otherwise, but also full authority to compromise and compound disputed or doubtful claims, and to take such sum of money for the same or receive any other thing in lieu or exchange therefor as they might deem for the interest of all concerned. And as by the arrangement by the trustees with Myerson, the latter, on the terms of getting back his note, surrendered, or (to use his own language) disclaimed all right or claim to the goods, and delivered to the trustees the ware-house receipt which he had obtained for the same, the goods were, it seems to me, as fully covered by the deed as if there had never been any arrangement between Graff and Myerson respecting them, and they had been specifically mentioned in the first clause of the deed.

No question under the recording acts, or as to notice whether actual or constructive, by the defendants of the rights of the plaintiffs, arise in the case, inasmuch as it is shown that the plaintiffs had obtained the actual possession of a part of the goods, and the virtual possession of the whole, before the occurrence of any active interference with their rights by the defendants; it being proved by Doyle, on his examination by the defendants, that Wickham had delivered up to him the ware-house
441 receipt, (which embraced *also twenty other boxes of goods,) had commenced hauling the goods to the river to be transported to Wheeling; and had carried about half of them to the wharf when he was arrested in his proceedings, and the goods were ordered back to the ware-house by the sheriff.

The plaintiffs having thus shown a complete and perfected title to the goods, it remains to be considered whether the deed under which they claim is void because of the provisions in it objected to by the defendants.

It appears, from the report of the decision of the Supreme court of Ohio in the case of Atkinson & Rollins v. Jordan Ellis, &c., 5 Ohio R. 294, which was given in evidence by the defendants on the trial, to have been decided by that court, that an assignment of effects by an insolvent debtor to trustees for the benefit of preferred creditors, with a clause that those who do not within a time specified release the debtor on account of what may be received from the proceeds of the assignment, is void as against other creditors: And that the effects assigned may by proper process be subjected in the hands of the assignee. And it must be conceded that the provisions of the deed under consideration would seem to fall fully within the principles declared by the court in announcing their decision. It does not appear from the report of the case, however, where the creditors or debtors resided, where the deed was made, or where the property was at the date of the deed; but the fair inference is, that the controversy was between citizens of that state, in respect to the operation of a deed made in that state, and purporting to convey property there situated; inasmuch as there is no reference in the opinion of the court to any question of conflict of law which would show that the forum, the domicil, the place of the contract, and the situs of the property, were not all the same.

442 *The defendants also gave in evidence an act of the general assembly of Ohio, passed in 1838, by the 3d section of which it is declared, that "all assignments of property in trust to trustees in contemplation of insolvency, with the design to prefer one or more creditors to the exclusion of others, shall be held to enure to the benefit of all the creditors in proportion to their respective demands; and such trusts shall be subject to the control of chancery as in other cases; and the court, if need be, may require security of the trustees for the faithful execution of the trusts, or remove them and appoint others, as justice may require." It is to be observed that the act does not in terms avoid the assignments therein mentioned, but only declares that they shall enure for the benefit of all the creditors. And the provision in respect to the control of the trustees, by requiring security of them, &c., would seem to favor the view of the plaintiffs' counsel, that the effect of the statute is not to invalidate the legal title of the trustees, but simply to provide for and insure an equitable distribution of the fund.

I do not deem it necessary, however, that we should construe this statute, or determine the effect which it ought to have on the previous decision of the Supreme court of Ohio, already mentioned; inasmuch as I have been unable to perceive how such decisions or statutes of that state can be made to bear on the controversy. For it is well settled, as a general rule, that a transfer of movable property, good by the laws of the owner's domicil, is valid whereever else the property may be situate. It is true that this rule is liable to exceptions; one of which is, that where the transfer is opposed to the laws of the country where it is sought to be enforced, the courts of such country are not bound to give it effect against the conflicting rights of its own citizens. Black v. Zacharie & Co., 3 How. U. S. R. 483, 514; Story on Conflict

443 of Laws, § 383 to 390, inclusive; *1 Rob. Pr. (1854) 156. In the cases of Burlock v. Taylor, 16 Pick. R. 335, and Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass. R. 146, cited by the last mentioned author, may be found appropriate illustrations as well of the rule as of the exception. In the last mentioned case an assignment of his effects by a debtor in Pennsylvania in trust for such of his creditors as should within a specified time release all their demands against him, the surplus to be distributed pro rata among his other creditors, and the remainder, if any, to be paid over to the assignor, was holden to be void as against a creditor, a citizen of Massachusetts, who had acquired a lien after the assignment. The court said that such an assignment, if made within the state of Massachusetts by parties residing there, and with a view to be there executed, could not have been supported, chiefly on the ground of its excluding such creditors as would not give a discharge of their debts; and that though such an assignment might be good in Pennsylvania, there was no comity which would require the court to give it validity against the rights of the citizens of Massachusetts. But in the first mentioned case, an assignment in New York, which was valid by the laws of that state, was sustained against the subsequent attachment of a citizen of New York of property in Massachusetts belonging to the debtor, although such assignments were, under the laws of Massachusetts, invalid. If this suit, therefore, had been brought in Ohio, there is nothing to show that the courts in that state would have been justified in departing from the general rule. None of her citizens are parties to the controversy, and no decision or law of Maryland, in which state the goods were bought, and in which the defendants reside, has been given in evidence to show that bona fide purchasers from the vendee are not protected from the claim of the vendor to rescind the sale of the goods for fraud in its pro-

444 curement, or that parties *standing in the attitude of the plaintiffs, do not occupy the position of bona fide purchasers.

In such a state of things an Ohio court, having no motive to make an exception to the general rule, would have yielded to it, and would have adjudged the question as to the validity of the deed of trust by reference to the laws of Virginia, where the deed was made. Let this be as it may, however, the plaintiffs, in the prosecution of their rights, have not found it necessary to invoke the aid of the courts of Ohio. They have instituted their suit in Virginia; and it would involve an entire departure from all rule on the subject, to hold that a court of Virginia, in passing on a deed of trust made in this state, upon trusts to be performed here, the grantor and the trustees being all citizens of Virginia, is to be controlled, not by its own laws and decisions, but by the laws of another state, merely because the property in controversy was at the date of the deed in such other state, and because the trustees perfected their legal title to the property, by reducing it to their possession within the limits of said last mentioned state. And it is well settled in Virginia, that clauses, such as the one objected to, in deeds of trust conveying all of the debtor's property for the security and satisfaction of his creditors, do not invalidate the deeds. Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 272; Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

The title of the plaintiffs is, therefore, as it seems to me, free from any vice or defect, and was complete when the tort complained of was committed by the defendants. And I think that the Circuit court erred in rendering a judgment for the defendants, and that said judgment should be reversed. The enquiry now arises as to the judgment to be rendered by this court.

If the proceedings are to be regulated by the rules prevailing in writs of error and supersedeas founded on exceptions taken to an erroneous refusal of the court 445 *below to set aside a general verdict on the ground of its being contrary to the law and the evidence, all we can do, after reversing the judgment, is to send the cause back for a new trial. If, on the other hand, we are to be governed by the rules prevailing in cases of appeals from erroneous judgments on the merits, rendered in cases of mills, wills, roads, and of motions, where the courts below have acted as judges of both law and fact, it is our duty to render a judgment in behalf of the plaintiffs for such sum as they have shown themselves entitled to. The latter of the two views is that which was contemplated by the revisors, and by them presented to the legislature in their report. In their note to the section under which the proceedings and judgment in question were had, they say, "This privilege (in the first part of the section) is given in the case of a will offered for probat by the law at present; and in all cases of motion the whole case of law and fact may be and generally is determined by the court. There are many cases in which the parties would prefer, for the purpose of saving expense and avoiding delay, that the court should decide the whole case. The right of exception to the judgment of the court will be preserved; it will merely be to the judgment of the court, instead of being, when the trial is by jury, to the admissibility of evidence, or to instructions given or refused, or to the decision on a motion for a new trial. One great advantage when the parties waive the trial by jury, will be, that when the court above reverses the judgment of the court below, either for matter of law or fact, there will be no necessity to send the case back for a new trial." Rep. of Rev. 816.

In the case of Pryor v. Kuhn, 12 Gratt. 615, decided at the last session of the court in Lewisburg, the character of the certificate to be made by the judges of the Circuit courts in cases of exceptions to their 446 judgments *under this section, was discussed and considered by the court; and I concurred in the opinion of the majority of the court holding that the bills of exceptions in such cases should so far conform to the practice regulating exceptions to the action of the courts below in overruling motions for new trials, as to contain a statement by the judge, not of the evidence, but of the facts proved on the trial. In that case, however, the evidence was conflicting and contradictory, and the majority of the court, as also the judge who dissented on the question of practice in respect to the certificate, all concurred in the opinion that under the application of either rule of practice the case could not be reversed. There was, therefore, nothing in the state of the case making it necessary to decide the question which arises in this as to the nature of the judgments to be rendered here in reversing judgments of the Circuit court obtained under this section; and this is therefore the first occasion on which the precise question has been distinctly presented to the consideration of the court for its decision.

A single view of the difference between the two proceedings, where in the one case the judgment of the court follows as the legal consequence of the verdict of a jury, and where in the other it is the decision of the court on its own view, as well of the facts as the law, has sufficed to convince me that it is our duty to render a final judgment for the plaintiffs instead of remanding the cause for further proceedings. There is, properly speaking, no such thing as an appeal from the verdict of a jury. Though the court which presides at the trial of a case before a jury, has a right, for certain causes, to set their verdict aside, it cannot give a decisive expression of its views of the merits of the controversy, in the shape of a judgment, until there is a verdict on which to found such judgment.

However manifest may be the error of 447 the jury, and *however satisfactory and complete the elements out of which to make the verdict which in the opinion of the court ought to have been made by the jury, all the court can do is to set aside the verdict and award a new trial before another jury. And when an appeal is taken from an erroneous judgment of a court refusing to award a new trial, as the appellate court, after reversing, is to render the judgment which the inferior court ought to have rendered, it can, necessarily, give no further judgment than to award the new trial. But when the parties waive a trial by the jury, and agree that the court may act as judge both of the law and the fact, the court is vested with the power and charged with the duty of making a complete decision by its judgment. If upon appeal from such judgment the appellate court perceives error in it and reverses it, there is no necessity for, or propriety in, sending the cause back in order that the error may be corrected in the court below. To award a new trial before a jury is to render a judgment which the inferior court could not have rendered without violating the agreement of the parties that the matter should be determined by the court without the intervention of a jury. And to remand it that the court below may make up and pronounce a new judgment, such judgment as in the opinion of the appellate court it ought to have given before, is simply to require of the inferior court to do what the law makes it the duty of the appellate court to do itself.

I have already expressed the opinion and endeavored to show that the plaintiffs have proved their case by their deed and the defendants' evidence, and that the case therefore would come within well recognized exceptions, even on the concession that in cases of this kind the general rule, applicable to bills of exceptions to judgments refusing new trials, requiring the facts to be certified, should prevail. It is

448 not, *therefore, essential to the decision of the case that an opinion should be expressed as to the practice which should govern the Circuit courts in making their certificates. The question is, however, as I conceive, closely connected with the character of the judgment to be rendered by the appellate court, a question which it has become necessary for me, in the view I have taken of the case, to consider. And as the examination of the last mentioned question has resulted in satisfying me that the opinion, in respect to the first, which I entertained and united with the majority of the court in Pryor v. Kuhn, in expressing, is erroneous, I deem it proper to avail myself of the occasion to declare the change of opinion. The reference to the comments of the revisors on the section of the Code under consideration, already cited, to which my attention was for the first time called on reading the opinion of the dissenting judge (Moncure) in the case just mentioned, (which owing to the late period of the session at which the case was decided, was not reduced to writing till after the close of the session,) and the more special enquiry which I have been led by such reference and the demands of the present case, to make as to the purpose and object contemplated in the enactment of said section, have convinced me that it was the design of the legislature to conform the course of the court below in such cases, as well in passing on the case as in furnishing to the defeated party the means of testing the correctness of its judgment in an appellate court, as also the action of the latter court in reviewing the judgment—all—to the practice prevailing in cases of wills, mills, roads, and motions on the merits generally, and not to that which has been adopted in cases of motions to set aside verdicts and grant new trials. That the judgment of the appellate court when it reverses, is to be thus regulated, I have already at-

449 tempted to *show, and there seems to be a want of consistency in holding that the proceedings in the previous stages are to be governed by a different practice. When the parties expressly waive the trial by jury and agree that the court shall act upon and determine the case as judge both of the law and the fact, what grounds have we for supposing that the legislature, in providing the privilege, or the parties in accepting it, did not mean that their rights in the case should thenceforward be regulated and determined in all respects, by the rules governing in other cases where the court acts as judge both of law and fact? What is there in the terms of the section to show the propriety of placing the defeated party in the predicament of one whose pretensions have been condemned by the verdict of a jury as well as the judgment of the court below, when there has not only been no verdict, but it has been expressly dispensed with by the assent of his adversary, entered of record?

Whilst the course of this court has been uniform in discountenancing the practice of the courts below in certifying the evidence instead of the facts on motions for new trial, it has been just as uniform in allowing such certificates in cases where the court below has rendered judgment on the law and the facts without a jury. In the vast number of appeals which have come up to this court from judgments in controversies respecting the probat of wills, the establishment of roads and mills, in motions on forthcoming bonds, and against sheriffs and their deputies and sureties, and in motions by corporations against delinquent shareholders, and in many other classes of cases where the judgments have been rendered by the courts below on the whole case, I have seen none in which this court has refused to look into the bill of exceptions, simply because of its containing a statement of the evidence. The difference of practice prevailing in the 450 two classes of cases was *well known to the legislature, and the inference seems to my mind a necessary one, that in providing for dispensing with the jury and submitting the case to the judge, they would have said otherwise, if they did not mean to subject the proceedings to the rules governing in all other cases where the court is allowed or required to act as judge both of law and fact. This view, it seems to me, derives support from the consideration that the legislature were, at the very period of the enactment of the section under review, engaged in greatly extending the remedy by motion. Without adverting to other instances, it is sufficient to notice a striking illustration of the change of policy in this regard, apparent in the fifth section of chapter 167, in which it will be seen that any person entitled to recover money by action on any contract, may, on motion before any court which would have jurisdiction in an action, obtain judgment after sixty days' notice, &c. It is true that in the seventh section it is provided that on a motion where an issue of fact is joined and either party desire it, or where in the opinion of the court it is proper, a jury shall be impanneled, &c.

What is the character of the proceeding in the particulars we are considering, in cases arising under this law, where neither party shall call for a jury? Is a defeated party in such case to occupy the attitude of one seeking to set aside a verdict? Is he to ask the court to set aside its judgment and grant him a new trial? And if refused, is he bound to procure a certificate of the facts; or did the legislature mean that the proceedings should be of the same character with the proceedings that the practice of the courts has sanctioned in other motions on the law and facts? What warrant have we for saying to a party appealing from a judgment of the court below, rendered under this law, upon a bill of exceptions setting out the evidence, that we will not enquire into the alleged injustice,

451 *because he has not procured such a certificate of the facts as has been heretofore required only in cases of unsuccessful motions to set aside verdicts? The answer seems to my mind obvious. If the legislature had designed to except the proceedings, in any particular, from the operation of the well known practice prevailing in other cases of motions in which the whole case is decided by the court, on the law and the evidence, they would have used some express declaration to indicate such purpose. If in the case of a motion neither party desires a jury, or if in an action the parties waive a jury and submit the whole case to the court, in either case it would seem to me fair to infer, in the absence of all declaration by the legislature to the contrary, that they intended the practice in motions on the merits to govern. And in such cases, if the defeated party excepts to the judgment and spreads out the evidence in his bill of exceptions, he does all that it is incumbent on him to do in order to prepare the case for the appellate court. Where the case turns on the credibility of witnesses, or, as it did in Pryor v. Kuhn, on the weight of conflicting and contradictory evidence, an appeal to the court can be of no avail to the defeated party. For in such case, acting on the rule announced in Dudleys v. Dudleys, 3 Leigh 436, 445, and constantly adhered to, this court will presume that the inferior court that saw and heard the witnesses, has decided correctly. But in cases where the reversal of the action of the court below does not involve this court in the necessity of deciding on the credibility or weight of evidence impeached or contradicted in the inferior court, I should not feel warranted in refusing relief on the score that the defeated party brought up, in his bill of exceptions, the evidence of the witnesses instead of a certificate of the facts.

I still think that the decision in Pryor v. Kuhn was right; but, in expressing 452 the opinion that the practice *in cases of this kind should be regulated by the rules governing bills of exceptions to judgments of the courts below, refusing to set aside the verdicts of juries, I think we mistook the intention of the legislature. I have deemed it my duty to take this the earliest occasion to state the change of opinion which my mind has undergone on the subject, and to set out some of the reasons that have induced that change. I forbear making any further statement of the arguments which might be advanced in support of my conclusions, as I should have to extend this opinion to an unreasonable length, and to present views which have been already clearly and fully stated in the opinion of Judge Moncure, before mentioned.

The amount for which the judgment of this court ought to be given, remains to be briefly considered. It appears from the testimony that the goods in question were appraised in Baltimore on the 5th of December 1851, by experienced merchants, at the sum of three thousand two hundred and ninety-four dollars and twenty-four cents. And the evidence clearly shows that the goods would have probably sold for more at Steubenville. There is some conflict in the testimony of the defendants' witnesses as to the sum which should be added to the value of the goods in Baltimore in December, in order to show their probable value in Steubenville on the 20th of November previous, the date of the conversion. Some of the witnesses fixing such further sum at ten per cent. on the value aforesaid, ascertained in Baltimore; and others at a higher rate. I think that the former is that best established; say three hundred and twenty-nine dollars and forty-two cents. The aggregate of these two sums, viz: three thousand six hundred and twenty-three dollars and sixty-four cents, to carry interest from the 20th day of November 1851, the date of the conversion, furnishes, I 453 think, the true measure *of the recovery to which the plaintiffs should be adjudged entitled in this case.

MONCURE, J., concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

ALLEN, P., concurred with Judge Samuels in his opinion as to the questions presented by this case, and in his views upon them; and therefore concurred in the judgment to be entered.

Judgment reversed, and judgment rendered for the plaintiffs for the value of the goods at the time of the conversion, with interest from that date.

454 *Lewis v. Arnold.

July Term, 1856, Lewisburg.

(Absent, LEE, J.)

1. Sales—When Title Passes—Case at Bar.—N is the lessee of L of a salt property the rent of which is reserved in salt. N in July sells to A all his salt then on hand, or which he shall make before the 1st of the next January, except what may become due to L for rent. A sends his boat early in December to N's wharf for a load of the salt and the salt is put on the boat: but after the boat is loaded and whilst the boatman is fixing his oars to start, L comes to the place and forbids him to take the salt away, saying he has a landlord's warrant or would get one, to take the salt for rent. Soon afterwards the deputy sheriff comes also and forbids the boatman removing the salt, saying he had a landlord's warrant or notice, though he does not appear to have had such a warrant; whereupon the boatman leaves the boat, and L takes possession of it and sends it down the river, and it is wrecked. In trover by A against L. HELD:
   1. Same—Same—Same.—The salt having been delivered by N to A's boatman and by him received and put into his boat, it was A's salt.
   2. Same—Same—Same.—The boatman had no authority to abandon the salt to L.
2. Action for Tort—Interest—Statutes.—Upon a judgment in an action for a tort depending when the act, Code, ch. 177, § 14, p. 673, went into operation, it is proper to charge interest from the date of the verdict.*

3. Appeal—Judgment for More Than Declaration Claims—Correction of.—Upon appeal from a judgment rendered for more than the amount of damages laid in the declaration, the appellate court may correct and affirm the judgment.

This was an action in the Circuit court of Kanawha county instituted in April 1848, by Enos S. Arnold against John D. Lewis. The declaration contained five counts, four of which were in case, and the fifth in trover; and the damages were laid at $800. The defendant appeared and demurred to the declaration and each count thereof, and also pleaded "not guilty:" And the court sustained the demurrer to the second count, but overruled it as to the others.

455 *The object of the suit was to recover the value of a parcel of salt which the plaintiff claimed to have purchased of George Neville, and of which possession was taken by Lewis. On the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence a lease from Lewis to Scott & Neville, bearing date on the 24th of July 1844, by which he leased to them a salt property on the Kanawha river, for six years from its date, reserving an annual rent of seven thousand five hundred bushels of salt, payable quarterly. He also introduced a deed bearing date the 17th of July 1846, by which Scott, with the assent of Lewis, assigned his interest in the lease to Neville, who undertook to pay the rent reserved to Lewis, and also to pay Scott two thousand barrels of salt in certain payments of five hundred barrels each, and also to pay the debts of the partnership due in Virginia. He also introduced an agreement under seal, bearing date the 22d of July 1846, between Neville and himself, by which Neville contracted to sell to him all the salt Neville then had on hand at his furnace, supposed to be about eight hundred barrels, and all the salt he should make at said furnace until the first day of the next January; except that after Neville has delivered the eight hundred barrels of salt to Arnold, he may in the next place deliver the five hundred barrels then due to Scott, after which he was to deliver to Arnold all the salt made at his furnace up to the first of January 1847, (except what may become due to Lewis for rent,) the said salt to be of first quality, well packed in merchantable barrels, weighed, inspected according to law, and delivered at the salt yard of said Neville. And Arnold was to pay twelve and a half cents per bushel for the salt, and settlements were to be made on the 1st of November and the 1st of January, when he was to give his notes at ninety days for the amount found due on these settlements.

456 *The plaintiff also introduced as a witness James Howery, a flat boat steersman, who stated that early in December 1846 he was employed by the plaintiff to take plaintiff's flat boat to Neville's furnace, and there load it with salt and take it to market for the plaintiff. That in loading said boat for plaintiff he was engaged three days, and finished it on the evening of the third day. That after he had finished loading the salt and was preparing his oars to start down the river with it, Lewis came to the landing and forbade him to take the salt away, saying he had a landlord's warrant, or would get one, to take the salt for rent. That soon afterwards Robert H. Early, a deputy sheriff for Kanawha county, came also to said landing and forbade him from removing said salt so loaded as aforesaid, stating that he had a landlord's warrant or notice, or something of that kind. That at this time as well as when Lewis was there, the witness was on said boat preparing his oars to start as aforesaid, and in consequence of what was said by the sheriff witness left the boat; and it was then taken possession of by some hands employed by the defendant for the purpose, taken away, and accidentally sunk by them. Witness also stated that Arnold had paid him for his services in loading the boat. The plaintiff also introduced evidence as to the value of salt at the time.

When the plaintiff had introduced his evidence the defendant demurred to it: And the jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff for eight hundred and thirty-three dollars and forty-nine cents damages, subject to the opinion of the court on the demurrer to evidence, the court afterwards rendered a judgment in his favor for that sum, with legal interest thereon from the 10th day of November 1852, the date of the verdict, until paid. Whereupon Lewis applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

457 *Fry, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That the whole of the salt made by Neville was not sold to Arnold; but that there was an express reservation of so much as was necessary to pay the rent reserved to Lewis. And that upon the claim by Lewis of the salt loaded on Arnold's boat it had been abandoned by the latter; and had not been claimed for two years. That Arnold therefore could not recover for the salt as his property.

2d. That the damages claimed in the declaration being but eight hundred dollars and the judgment having been rendered for eight hundred and thirty-three dollars and forty-nine cents, this was error.

3d. That it was error to render a judgment for interest. That the action having been brought and pending when the act authorizing a judgment for interest on a tort, that act did not apply to the case. That this was not a clerical error. Bent v. Patten, 1 Rand. 25, Campton v. Cline, 5 Gratt. 137-70, show that it was error to give a judgment for interest on damages. He referred to Brough v. Shanks, 5 Leigh 598; Gibson v. Governor for, &c., 11 Leigh 600; Commonwealth v. Winstons, 5 Rand. 546, 562. That this being a pending suit, it is excepted out of the act, Code, ch. 216, § 1, 2, p. 800, by the operation of the act, ch. 16. § 18, p. 101; and should be excepted out of the act, ch. 177, § 14, p. 673. R. 2460. And he insisted that neither this or the error in rendering a judgment for more than the damages laid in the declaration, could be corrected under the act, Code, ch. 171, § 5, p. 681. That this act was in substance the same as the act of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 108, 109, p. 512, 513; and that the cases before cited show that these 458 errors *could not be corrected under the act of 1819. As to the case of Hepburn v. Dundas, supra 219, the point was not made, nor was the bearing of the different provisions in the Code considered.

McComas and B. H. Smith, for the appellee, insisted:

1st. That on a demurrer to evidence the proof was certainly sufficient to prove a delivery of possession of the salt by Neville to Arnold; and that there was no intention to abandon the possession of, or the right to, the salt. The boatman supposing that the sheriff had authority to take possession of it, went off the boat to inform his employer of what was doing; but certainly he never intended to give up the boat on which Lewis had no claim of any kind.

2d. That the act, Code, ch. 177, § 14, p. 673, directs that in all cases thereafter, in which a verdict is rendered not allowing interest, the sum thereby found shall bear interest, and the judgment shall be accordingly. And they referred to the case of Hepburn v. Dundas, supra 219.

3d. That as to the excess of the judgment over the amount of the damages laid in the declaration, the judgment might be corrected in that respect and affirmed. Code, ch. 171, § 5, 6, p. 681.

DANIEL, J. The full delivery of the salt in controversy by Neville or his agents, to Howery, the person authorized by Arnold to receive it, is clearly established by the testimony of Howery. Possession of the salt was acquired, and its removal from the demised premises into the boat of Arnold, effected in an open and public manner; Howery, according to his statement, having been engaged three days in loading the boat with it. The inference is irresistible that it was delivered by Neville, in pursuance of the written agreement between him and Arnold of the 22d of July 459 1846. *This agreement was thus completely executed, so far as the salt in question was concerned, and nothing remained to be done in order to perfect the transfer of full ownership in it.

It is true that in this agreement there is full recognition by Arnold of the relation of landlord and tenant subsisting between Lewis and Neville, and an express exception out of the contract by the latter to deliver Arnold all the salt he should make during the year, of so much as might become due to Lewis on account of his rent. And if, therefore, such a transaction as that which occurred between Lewis and Howery, had occurred between Lewis and Arnold, and the conduct of the latter had been in all regards the same with that of Howery, I am not prepared to say that there would not have been much show of force in the position taken by the counsel of Lewis here. In such a supposed state of things the inference would have been strong, that Arnold, whatever might be his strict legal rights in the controversy, had acquiesced in the claim of Lewis; and in such a case there might have been an apparent injustice in allowing him afterwards to visit Lewis with a loss that might not have occurred but for his seeming acquiescence. But I can see no ground for holdng that Arnold is to be held bound by the conduct of Howery. The agency of the latter was of the most special and limited character. He was the mere servant or hireling of Arnold, charged with the simple duty of receiving the salt, loading the boat with it and carrying it down the river to market for Arnold. He was clothed with no powers which could make his admissions, express or implied, of the justice of Lewis' claim, binding on Arnold. If, therefore, from his statement that he left the boat in consequence of what was said by the sheriff as he was on the eve of starting with his boat, it is to be inferred that he believed in the statements made by Lewis and the sheriff, and ac-460 knowledged *their right to take the salt for rent, it is difficult to perceive by what rule of law it is to be maintained that such inference can be brought to bear on the rights of Arnold.

Let it be that Howery had full faith in the declaration of Lewis, that "he had a landlord's warrant or would get one to take the salt for rent," and in the announcement made by the sheriff on his arrival soon thereafter, that "he had a landlord's warrant, or notice, or something of the kind;" and that in leaving the boat he designed a surrender of his charge to the challenge of what he supposed to be a rightful claim and a lawful authority, still it is obvious that such conduct cannot stand in a controversy between Lewis and Arnold, as the substitute for proof, by Lewis, of the justice of his claim, nor dispense with the exhibition by him of the process by means of which he threatened to enforce it.

There is nothing in the exception or proviso to the agreement between Arnold and Neville, from which to infer a duty on the part of the former to see, on every occasion of receiving salt from the furnace, that a sufficiency of salt was left to discharge the rent to be paid by Neville. The whole effect of the reservation was to give Neville the right to retain, out of the whole quantity made during the year, a sufficiency for that purpose. There is no proof of any specific amount of rent due to Lewis; no proof that he or the sheriff was armed with any legal authority to make a levy on the salt; no proof that the salt in controversy had been set apart by Neville for the purpose of satisfying the rent, nor that a sufficiency to pay the rent was not left on the leased premises; no proof of collusion between Neville and Arnold in fraud of the rights of Lewis. But we are called on to infer all that is essential to show a superior right in Lewis, from the exhibition of the lease between him and his 461 *tenant, the agreement between Arnold and Neville showing that the former had notice of the terms of the lease, and from the fact that Lewis took possession of the salt with the assertion of a lawful right to take it to satisfy his demands as landlord. We should have to reverse all the rules applicable to demurrers to evidence before we could allow a defense constructed out of such elements alone, to stand in the way of the plaintiff's recovery. The Circuit court therefore did not err, as it seems to me, in rendering a judgment on the verdict for the plaintiff. It is contended, however, that the judgment was wrong in allowing interest on the damages, conditionally assessed by the jury, from the date of the verdict.

By the 14th section of chapter 177 of the Code of 1849, p. 673, it is declared that the jury in any action founded on contract may allow interest on the princpal due, or any part thereof, and fix the period at which such interest is to commence. And in any action for a cause arising thereafter, whether from contract or from tort, the jury may allow interest on the sum found by the verdict, or any part thereof, and fix the period at which the said interest shall commence. And if a verdict be rendered thereafter, which does not allow interest, the sum thereby found shall bear interest from its date, whether the cause of action arose theretofore or shall arise thereafter; and judgment shall be entered accordingly.

It is conceded by the counsel of the plaintiff in error, that the terms of the last clause of this section are sufficiently broad to cover the case; and he also concedes that the judgment is, in the particular in question, in conformity with the judgment rendered by this court in the case of Hepburn v. Dundas, supra 219. He contends, however, that the terms of said clause, if sought to be applied to verdicts rendered in actions pending at the date of the act, must 462 be controlled by *the provisions of the 18th section of chapter 16, p. 101, and the first and second sections of chapter 216, p. 800, the last chapter of the Code. He calls attention to the fact that in the petition for the appeal in the case just mentioned, no such question is presented, and also to the further fact that in the written opinion of the court no reference is made to these provisions; and he insists that under such circumstances the question should not be regarded as concluded by the decision made in that case.

The provisions of the section to which the counsel first refers us are, that no new law shall be construed to repeal a former law as to any offence committed against the former law, nor as to any acts done, any penalty, forfeiture or punishment incurred, or any right accrued, or claim arising under the former law, or in any way whatever to affect any such offence or act so committed or done, or any penalty, forfeiture or punishment so incurred, or any right accrued or claim arising before the new law takes effect; save only that the proceedings thereafter had shall conform, so far as practicable, to the law in force at the time of such proceedings. And by the first and second sections of the last chapter of the Code it is declared, that all the provisions of the preceding chapter shall be in force upon and after the first day of July next (after the passage of the act); and that all acts and parts of acts of a general nature in force at the time of the passage of the act, shall be repealed from and after the said first day of July next, with such limitations and exceptions as are already in the previous provisions of the Code, or in the said chapter thereafter expressed; and that such repeal is not to affect any offence or act committed or done or any penalty or forfeiture incurred, or any right established, accrued or accruing before the said first day of July, on any prosecution, suit or proceeding pending on that 463 day, *except that the proceedings thereafter had shall conform, so far as practicable, to the provisions of the act.

There is no conceivable reason why the legislature should have made any distinction in the particular under consideration, as affecting the parties thereto, between actions pending and actions thereafter to be brought on causes of action already existing; inasmuch as it is obvious that this new incident to, or consequence of, the verdict could be as effectually avoided by a defendant in the one case as in the other. The true point of objection (if any) to the clause in question is, that it attaches to a cause of action already existing, a consequence which under the former law did not belong to it, the defendant not being compellable by any former law in case of a verdict for damages assessed in actions for tort, to pay interest thereon from the date of the verdict. But I do not think that in this respect the clause stands in any respect opposed to the spirit of these general regulations.

No one who has inflicted injury by the commission of a tort can be properly said to have an established right to withhold for any space of time the measure of reparation ascertained by the verdict of a jury to be due to the injured party. The justice of requiring the prompt payment of the sum which may be assessed by a jury in such case, and of allowing the party injured to receive, and of compelling the party withholding to pay, a fair compensation for retaining it, is just as clear as it is to make a similar requisition of one who is found to be the debtor of another by contract. And when it is entirely within the power of the wrongdoer wholly to avoid the new consequence which the clause in question attaches to the verdict, (as it is, by the prompt discharge of the damages,) I cannot see how the law can be said to be objectionable as being of a retrospective character.

It is to be observed further that the 464 act existing at *the date of the Code in respect to the allowance of interest by the jury, embraced only actions founded on contracts, and directed that the jury should, after ascertaining the principal sum due, fix the period at which interest should commence, if interest should be allowed by them; and that judgment should be rendered accordingly, carrying on the interest till the judgment should be satisfied. This provision though repealed, by the general repeal of all acts then in force, in the last chapter of the Code, is, as we have seen, in effect substituted by the first clause of the 14th section of chapter 177. In respect to actions founded on tort, there was, at the date of the passage of the Code, no act of assembly either directing or forbidding the jury to allow interest on the damages, or prescribing whether interest should or should not go on the damages assessed by the jury in such cases, where the verdicts did not allow interest. These matters were regulated by the common law. In respect to them there was, therefore, no act of assembly to be repealed: And consequently, the clause in question does not come within the terms of the last chapter of the Code declaring the repeal of "all acts and parts of acts" of a general nature.

So far as the said clause declares a new rule in conflict with the common law, it does so in terms definite and precise, leaving nothing for a general rule of construction to operate upon. It ascertains clearly the right to the interest as an incident to every verdict to be thereafter rendered, which does not allow interest, whether the cause of action arose theretofore or shall arise thereafter; makes no distinction between suits pending or thereafter to be brought; fixes the date of the verdict as the period from which the interest is to run, and declares that judgment shall be rendered accordingly. It neither needs nor admits of a reference to any general provision 465 to explain or declare on what *rights it was designed to operate, or what suits it was designed to affect. It carries with it its own construction. And to bring the general regulations in question, understood as they are by the counsel of the plaintiff in error, to bear upon it, would be to make the law contradict itself in some of its most important provisions; provisions in which it has used language of the most positive and unequivocal character. On the operation and effect of such a law it is plain these general regulations can, from the very nature of the subject and the objects contemplated, have no control.

There is, however, a plain mistake or error in the verdict and judgment, to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error, to the extent of thirty-three dollars and forty-nine cents; the amount of damages claimed in the declaration being eight hundred dollars, whilst the verdict and judgment have been rendered for eight hundred and thirty-three dollars and forty-nine cents. By the sixth section of chapter 181 of the Code of 1849, it is made the duty of the Court of appeals in cases of this kind to amend the judgment in such particular, and then to affirm the judgment, if there be no other error. Under the former law, § 110, ch. 128, Rev. Code, it was the duty of this court in such case to reverse the judgment of the court below on account of the error, and then to proceed to give such judgment as the court below ought to have given. And here again the counsel for the plaintiff in error insists that under the requirements of the general provisions of the Code already commented on, we ought to conform our judgment to the requirements of the former law. The want of any applicability of these provisions, and the absence of all right in the plaintiff in error to ask their application, is, if anything, more obvious in this enquiry than they were in the one just disposed of.

466 *If the writ of error had been pending when the Code took effect, there would be a show of propriety in contending that the plaintiff should not by the new law be burdened with the costs of correcting an error which, as the law stood when he sued out the writ, he had a right, an inchoate right, to have corrected at the costs of his adversary. But his position is just the reverse of that supposed. The writ of error, his (the plaintiff's in error) own suit, has been instituted since the Code took effect. Not only so; but the cause of action on which it is founded, viz: the error committed in the verdict and judgment rendered in the Circuit court, did not arise till after the new law came into operation. The new law does not sanction this error, nor give to the plaintiff in the original action, which was pending when the new law took effect, a right to recover of the plaintiff in error larger damages than he had a right to recover by the former law. So far from it, whilst it repeals (as is true) the former laws regulating the correction of such errors, it at the same time substitutes in their place new provisions equally efficacious; and in fact gives to the plaintiff in error an additional means of obtaining relief, viz: by motion to the Circuit court. By pursuing that remedy, instead of the one selected, he might have saved himself as well as his adversary the expense and delay that have been encountered in this court. Having refused to avail himself of the cheaper remedy, he ought not to be heard to complain of the rule which requires him to pay the expenses of the more costly one of which he has chosen to avail himself.

No precedent can be found going to the length of condemning, as retrospective, laws which merely change the remedies for existing rights. And it would be carrying the doctrine of the inviolability of vested rights to an extent far beyond the 467 real purpose of any *constitutional provision, and the true object and scope of the general regulations in question, to hold that a party to a pending suit has such an established right to the then existing remedy for the correction of errors, as that an error which may be committed thereafter in the progress of the suit, cannot be made the subject of a new law regulating the costs of the proceedings to correct the error in the appellate court.

It is not necessary to consider the questions which were raised in the Circuit court by the demurrer to the first counts in the declaration, inasmuch as the evidence obviously applies only to the case stated in the last count, which, it is conceded, is in all respects good.

There is, I think, no error in the judgment, except that which was committed in rendering judgment for a sum exceeding that laid in the declaration. This error ought to be corrected, and the judgment of the Circuit court then affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

468 *Clements v. Kyles.

July Term, 1856, Lewisburg.

1. Caveat—What It Should State—Objections.—In a case of caveat the caveator should state in his caveat the grounds on which he claims to have the better right to the land in controversy. And if this is not done the caveatee may either move the court to dismiss the caveat, or to require the caveator to file a specification of the alleged better right on which his claim is founded. But after the jury is sworn to ascertain the facts, it is then too late to object to the form of the caveat.

2. Same—Evidence—Books of Surveyor to Show That Patent Founded on Survey.—In a case of caveat the caveator claims under a patent issued to W in 1756, which does not refer to any survey. In order to show that the patent was founded on a survey, the caveator offers in evidence a copy from the books of the surveyor of Augusta county, of a certificate of a survey and plat made for W, dated in November 1749. The certificate itself does not contain the calls for course and distance or other marks, but these are given on the plat, and they agreed with the grant in its general and locative calls. It is competent evidence for the purpose for which it is offered.

3. Same—Same—Witnesses—Case at Bar.—To prove the boundaries of W's patent the caveators offer the deposition of a witness who had purchased a part of the land included in that patent from a party claiming under it, but not any part of the land claimed by the caveators. The witness then had a controversy with a third person in which it was important to him to establish the boundaries of said patent. The deposition had been taken in a caveat between the ancestor of the caveators and the same caveatees, in relation to the same land, in which the said caveator had suffered a nonsuit. HELD:

1. He is a competent witness.
2. The deposition is competent testimony.
3. Evidence—Ancient Boundaries—Declarations—Whose Admissible.†—The statement of a person living on the land at the time, made many years before the trial, at which time he was dead, pointing out to the witness two of the corners called for in W's patent, is not competent evidence; he not having been the surveyor or chain carrier at the making of the survey, or owner of that or adjoining lands calling for the same boundaries, or having any motive or interest to enquire and ascertain the facts.

469 *4. Same—Surveys—Case at Bar.—Surveys made many years after W's survey, and by a different surveyor, are not competent evidence as to the boundaries of W's survey.

*Caveat—What It Should State—Objections.—In Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 123, the court said: "If the caveator fails to state in his caveat the ground, on which he claims to have the better right, he will still be permitted to file a specification of the alleged better right, on which his claim is founded, but this he must do, before the jury is sworn to ascertain the fact; but if the caveatee does not object to such a failure of the caveator to specify the grounds of his claim, before the jury is sworn, he cannot afterwards object to the caveat on that account. †Evidence—Ancient Boundaries—Declarations—Whose Admissible.—In Fry v. Stowers, 92 Va. 14, 22 S. E. Rep. 500, the court said: "The law is well settled in this state that evidence is admissible to prove the declaration of a deceased person as to the identity of a particular corner, tree, or boundary, provided such person has peculiar means of knowing the fact in question, as, for instance, the surveyor or chain carriers who were engaged upon the original survey, or the owner of the tract, or of an adjoining tract calling for the same boundaries; and so of tenants, processioners, and others whose duty or interest would lead them to diligent enquiry and accurate information of the fact; always, however, excluding those declarations which are liable to the suspicion of bias from interest. Harriman v. Brown, 8 Leigh 697; Clements v. Kyles, 13 Gratt. 477-8."

In Crothers v. Crothers, 40 W. Va. 176, 20 S. E. Rep. 929, it is said: "To exclude the witness, he must have an interest to be affected by the result of the suit by force of the adjudication, and though he may feel a bias in the struggle, and may even be interested in the question litigated, and may have to litigate the same question in future litigation of his own, that does not exclude him. corners, the patent calls for several lines and courses. In fixing the boundaries of the land, the lines calling for these ascertained corners must be run thereto, though this may require a variation of both course and distance; but where a corner is called for which is not found, the course and distance called for in the patent must govern; and an average allowance of variation in each course and line called for between the ascertained corners is not to be made.

6. Boundaries of Land—Instructions—Case at Bar.—The land in controversy lying in the western part of a large survey, it is error to instruct the jury that if they are satisfied that certain specified corners of the survey are established, and the courses of the patent between these corners are correctly laid down upon the plat of the survey made in the cause, it is all that is necessary for them to ascertain in this suit; as it is in that portion of said patent that the survey of the caveatees lies, as appears by the plat, and it is only to that portion of said land that they have set up title.

7. Wills—What Lands Pass.—The will of W having been made in 1746, before the survey or patent to him, the land embraced in said patent did not pass by his will to Mrs. W. but descended to his heir at law.

8. Case Sent Back—Case at Bar.—A case in which the cause was sent back to the court below to have a more perfect finding of the facts upon which the rights of the parties depend.

In April 1849 William Kyle and others, devisees of James Kyle deceased, filed with the register of the land office a caveat to prevent the issue of a patent to Orville Anderson and Franklin Clements for a tract of land of one thousand acres in the county of Carroll. The only ground stated in the caveat on which they opposed the issue of the patent is that they claimed to hold the land by an older and better title.

The caveatees without making an objection to the manner in which the caveators had set out the grounds of their objection to the issue of the patent, went to trial; and the jury found the facts on which the caveators rested their title. These are stated by Judge Lee in his opinion.

470 The caveators claimed the legal *title to the land in controversy under a patent issued to James Wood on the 16th of August 1756. This patent gave the location and boundaries of the land, but did not refer to any survey on which it was founded: And the caveatees having stated that they should, from the facts and circumstances which would appear in evidence, insist that no actual survey of the land granted to James Wood had ever been made, the caveators offered in evidence the copy from the surveyor's books of Augusta county of a certificate of a survey made for James Wood, and of the plat of the survey. These, in the location and boundaries, agreed with the patent, and it bore date the 20th of November 1789. The certificate of the present surveyor of Augusta county followed the copy of the original certificate of survey, and was followed by the plat. The caveatees objected to the evidence; but the court overruled the objection; and the caveatees excepted.

In the progress of the cause the caveators offered in evidence the deposition of William Kenny, which related to the boundaries of Wood's patent. He had purchased a part of the land included in that patent from a party claiming under it, but not any part of the land claimed by the caveators. He was interested to establish the boundaries of the patent; and then had a controversy with a third person in which the establishment of these boundaries was important to him. This deposition had been taken in a caveat case between James Kyle, under whom the present caveators claimed, and the same caveatees, in relation to the same land, in which the caveator suffered a non-suit. The caveatees objected to the evidence because it was not taken in the same cause, and on the ground that the witness was interested, and thus incompetent. They also objected to the answers given to the second, thirteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth questions. But the court overruled the first and second objec-471 tions, and *the objection to the answer to the second question, and sustained it as to the others. Whereupon the caveatees again excepted.

The second question and the answer to it are as follows:

"Are you acquainted with any of the corners and lines of the said survey?" (the Wood survey said to have been granted to James Wood).

Answer. "When we moved here" (witness had said he had been living on the Wood survey forty-five years) "or some time thereafter John Cock" (who had left the country for Kentucky between forty and fifty years since, then a middle aged man, and it had been reported for a number of years that he was dead), "who was then living on the same land, took me and my father to the dug corner, and then to the burnt corner, and told us they were both corners to Wood's land."

After the caveators had introduced in evidence the patent to Wood under which they claim, and the report and plat of the surveyor, made in the cause; and had also introduced evidence tending to prove that certain lines on the plat were the true boundaries called for in the patent; and that most of the original corner and line monuments of boundary must govern, although neither courses nor distances nor computed contents correspond. Pernam v. Wead, 6 Mass. 131; Clements v. Kyles, 13 Gratt. 468-490. Where the boundaries of land described in a survey cannot be established by reference to known monuments, and the courses and distances cannot be reconciled, there is no universal rule which requires that one of these should yield to the other; but either may be preferred, as shall best comport with the manifest intention of the parties, and with the circumstances of the case. trees of said land had been destroyed some years previous to the survey of the caveatees, to prevent the identification of the corners and lines of the land embraced in the patent, offered in evidence, as tending to establish the true boundaries of said land, a patent dated the 30th of August 1796, to Nathaniel Frisbie, for two thousand two hundred acres lying in the county of Grayson. This patent called for streams called for in Wood's patent, and one of its corners was called for as on the side of a hill near Wood's line. They also offered in evidence, for the same purpose, a patent bearing date the 21st of June 1813, to Churchill Jones, for two hundred acres 472 of land in the county of *Grayson.

The caveatees objected to the introduction of this evidence but the court overruled the objection; and they again excepted.

After the jury had retired to consider of their verdict, they returned into court and enquired what it would be proper for them to do if they should be of opinion that three or four corners of the survey were established? In reply to this question the court said, it could only say, that if they should be satisfied that particular corners of the survey of twenty-eight hundred acres made for James Wood and patented to him, were established by the evidence, that the lines must be so run as to go to said corners, although to run them thereto might require a variation in the course and distance: That in making said variation there ought to be a fair allowance made in each line and course if necessary.

The court further instructed the jury by reference to the plat made in the cause by the surveyor, that if they should be satisfied from the evidence that certain specified corners were established as corners of the twenty-eight hundred acre survey, and that the surveyor had laid down the courses of Wood's patent therefor in his plat between these specified corners as designated by certain lines, correctly, it was all that was necessary for them to ascertain in this suit; as it was in that portion of said patent that the survey of the caveatees lay, as appeared by the plat, and it was only to that portion of said land that the caveatees had set up title. And that it was not necessary for them to ascertain whether the courses of Wood's patent were properly designated by certain lines upon the plat on another specified part of the survey, as the title to that portion of the land and its boundaries were not in controversy in this cause. To this opinion of the court the caveatees again excepted.

Upon the facts found by the jury,
473 which are stated *in the opinion of Judge Lee, the court rendered a judgment for the caveators; and thereupon Clements applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

William H. Cook, for the appellant.
B. R. Johnston, for the appellees.

LEE, J. If it could be considered an open question whether a party claiming a perfect legal title under a grant from the commonwealth can maintain a caveat against one seeking to obtain a new grant for the same land, under the provisions of our act of assembly, I should have little difficulty in holding that the remedy is inappropriate to such a case, thinking as I do that the argument to show that it is a proceeding for the discussion of equitable rights merely and not intended to draw an equitable right into comparison with an alleged perfect legal title, has never been answered and is in truth conclusive. But under the influence of the cases of Preston v. Harvey, 3 Call 495; Tanner's adm'r v. Saddler, 2 Hen. & Munf. 370; and Hardman v. Boardman, 4 Leigh 377; in all of which the caveat was sustained on the basis of a complete legal title in the caveator, either actually shown or presumed in his favor, and of the settled and long continued practice during a period within which there have been two revisals of our statute law without any change upon this subject, I must regard it as no longer a debatable matter and hold it as now fully settled that a party may well enforce a complete legal title by caveat against another seeking to obtain a new grant for the same land however inexpedient it may be in many cases in which he has the actual possession also to forego the advantage of his position as defendant and take that of an assailant in exercising his right so to do.

The act of 1819 provides that a ca-474 veat on the ground *of better right in the caveator shall express therein the nature of the right on which the plaintiff claims the land. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 86, § 38, p. 330. The present Code contains the same provision. Code of Virginia, ch. 112, § 24, p. 483. The object is to apprise the caveatee of the grounds on which the caveator claims the better right that he may come prepared to controvert it. Harper, &c., v. Baugh, &c., 9 Gratt. 508. And it has been held in Kentucky upon the construction of a similar provision in their Code, that the plaintiff can only rely on the grounds of better right set forth in his caveat. Justices of Allen County v. Allen, 2 A. K. Marsh. 30. The caveators in this case contented themselves with saying in their caveat that they claimed to hold the land by an older and better title. The nature of their right is in no manner expressed except that they claim as devisees of James Kyle deceased and, in part, as trustees of Sarah McDowell. This is plainly no compliance with the requirement of the statute and the caveat is defective upon its face. But if the caveatees desired to take advantage of this defect, it was their duty to make the objection at a proper stage of the proceeding by a motion either to dismiss the caveat or to require the plaintiffs to file a specification of the alleged better right on which his claim is founded. After the jury have been sworn to find the facts, the objection would come too late and it cannot therefore be the subject of consideration here.

These points being disposed of, we come to the questions upon the merits. And the first of these is as to the admissibility of the survey from the surveyor's book of Augusta county bearing date on the 20th of November 1749, as evidence for the caveators. The caveatees in stating their case had said that they should insist upon the evidence, as it would appear, that no actual survey of the land described in the grant to Wood under whom the caveators
475 claimed had *ever been made; and to repel such a presumption, the Circuit court permitted the caveators to read the survey to the jury. That the official survey upon which a grant has issued under the provisions of our act of May 1779 may be used as presumptive testimony before the jury with a view to identify the calls of the patent subject to be repelled by other evidence of identity either derived from the grant or extrinsic thereto, has I believe never been questioned. Even the original entry may be used for that purpose. Camden v. Haskill, 3 Rand. 462. And so other surveys made by the same surveyor about the same time or recently thereafter and upon which grants have issued from the commonwealth, are proper evidence upon the question as to the locality or boundary of a coterminous or neighboring tract although such grantees may be strangers to the parties to the controversy. Overton's heirs v. Davisson, 1 Gratt. 211. The same reasons would apply with equal force in the case of a grant under the colonial government. In June 1666, and again in October of the same year, the grand assembly declared that the grants of lands within the colony appertained only to the governor and council. 2 Hen. St. 253. In October 1705 (4 Anne) an act was passed providing the mode of obtaining grants for lands upon importation rights as well as for lands generally. It authorized a party not possessing any importation right, to pay to her majesty's receiver general at the rate of five shillings for every fifty acres he desired to take up and upon certificate of such payment, any sworn surveyor to whom it should be produced was authorized and required to survey the quantity paid for and to make return of such survey into the secretary's office to the end that a patent might issue thereupon. 3 Hen. St. 305, et seq. And the form in which the patent was to issue was provided in the act. Ibid. p. 308. By the act
476 of *1748, § 46, surveys of lands intended to be patented were required to be made by a sworn surveyor duly commissioned for that purpose and the breadth of every survey was required to be at least one-third of its length except where the courses were interrupted by rivers, creeks, impassable mountains and swamps or the lines of other lands previously taken up. 5 Hen. St. 424. It appears that James Wood paid to the receiver general the sum of fourteen pounds entitling him to have surveyed twenty-eight hundred acres of land; and on the 20th of November 1749 he procured the surveyor of Augusta county to survey the same for him: and upon that survey manifestly the patent issued to him in 1756. For although the patent does not describe the survey by its date as does a grant under our act of 1779, nor indeed refers in terms to any survey, yet as the description of the land imports that a survey was made and as in the due course of obtaining a grant, a survey was necessary, the presumption is that one was made; and as this survey exactly agrees with the grant in the general and locative calls for the land described and in all the courses and distances of its lines of boundary, the conclusion is irresistible that it was the survey on which the grant was founded. That the surveyor's certificate does not embody the courses and distances of the lines and that they are only appended in the form of a plat of the survey, is a matter merely formal: they are as much a part of the description as if set out in hæc verba in the body of the certificate. I think it clear the Circuit court properly permitted the survey to be read in evidence to the jury.

Next is the question as to the competency of the witness Kenny. And upon this there can be no doubt. He had purchased a portion of the land embraced by the grant to Wood of parties claiming under that grant and he claimed that the Wood survey 477 should be located *in the same manner as the caveators claimed in this proceeding. But the land claimed by the caveators was no part of that which he had purchased nor was there any privity between them which could render the judgment in this case evidence for or against him in any other action. True, he admitted that he felt an interest in the "establishment" of the Wood survey as claimed by the caveators, but this was an interest in the question, and not in the event of the suit; going to his credibility, but not to his competency. He was therefore properly held to be a competent witness. Richardson v. Carey, 2 Rand. 87; Masters v. Varner's ex'ors, 5 Gratt. 168.

But although Kenny was clearly a competent witness, I do not perceive on what just ground the court overruled the objection to his answer to the second interrogatory. It gave but the unsworn statements of Cock that two certain corners designated were corners of the Wood survey. It is true Cock was living on the same land at the time, and he had left the country many years before the trial and was at that time no doubt dead. Nor is it denied that upon questions of boundary in Virginia, not only general reputation, but also hearsay evidence as to particular facts may under certain circumstances be properly received as evidence. Thus the declarations of a deceased person as to a particular corner tree or boundary may be given in evidence provided such person had peculiar means of knowing the fact. Harriman v. Brown, 8

Leigh 697. In Kentucky the rule would seem to be different. For although evidence of reputation or common tradition will be admitted as to an ancient boundary, (Smith v. Norvells, 2 Litt. R. 159,) yet evidence of hearsay as to particular facts to prove such boundary will be excluded unless perhaps in cases where the name of a water course or some other object which commenced by parol be necessary to 478 be established. *Cherry v. Boyd, Litt. Sel. Cas. p. 8. But although as stated in the opinion of the court in Boardman v. Reed, 6 Peters' R. 328, and approved in Harriman v. Brown, (above cited,) from the perishable character of the land marks in this country, evidence of hearsay as to particular facts may under proper restrictions be received upon a question of ancient boundary, yet such evidence should be carefully watched because from its very character it may in many or most cases be utterly impossible to meet or disprove it. There must always be some peril in departure from the broad general rules of evidence, and it should not be carried farther than required by the absolute necessities of the case. I think the rule is laid down sufficiently broadly in Harriman v. Brown and I am not disposed to extend it in the least beyond the very terms in which it is there expressed.

In this case Cock the person whose statements were allowed to be proven, was neither surveyor nor chain carrier at the making of the original survey, nor was he the owner of the tract or of any adjoining tract calling for the same boundaries. He had never been engaged as a processioner of the land nor was his situation such in reference thereto as to render it his duty or interest to make diligent enquiry and obtain accurate information as to the facts. It is said he was living on the land at the time, but in what character is not stated. It is not said that he was there as tenant under the Wood title or as a claimant for himself under any title. For aught that is shown in regard to his occupation, it may have been that of a mere squatter. Certainly nothing is shown from which it is to be inferred that Cock had that peculiar means of knowing the facts which would impress upon his unsworn statements the character of evidence in a subsequent controversy between others to whom he was entirely a stranger about the title to the land.
479 *That his living within the bounds of the survey gave him the opportunity to see trees marked as corners of some survey, found accidentally or otherwise, would surely not be sufficient unless some duty or interest can be traced to him by which he would have been prompted to make diligent enquiry and to obtain accurate information within the meaning of the rule as propounded in Harriman v. Brown.

I think the Circuit court should have excluded the answer to the second interrogatory as it properly did those to the thirteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth interrogatories to the same witness.

I think the Circuit court erred also in permitting the grants to Frisbie and Jones to go to the jury as evidence upon the question of the identity of the Wood survey. In Overton's heirs vs. Davisson, 1 Gratt. 211, it was held that in a controversy concerning boundary or locality of land granted by the commonwealth pursuant to a survey, another survey made by the same surveyor about the same time or recently thereafter, of a coterminous or neighboring tract, upon which also a grant had issued whether to a party to the controversy or to a stranger, is proper evidence upon the question of identity unless plainly irrelevant; and accordingly it was decided that the Circuit court had erred in rejecting the surveys for Thomas and Lewis which the demandants had offered in evidence. Those surveys were dated on the 28th and 29th days of April 1785, respectively. The date of the survey on which the grant to Overton was founded does not appear in the report of the case, but the grant was dated on the 23d of May 1786, and all three surveys were doubtless made nearly about the same time and by the same surveyor. In this case, the survey for Frisbie was made on the 31st of October 1795, nearly forty-six years after the Wood survey, and the survey for Jones was made on the 15th of March 480 1809 nearly sixty years after the *Wood survey. The surveys for Frisbie and Jones were made by the surveyor of Grayson doubtless a different person from the surveyor of Augusta in 1749. They could not therefore come within the rule of Overton v. Davisson. They were clearly res inter alios, and I am aware of no principle on which their admissibility as evidence in this case can be sustained. Any call which they might contain for "Wood's line" without further explanation, would be at best the mere declaration of a party having no peculiar means of knowing the fact and whom neither duty nor interest would so far as is shown, have prompted to make the necessary enquiry with a view to obtain accurate information. It would be but his supposition where the line was, having nothing of the only elements which could render it evidence in a controversy between third persons. And it is exactly one of those calls which we are told are often mere matters of conjecture and always liable to be mistaken. Harriman v. Brown, 8 Leigh 697, 705, per Tucker, president.

We come next to the instructions given by the court to the jury.

In telling the jury that if they should be satisfied particular corners of the Wood survey had been established by the evidence the lines must be so run as to go to those corners notwithstanding it might involve a variation in both course and distance, the court certainly committed no error. It was only the familiar proposition that natural objects or other proven corners will control course and distance. But I do not perceive clearly what was intended by the addition made to this instruction "that in making said variation there ought to be a fair allowance made in each line and course, if necessary." The idea would seem to be that if variations of course and distance were found necessary for the purpose indicated, there should be something in the nature of an average established 481 *by assigning to each line a just proportion of such variation. This certainly cannot be correct. The course and distance of a line cannot be determined upon any such principle. The true principle is that the course and distance called for in the grant must govern in respect of each line except so far as they may be controlled by calls for natural objects or artificial monuments proven to have been made or adopted for the survey itself, and in fixing those of any one line no reference can legitimately be had to the variation from the patent calls that may be found necessary in determining the course and distance of any other line according to natural or other controlling objects found upon the ground.

I think the Circuit court also erred in instructing the jury that if they were satisfied certain corners specified were established by the evidence as corners of the Wood survey and that the surveyor had laid down upon his plat the intermediate courses correctly, it was all that was necessary to be done, because it was in that (the western) portion of the Wood survey, the caveatees' survey embracing the land they claimed title to was found to lie, and that it was not necessary for them to ascertain whether the courses of the intermediate lines on the other or eastern portion of the Wood survey were correctly designated or otherwise because the title and boundaries of that portion of the survey were not in controversy in that case. It was not sufficient that the jury should have been satisfied that the courses of the intermediate lines around the western part of the survey had been laid down correctly, because the true length of each of those lines was quite as important as the course, and this was to be determined not by making a fanciful allowance in order to preserve a general average of variation but by the patent call for distance unless the same were controlled by a call for some natural object or some 482 artificial *monument sufficiently established, in which case the distance should be shortened or lengthened accordingly. And although the land covered by the caveatees' entry lay in the western part of the Wood survey and within the compass of the intermediate lines running around that portion from what is called the "burnt corner" to the "beginning corner" and a line connecting those two corners, yet it by no means follows that the title to the residue of the Wood survey and its boundaries were not also drawn into controversy. A survey upon which a grant has issued is an entire thing, and if its identity be contested, the title to the whole and all its boundaries become more or less matter of dispute. It may very well happen and in many cases must be that the locality of the boundary lines of a survey in a particular part depends upon the calls in an opposite and extreme portion of the survey; and although there may be intermediate calls, yet if there should be any repugnancy between them or any of them, it would be for the jury to say which are to be observed and which to be disregarded upon the principle that those which are more certain and important shall control those which are less so.

I think therefore the court unduly restricted by its instruction, the enquiry which the jury had to make; and that in answer to their enquiry they should have been told, that it was their duty to consider the evidence offered as to all of the corners and lines of the survey: that where a corner was established to their satisfaction, the lines appearing to radiate from such corner should be so drawn as to converge at the same, and course and distance should both be changed so far as necessary for that purpose; and where no corner was found the patent calls for course and distance must be their guide and must supply such lines as were not established by the 483 proofs on the ground; *that any conflict that might be found among the different calls was to be reconciled by them upon the principle above indicated and in this manner that they should give location to the entire survey, and determine for themselves whether it embraced the whole or any part of the land within the survey of the caveatees.

I proceed to consider briefly the facts of the case as ascertained by the finding of the jury.

The caveators claimed under the grant to James Wood dated the 16th of August 1756. To connect themselves with this grant they introduced the will of Col. Wood, dated the 8th of September 1746 and admitted to probate in the County court of Frederick in February 1760, by which he devised all his estate real and personal to his wife Mrs. Mary Wood subject to certain pecuniary charges in favor of children: they then produced a deed from Mrs. Wood by which she conveyed (in 1791) parcel of this land by metes and bounds containing seventeen hundred and eighteen acres, to Robert Wood a son of Col. James Wood, and also another deed of the same date by which she conveyed the residue of said land by metes and bounds supposed to contain one thousand and eighty-two acres to Mrs. Susannah Wood widow of Dr. John Wood another son of Col. Wood, for life and after her death, to Fanrose and Stanhope Wood two sons of Dr. Wood: Robert Wood in his lifetime sold and conveyed a portion of the land conveyed to him by his mother to one John Kenny, and after his death by deed dated the 16th of April 1833, his widow and heirs conveyed the residue to James Kyle under whose will the caveators claimed as devisees: Stanhope Wood by deed dated the 9th of August 1821, conveyed one moiety of the land conveyed to him and his brother Fanrose Wood by Mrs. Wood in 1791 to the same James Kyle, and Fanrose Wood by deed of the 16th 484 of May 1823 released *his interest in the moiety so conveyed. The will of James Kyle was then found by which he devised his estate to the caveators subject to a provision in favor of his wife. The jury also find that the land in controversy is embraced by the conveyances and wills under which the caveators claimed title, and that after the purchase of the same by James Kyle the taxes on the land had been regularly paid.

Digitized by Google

The foregoing is in substance all the facts found by the jury and no other facts appear to have been agreed by the parties.

Now at the date of the will of James Wood and until the act of 1787, it is clear that after acquired lands would not pass by a devise in the most general terms of all of a testator's lands, tenements and estate whatsoever of which he was or at the time of his decease might be possessed. Brunker v. Cook, 11 Mod. R. 121; S. C. on appeal, 1 Bro. P. C. 19; 1 Wms. Saund. 277, n. (e.); 3 Lom. Dig. 19. And as the grant did not issue, nor was even the survey made until some years after the date of the will, and no interest shown in Wood of any kind either legal or equitable, at that date, the land did not and could not pass by the devise to Mrs. Wood, but upon the death of the testator descended to his oldest son as his heir at law, the Virginia statute of descents not having been enacted till 1785. But although the caveators failed to connect themselves with the grant to Wood through his will, still such a succession might be shown to the right which descended to the heir at law as would be sufficient to maintain this proceeding. Or if the better right cannot be deduced by descent from the patentee, yet the possession of those claiming under the deeds from Mrs. Wood might have been under such circumstances as would itself invest the caveators with such a title or such an interest in the premises as would authorize them to interpose and prevent the 485 *emanation of a grant to the caveatees. But upon these subjects the finding of the jury is wholly silent. It is not found who was the heir at law of James Wood nor what may have been the course of descent from him nor whether any interest in this land was vested in those or any of them under whom the caveators claim. It is not found how many sons James Wood had, nor which of them survived him, nor which was the oldest. Nor is any thing found as to the possession of the land; whether the same was ever taken by any one claiming under the Wood grant, and if so, when taken and how long continued. It may be there has been such possession under claim of title as would itself suffice to vest a perfect legal title in the caveators, or with the other circumstances shown in the case would authorize the jury to presume an abandonment of his claim or some family arrangement amounting to a conveyance or release of the right of the heir of James Wood whoever he may have been, to those under whom the caveators now claim.

I think the finding of the jury is so defective that the court could not understandingly and safely undertake upon the facts which are found to adjudicate upon the rights of the parties, and that therefore the appellants are not entitled to have final judgment pronounced here in their favor, but that the cause should be sent back to the Circuit court for a more full and perfect finding of the facts upon which the rights of the parties may essentially depend. See Cropper v. Carlton, 6 Munf. 277; McNeel v. Herold, 11 Gratt. 309.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment and remand the cause for a new trial.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

486 *The judgment of the court is as follows:

The court, for reasons stated in a written opinion filed with the record, is of opinion that the said Circuit court did not err in permitting the copy of the survey dated the 20th of November 1749 mentioned in the first bill of exceptions to be read as evidence to the jury nor in admitting as evidence the deposition of William Kenny mentioned in the second bill of exceptions, the court being of opinion that the said William Kenny was not shown to be incompetent as a witness in this cause. But the court is of opinion that the Circuit court did err in permitting the answer to the second interrogatory to the said Kenny upon his examination in chief to be read as evidence this court being of opinion that the statements and declarations of John Cock which were given in that answer were not evidence against the caveatees, and that the same should have been excluded from the jury as well as the answers to the thirteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth interrogatories which were properly excluded by the court. And the court is of opinion that the objection to the said second interrogatory and the answer thereto should have been sustained.

And the court is further of opinion that the Circuit court erred in permitting the patents to Frisbie and Jones mentioned in the third bill of exceptions to be read as evidence to the jury, this court being of opinion that the said grants were not evidence against the said caveatees upon the question of the identity of the Wood survey or any other matter in issue between the parties in this cause.

And the court is further of opinion that in so much of the instructions given by the court to the jury mentioned in the fourth bill of exceptions as informed them that if they should be satisfied that particular corners of the Wood survey were established by the testimony, the lines must be run so as to go to said corners although 487 *so to run them might require a variation both in course and distance, there is no error, but that the rest and residue of said instructions was erroneous, this court being of opinion that in lieu thereof and in answer to the question propounded by the jury, the court should have instructed them that it was their duty to consider the evidence offered as to all of the corners and lines of the survey; that if there should appear to be any irreconcilable conflict or repugnancy between the different calls or any of them, they were to hold to and be governed by those which were most certain and important rejecting those if any which were less so: that if any corner or corners should be established to their satisfaction, the lines radiating therefrom were to be so run as to converge at the same upon the ground and that course and distance should both be changed so far as necessary to make them so converge; that where no corner could be found, the patent calls for course and distance must be their guide and must supply such lines as could not be established by the proofs of such corner or of the lines themselves intersecting thereat; and that in this manner they were to give location to the entire survey and to determine for themselves whether it covered the land embraced by the caveatees' survey or any part thereof.

And the court is further of opinion that the finding of the facts by the jury sworn in the cause was imperfect and insufficient and that the court could not understandingly and safely undertake to pronounce final judgment thereupon between the parties; that the same does not ascertain who was the oldest son and heir at law of the said James Wood or whether there was any succession on the part of those under whom the caveators claimed title to the rights of such heir at law, and if any what was the character of such succession and to whom it applied; nor does it find that there was any family arrangement between said 488 *parties either proven in fact or to be presumed from the long continued claim of those under whom the caveators claimed and the acquiescence of those who may have been entitled by descent from the said James Wood and the other circumstances of the case; nor does it find whether possession was ever taken and held under the Wood title and if so, when taken, by whom, and how long continued.

The court is therefore of opinion that final judgment ought not now to be pronounced upon the finding aforesaid, but that the same ought to be set aside and a new trial had upon the principles herein before declared.

Therefore reversed, &c., and cause remanded for a new trial upon which if the same questions shall arise as those upon which the opinion of this court has been herein before expressed, the rulings and opinions of the Circuit court shall conform to the views and principles above declared. Which is ordered. &c.

489 *Middleton for Warren's Heirs v. Arnolds.

July Term, 1856, Lewisburg.

(Absent, ALLEN, P. and LEE, J.)

Bonds—Conveyance of Pretensed Title.*—A conveyance of a pretensed title to land is not void; and the bonds given for the purchase money for the same are valid.

This was an action of debt in the Circuit court of Lewis county, brought in 1846 by Henry O. Middleton, for the use of John Warren's heirs against George Arnold and others, upon four single bills for one hundred dollars each, given for the purchase of the right of John Warren's heirs to a certain tract of land in the county of Lewis. The issues were finally made up upon five pleas field by the defendants in September 1854. The first was the plea of payment, on which the plaintiff took issue. The other four pleas were in substance the same, and alleged that the single bills declared on were given for a pretensed title to a tract of land, purchased of Warren's heirs through their agent Middleton, and negativing in their plea all the exceptions in the statute against buying pretensed titles. To these pleas the plaintiff demurred; and the court overruled the demurrer, and rendered a judgment thereon for the defendants. Whereupon Middleton applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Robert Johnston and Fry, for the appellant.

Hoffman, for the appellees.

MONCURE, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is certainly true, as a general
490 rule, that a contract *founded on an act forbidden by a statute under a penalty is void, although it be not expressly declared to be so; and that no action lies to enforce it. It is also true, that if such void contract be by deed, the parties thereto are not thereby estopped from showing the illegality of the act which makes the contract void. The numerous authorities cited by the counsel for the defendant in error abundantly sustain the verity of these propositions. The main question arising in this case is, Whether a conveyance of a pretensed title comes under the general rule, and was made void by the operation of the act passed December 6, 1786, entitled "an act against conveying or taking pretensed titles?" 1 Rev. Code 1819, ch. 103, p. 375.

That act does not declare the conveyance

*Act Prohibited by Statute—Penalty—Validity of Contract.—For the proposition that, a contract founded on an act forbidden by statute under a penalty, is void, but that it does not necessarily follow that the unlawfulness of the act was meant by the legislature to avoid the contract made in consideration of it, the principal case is cited and approved in the following cases: Yates v. Robertson, 80 Va. 482; Neimeyer v. Wright, 75 Va. 246.

In Isaacs v. City of Richmond, 90 Va. 31, 17 S. E. Rep. 760, the principal case is cited with approval, but the case is distinguished on the ground that the act tended to impair the supremacy of the constitution and was void.

See, in accord, with the ruling in the principal case, Duval v. Bibb, 3 Call 362; Tabb v. Baird, 3 Call 475, 481; Allen v. Smith, 1 Leigh 231, 254; Williams v. Snidow, 4 Leigh 16, 17.

void, but prohibits it under the penalty of forfeiture, both by the vendor and vendee, of the value of the land conveyed; one moiety to the commonwealth and the other to him who will sue as well for himself as for the commonwealth; unless the vendor, or those under whom he claims, shall have been in possession of the same, or of the reversion or remainder thereof, one whole year next before; though it provides that any person lawfully possessed of land, or the reversion or remainder thereof, may take, or bargain to take, the pretensed title of any other person, so far, and so far only as it may confirm his former estate.

Not long after the passage of the act, and as early as 1802, its construction and effect were considered by this court in the case of Duval v. Bibb, 3 Call 362; and the court were of opinion that the act imposed a penalty, but did not avoid a conveyance. That such was the opinion of the court, does not appear from the case itself; but the fact is so stated by Judge Roane in Tabb v. Baird, Id. 476, 481, decided in the following year. Judge Carrington, in the last case, also declared that the act merely creates a penalty, and does not affect the right.

491 The same opinion has *been expressed by some of the judges in several subsequent cases; as by Brooke, P., in Allen v. Smith, 1 Leigh 231, 254, and by Tucker, P., in Williams v. Snidow, 4 Id. 16, 17. No judge, so far as I have seen, has ever expressed a contrary opinion. The law is so laid down in our text books. 2 Tuck. Com. book 2, p. 215; 2 Lom. Dig. p. 10; and has been so uniformly and universally regarded in Virginia. It has been approved by the legislature, as is shown by the fact that no law has ever since been passed to the contrary, although there have been two general revisions of the laws since this opinion has been thus authoritatively promulgated. In the latter of these revisions, that of 1849, the propriety of this opinion was strongly indicated, not only by the omission of the act of 1786, but by the adoption in the Code, ch. 116, § 5, p. 500, of a provision, that "any interest in or claim to real estate may be disposed of by deed or will." After all these judicial and legislative recognitions of this opinion, and after it has so long and universally been regarded and followed as a correct exposition of the act of 1786, it is now too late and would be attended with wide spread evil, to reverse it; and it must therefore be regarded as the settled law of the land: especially as its propriety is now for the first time questioned, after the act itself has been repealed, and one of an opposite nature adopted in the Code.

But even if the subject were res integra, we think the opinion would be reasonable. The act of 1786 is substantially a re-enactment of the statute, 32 Hen. 8, c. 9, § 2 and 3. That statute was passed for a different age and country, and never suited the state of things existing here. It is justly characterized by an eminent law writer as a "severe statute," even without reference to any effect it might have in avoiding the contract of the parties. 4 Kent's Com. 447.

And President Pendleton speaks of it
492 in the same way in *delivering the resolution of the court in Duval v. Bibb. Its literal import has been much restricted by subsequent decisions, even in England; one of which is the case of Partridge v. Strange, Plowd. R. 77, in which the subject was very fully argued and considered in the Court of common pleas a few years after the statute was passed. It has been held that the statute does not extend to a conveyance of an equitable title or estate; Lord Eldon in Wood v. Griffith, 1 Swanst. R. 43, 55; Allen v. Smith, 1 Leigh 231; nor to judicial or official sales; Frizzle v. Veach, 1 Dana's R. 216, 2 Id. 325; Jarnett v. Tomlinson, 3 Watts & Serg. 114; nor to mortgages or other securities. The state of things which occasioned the passage of the statute has long since ceased even in England, where it has in effect been repealed by 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106, § 6, which authorizes the alienation of rights of entry and other rights of action before inalienable. Reports of revisors, p. 602, § 5, and note ‡. It was no doubt embodied in our original Code out of abundant caution, in copying such of the old English statutes as were supposed to be applicable to our country. But it remained almost a dead letter upon the statute book until it was repealed, and a wholly different provision adopted in its stead in the present Code. We therefore consider it a reasonable construction of the statute which limits its effect to the penalty thereby expressly denounced, and leaves the conveyance to have such legal effect as it would have at common law. That legal effect is that a conveyance of land in the adverse possession of another is void as to that other and all persons claiming under him, but valid between the parties. The law is so laid down in 2 Kent's Com. 448; where it is said that this is the language of the old authorities, even as to a deed founded on champerty or maintenance. See these authorities cited in note (a,) and the cases there cited from 9 John. R. 55, and 9 Wend. R. 516. See 493 also the case of Livingston v. *Proseus, 2 Hill's (N. Y.) R. 526. The law may have been differently expounded in some of the states; but it will be found that in some of them, as in Kentucky and Tennessee, a conveyance of land in the adverse occupancy of a stranger to the contract, is expressly declared by law to be void. Chamberlin v. Steuart, 7 Dana's R. 36; Wintersides v. Martin, 7 Yerg. R. 384. And it will probably also be found, that whenever a conveyance of land has been held to be void because it was of a pretensed title, the land was, at the time of the conveyance, in the adverse possession of a stranger.

The conveyance in this case not being void, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that the bonds given for the money which was the consideration of the conveyance, are not void. If the statute avoids any thing, it is the conveyance which it expressly prohibits, and not the bonds for the purchase money which it does not so prohibit. If the conveyance is valid, a fortiori are the bonds. It would be to the last degree unreasonable and unjust if the purchaser, who is generally at least as guilty as the vendor and often more so, and on whom the statute imposes the same penalty that it does on the vendor, should have and hold the land conveyed without paying any thing for it. This would be not to vindicate the law and effectuate its policy, but to give a premium to the chief offender, and to encourage dishonesty and fraud. It is not pretended in this case that there has been any failure of consideration; that the purchasers did not get precisely what they contracted for, and in consideration of which, they bound themselves to pay the money; but they place their defense upon the ground that they and their vendors have violated the statute against conveying and taking pretensed titles. The answer is, "The law you have violated leaves the conveyance to have its legal effect. You have got what you bargained for, and every principle of law as well as honesty requires you to pay what you agreed to pay for it."

494 *The view which has been taken of the case renders it unnecessary to decide any other question arising therein. It was maintained by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, that as the statute did not declare the conveyance of the land, much less the bonds for the purchase money, void, the obligors in the bonds could not defend themselves against their enforcement upon the ground that, ex æquo et bono, they did not owe them; but only upon the ground that it would be against the policy of the law to enforce them, and that in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis: that if any such policy ever existed, it ceased by the repeal of the statute and the adoption of a new and different provision on the subject in the Code: that the pleas in which the defense was set up in this case, not having been filed until after the Code took effect, then showed no good cause for not enforcing the payment of the bonds: that it was competent for the legislature to authorize such enforcement; and a law to that effect, operating on the remedy and not upon the right, would not interfere with vested rights, nor impair the obligation of a contract, but on the contrary tend to enforce the contract: And that a law to that effect, is to be found in the provision adopted in the Code in lieu of the former statute against conveying or taking pretensed titles. We think there is great strength in this position; but whether it be sustainable or not, is a question which we need not now decide. We are of opinion, for the reasons stated, that the Circuit court erred in not sustaining instead of overruling the demurrer to the pleas numbered 2, 3, 4 and 5; and that the judgment must therefore be reversed with costs, the demurrer sustained and the cause remanded to the Circuit court, to be tried upon the issue joined on the plea of payment.

495 *Cribbins v. Markwood.

July Term, 1856, Lewisburg.

[67 Am. Dec. 775.]

1. Sale of Reversion—Mere Inadequacy of Price—Case at Bar.—A sale of a reversion in real estate by a young man who had just arrived at the age of twenty-one years, there having been no fraud or imposition on the part of the purchaser, and no confidential relations between the parties, will not be set aside for mere inadequacy of price.
2. Same—Vested—English Doctrine—Not Applicable.—The English doctrine in relation to the sale of expectant interests, so far as it relates to vested interests, held not to be law in this state.

This was a bill filed in the Circuit court of Augusta county by Francis M. Markwood against Patrick Cribbins for the purpose of setting aside a sale and conveyance of an interest in real estate in the town of Mount Sidney in that county, on the ground of fraud and of gross inadequacy of price; the sale having been made by a young man soon after coming of age, and the subject being the one-third of a house and lot and out lot adjoining the town, in which his mother was entitled to dower, and of the whole of which she had possession. The facts are stated in the opinion of Judge Allen.

When the cause came on for hearing, the court below declared that there was no ground for imputing to the defendant actual fraud or imposition; but upon the ground that it was in effect the sale of a reversion at half its value, by an inexperienced youth, the court decreed the rescission of the contract and a reconveyance of the property. From this decree Cribbins applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

496 The case was argued by Baldwin, for the appellant, *and Michie, for the appellee; but authorities are referred to by the judge, and it would be useless to give them here.

ALLEN, P. It appears from the pleadings and proofs in this cause, that the father of the appellee departed this life intestate about fourteen years before the institution of this suit; that he owned at the time of his death a house and lot in the village of Mount Sidney, Augusta county, and an out lot containing about eleven acres, adjoining the village. He left four children, (all infants,) one of whom died under age. The appellee was the eldest child; and when he attained his full age on the 24th of November 1851, he was the owner of an undivided one-third of said property, subject to the dower interest of his mother. The estate was a vested interest, two-thirds a present, and one-third an interest in reversion; the whole was in the occupation and possession of his mother, to whom dower had not been assigned. Immediately after arriving at full age, the appellee offered his interest in the property for sale to sundry individuals. In less than two months after he attained his majority, he made sale of it to the appellant for one hundred and sixty dollars, of which one hundred dollars was to be paid down, and sixty dollars to be paid in nine months, in paper. On the 16th day of January 1852 the appellee conveyed the property to the appellant: on the tenth of March thereafter his mother died with pulmonary consumption, after a confinement to her bed of about a month. The appellee instituted this suit on the 20th of March 1852 to set aside the sale, and to annul the deed, upon two grounds: First, of actual fraud, circumvention and imposition on the part of the appellant; and second, of constructive fraud, supposed to be imputed by the policy of the law to such a bargain, growing out of the mere inadequacy of price. The evi-

497 dence shows *that the appellee had not actually resided with his mother for several years before he attained full age; and that for some years he had been doing business for himself, uncontrolled by his mother, or any other person. But as he was a frequent visitor at her house, he had better opportunities than the appellant of informing himself of the condition of her health. There is no allegation in the bill, or any thing in the proof to show, that the appellee was not fully acquainted with his rights and the extent of his interest in the property when he contracted to sell it. He seems to have been a young man of at least ordinary intelligence, and as he had been doing business on his own account for some years, he must have had some experience in dealing. At the time of the sale he was indebted in a sum not exceeding fifty dollars, but no portion thereof was due to the appellant; and it is not proved that there was any relation of confidence between the parties. The proposition to sell appears to have been made by the appellee to the appellant, and this after he had been offering his interest in the property for sale to others. Upon the facts in the record the court below held, and as I think correctly, that there was not the least reason for imputing any actual fraud to the appellant in this transaction.

In view of the facts that the property was undivided; that dower had not been assigned; that the widow, from the death of her first husband, had been, and at the time of the sale was, in the actual possession of the whole thereof, the court below seems to have considered that the interest sold by the appellee was merely reversionary. So regarding it, the question is presented for the first time in this court for direct adjudication, How far it is incumbent on the party dealing with the seller of such an expectant interest to establish, not only that there was no actual 498 *fraud, but that he had agreed to pay a fair and adequate consideration?

In reference to expectant heirs, and those sustaining that character, the doctrine seems now to be fully established in England that they are entitled, for mere inadequacy of price, to have the contract rescinded upon the terms of refunding the money and interest received. In Edwards v. Burt, 15 Eng. Law & Equ. R. 434, decided in 1852, the Lord Chancellor observes, that "it is unnecessary to canvass or discuss the principles on this subject, for the rule on it was finally and distinctly established by the house of lords in the case of Lord Aldborough v. Frye; and that case following several of the previous authorities, clearly establishes that the purchaser of a reversionary interest, or, at all events, the purchaser of such an interest from an expectant heir, or from a person standing in the situation of an expectant heir, (and the plaintiff Mrs. E. clearly sustained that character,) is bound, if the transaction is impeached within a reasonable time, to satisfy the court that he gave the fair market value for what he purchased."

In that case property had been bequeathed to the mother of Mrs. E. for life, with remainder to Mrs. E. for life. At the time of the sale, the mother was seventy-four years of age, and Mrs. E. was thirty-eight. So situated she clearly sustained, according to this opinion, the character of one standing in the situation of an expectant heir.

After this recent and unequivocal recognition of the rule as finally established, it is unnecessary to review the long series of cases upon this subject. They will be found, and the substance of them set out and commented upon in the note to the case of Lord Chesterfield v. Janssen, in White & Tudor's Selection of Leading Cases in Equity, p. 344, 393. See also Davis v. Duke of Marlborough, 2 Swanst. R. 113, 147, n. a.

499 *Contracts with persons, sustaining the character of expectant heirs, entered into during the lifetime of the parent or relation standing in loco parentis, for the purchase of interests dependent upon the bounty of such parent or relation, may be obnoxious to the imputation of fraud on the rights and interests of the parent or relation. In Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. sen. 125, 156, Lord Hardwicke said, "A fraud may be collected or inferred in the consideration of this court, from the nature and circumstances of the transaction, as being an imposition and deceit on other persons not parties to the fraudulent agreement." Under this head he enumerates marriage brocage contracts, in which neither of the contracting parties are deceived, but they tend to deceive others; contracts to return a part of the portion of the wife; contracts by some creditors, to secure a larger portion of their debts, before they will unite in a deed of composition with other creditors; and in the same class he mentions catching bargains with heirs, reversioners and expectants, in the lifetime of the father, &c. "The father, ancestor, or relation from whom was the expectation of the estate, is kept ignorant, and is so misled and seduced to leave his estate, not to his heir or family, but to a set of artful persons who have divided the spoil beforehand."

In conformity with this rule, it was held in Boynton v. Hubbard, 7 Mass. R. 112, that a contract made by an heir to convey, on the death of the ancestor living the heir, a certain undivided part of what should come to the heir by descent, devise or distribution, was a fraud upon the ancestor. This deceit, says Parsons, C. J., is relieved against as a public mischief, as being a deceit on the father or other relation, who is thus influenced to leave his fortune to be divided amongst a set of common adventurers, and because it is destructive of all well regulated control 500 or authority *of persons over their children or others having expectations from them.

The rule, when limited and restricted to the sale of expectancies of the above description, may be sustained by principles applicable alike to all well regulated communities. It is the policy of every well constituted society to protect against fraud, and to suppress vice. Contracts with young heirs for mere expectancies dependent upon the bounty of the relation, tend to encourage both. They are most generally entered into for the purpose of ministering to some secret, vicious indulgence. A deceit is practiced on the owner and disposer of the property, and the necessity of concealment subjects the expectant heir, generally young and inexperienced, to oppressive sacrifices.

In the note to Davis v. Duke of Marlborough, 2 Swanst. R. 113, 147, the annotator states that the principle laid down in some of the cases as that on which the doctrine is in part founded, would seem to comprehend every person dealing for a reversionary interest; yet he raises the question, Whether, in order to constitute a title to relief, the reversioner must not combine the character of heir? He remarks, that the reversionary interests, the sale of which has been rescinded from mere inadequacy of price, were expectant on the decease of a parent or other lineal ancestor in every instance, except in a few cases which he enumerates, in all of which the sales have been made while the vendors were in distress, and so the transactions were affected with actual fraud.

The doctrine of imposing upon a purchaser from a reversioner who does not sustain the character of an expectant heir, the heavy burden of showing, in all cases and at all times, that he has paid a full and adequate consideration, has not 501 always been acquiesced *in as correct. In some of the earlier cases an opposite rule has been acted on. Thus, in Nichols v. Gould, 2 Ves. sen. 422, Lord Hardwicke refused to set aside the purchase of a reversion at an under value, there being no fraud. He observed, "there is no proof of any fraud, or imposition on the vendor; nothing but suspicion; and therefore it is too much to set aside the purchase merely on the value." In Griffith v. Spratley, 1 Cox's Cas. 383, the subject of sale consisted in part of a reversion. Lord Chief Baron Eyre remarked, "that the case had been much rested upon this, that the satisfaction received was so inadequate in value that it was impossible to resist the inference of fraud which arises from such inadequacy; or if possible, to make inadequacy itself a distinct principle of relief in equity. But that he knew of no such principle, and the common law knows of none such; that he would never agree that inadequacy of consideration is in itself a principle upon which a party may be relieved from a contract he has wittingly and willingly entered into. But it may be a strong evidence of fraud when the transaction is such as to be inconsistent with the sober manner of a man's conducting his affairs." In Wood v. Abrey, 3 Madd. R. 417, the vice chancellor, Sir Jno. Leach, in reply to the argument, that the party was entitled to relief on the ground of the purchase being of a reversion, unless the purchaser could show that the consideration was adequate, observed, "That the policy of this rule as to reversions may be well doubted, and if the cases were looked into it might be found, that the rule was originally referred only to expectant heirs, and not to reversioners." In Shelly v. Nash, 3 Madd. R. 232, the same judge questions the principle and the policy of the rule, arguing to show that sellers of reversions were not necessarily in the power of those with whom they contract; and that persons who sell their 502 reversions *from the pressure of distress, are thrown by the rule into the hands of those who are likely to take advantage of their situation; for no person can securely deal with them. Sir Wm. Grant, in Peacock v. Evans, 16 Ves. R. 512, says, that the tendency of this doctrine is to render all bargains with such persons very insecure, if not impracticable. And again, in Gowland v. De Faria, 17 Ves. R. 20, the same judge speaks of the rule requiring such a purchaser to show that a full and adequate consideration was paid as imposing a heavy burden upon him; but that his case is an exception to the general rule, that for mere inadequacy of value a contract is not to be set aside. In Jeremy's Equ. Jurisdiction 398, the writer draws a distinction between contracts with expectant heirs, and contracts with the actual owner in remainder or reversion; and conceiving that contracts of the latter class are not necessarily of a nature to excite suspicion, he classes them with bargains to be set aside on account of fraud, and not merely on the ground of inadequacy of price.

The rule, therefore, if distinctly settled in England, as being applicable to contracts with reversioners who do not combine the character of expectant heirs, has only been so established within a recent period, and not without serious doubts as to its propriety. The authorities referred to show that it could not be regarded as a settled principle of equity jurisprudence at the date of American independence.

The subject was alluded to in the case of McKinney v. Pincard, 2 Leigh 149. The case was, however, decided on other grounds; the judge who delivered the opinion of the court, remarking that it was not necessary in that case to decide whether every seller of an expectant interest is to be treated as an expectant heir;
503 *and therefore he gave no opinion on that point. The question has not been adverted to in any other case, and is therefore one of the first impression in Virginia.

There would seem to be no greater reason for restricting the right of the owner of a reversion or vested remainder than of property in his actual possession. A reversion is an interest of value. It has its market price; it may be subjected to the claims of creditors; and the owner himself may make a valid sale at public auction, according to all the authorities. Yet, according to the doctrine of the recent English cases, every person entitled to such reversion or remainder is treated as an expectant heir, and in the language of Lord Thurlow in Gwynne v. Heaton, 1 Bro. C. C. 1, 9, "There is a policy in justice, protecting the person who has the expectancy, and reducing him to the situation of an infant, against the effects of his own conduct." It becomes, therefore, important to enquire into the principle upon which this doctrine, as applied to reversions and vested remainders, is supposed to rest, and to ascertain how far the policy on which it is founded is applicable to the condition of this country. If the doctrine grows out of a policy hostile to our system of government, and incompatible with the habits of our people, there can be no propriety, when not controlled by binding authority, in our following the more recent English cases.

The case of Twistleton v. Griffith, 1 P. Wms. R. 310, contains the first enunciation of a policy which at length has prevailed in the English courts. In that instance a vendor thirty-four years of age, married and the father of a family, was the owner of a remainder in tail after his father's death, who was old, and died two years after the sale. Lord Northington denied relief, yet upon a rehearing before Lord Jeffries, relief was granted; the chancellor declaring such bargains tended to the destruction of heirs sent to town 504 *for education, and to the destruction of families. That he saw no inconvenience in the objection, that at this rate an heir could not sell his reversion. This might force an heir to go home and submit to his father, or bite the bridle and endure some hardships; and in the mean time he might grow wiser and be reclaimed. This, which seems to be the leading case, was one in which the reverisoner occupied the position of heir, his father the owner of the life estate, being regarded as the head of the family.

In the next case, Cole v. Gibbons, 3 P. Wms. R. 290, where the policy of the rule was expounded, the plaintiff claimed a reversion by a bequest of his uncle: Lord Talbott said the cases of heirs were not in point; and because no heir was concerned, and he afterwards confirmed the sale, relief was denied. But the chancellor said, that as to the cases of expectant heirs, it was the policy of the nation to prevent a growing mischief to ancient families, that of seducing the heir apparent from a dependence on his ancestor, who would probably have supported him, and by feeding his extravagancies, tempting him in his father's lifetime, to sell the reversion of the estate which was settled upon him, for as much as it tended to the ruin of families.

Throughout the whole series of cases the policy announced in the two foregoing cases, of maintaining a due subordination to the head of the family and preventing the breaking up of family estates, seems to be the main foundation to the doctrine. Any person having a reversionary interest to dispose of, has, irrespective of his age, come to be classed with an expectant heir, and in the language of Lord Thurlow above quoted, reduced to the situation of an infant against the effect of his own conduct. This no doubt has arisen, in a great degree, from the situation of real property in England. Owing to their practice of 505 strict *settlements and the laws of entail, the parent or ancestor is generally a life tenant, and the expectant heir, a reversioner. Thus combining both characters, the courts for reasons of policy have applied principles adopted to protect the young and inexperienced expectant heir to the owners of reversions and remainders. The reasons of policy which have influenced the English courts, have but little application to this country. That due subordination to the head of the family upon which such stress is laid, and which the courts seek to enforce long after the heir has arrived at years of discretion, grows out of the division of ranks which prevails in that country. The political and social pre-eminence of the governing class must be maintained; and deference to the head of the family in all the relations of life, is one of the means by which a distinction of classes and gradation in society is kept up and preserved. The same consideration has operated to prevent the breaking up of estates. Titular rank, without wealth or position, soon ceases to command the respect of the community. To keep property in a particular line, restrictions are imposed upon the free alienation of real estate through the operation of their system of primogeniture, entails, and strict settlements; one of the consequences of which is to combine in almost every instance the character of reversioner with expectant heir; and hence the courts have assumed the extraordinary power to continue such reversioner in a state of pupilage long after he has arrived at years of discretion.

No such reasons exist for the recognition of such a doctrine here. The authority of the parent whilst the child is disabled to contract for himself, should be enforced by law; for the best security for the morality of the citizen is to be found by preserving unimpaired the family relations. But when legal control ceases the young man is 506 called upon by the habits of our *people, and his duty to the public, to act for himself in all the most important relations of life, uninfluenced by an abject deference to the opinions of others occupying no higher position in society than himself. Proper reverence is due at all times to the parent from the child; but when the latter has arrived at years of discretion, that respect becomes a moral obligation, which courts are not called upon to enforce. It will be more readily and cheerfully fulfilled when left to the free will of the child and the silent influence of a healthy public opinion, unaffected by legal restrictions upon his dominion over his property.

The policy of our country favors the free alienation of property, is adverse to large accumulations descending in a particular line, and by abolishing entail and primogeniture, encourages an equal distribution amongst all standing in the same relation to the common ancestor. As one of the consequences of our system, it is rarely the case that the reversioner combines the character of expectant heir. Such combination, we have seen, is the rule in England, which has led the courts to confound the reversioner with expectant heir, and to apply the same doctrine to both. In Virginia such combination is the exception. It is not often that the child under the control of the parent or ancestor, has a vested interest in his estate. Reversions usually arise after the death of the parent intestate, and most generally grow out of assignment of dower to the widow; and most remainders are created by the will of the parent making provision for his widow for life. A young man on attaining full age, frequently finds himself the actual owner of a vested remainder or reversion expectant on a life estate, and constituting the most valuable property belonging to him. A sale in such cases, in the dawn of manhood, for a moderate consideration, is most generally for the interest of the owner.
507 Judiciously invested, *or well improved in a country where the field for enterprise is so wide and inviting, it may lay the foundation of a fortune far exceeding the value of the whole fee simple when the life estate terminates.

By the English rule the owner of a reversion or vested remainder cannot derive benefit from his property by negotiating a private sale. He must either sell at public auction or hold on to the dry reversion until perhaps the decline of life. Unable to deal with it as with his other property, he is thrown into the hands of the speculator, who will indemnify himself for the hazard he runs in being called upon at some future day to show, by the vague opinion of witnesses, (whose testimony of former value will be insensibly influenced by the actual condition of things when they testify,) that the price was adequate at the time of the purchase.

Whatever principle may be adopted in reference to contracts with expectant heirs, secretly selling the chance of a parent's or some relation's bounty; it seems to me that the actual adult owner of a vested interest in property, whether in reversion or remainder, should not be reduced to the condition of pupilage from regard to any supposed rule of public policy, or for the purpose of extending to him any particular protection. No such rule of public policy exists in this country; and all attempts to fetter the action of the owner by restricting his power of alienation, operate injuriously to him. They lessen competition, and so depreciate the market price of his property. There is no valid reason for making this an exceptional case. The contracts of such reversioners or remaindermen, like all other contracts, if made by those competent to contract, if they are not gained by ill practice, nor made against the laws, should be kept.

This court in several instances has repudiated the doctrine of imputing fraud 508 as a matter of law. Davis *v. Turner, 4 Gratt. 422; Hutchison v. Kelly, 1 Rob. R. 123; Bank of Alexandria v. Patton, 1 Rob. R. 499. And the enquiry in reference to sales by reversioners or remaindermen, should be whether in the particular case actual fraud existed. Inadequacy of price, youth, inexperience, indebtedness, distress, are circumstances to be looked to and weighed in determining whether the bargain in the particular instance is not so unconscionable as to demonstrate some gross imposition, circumvention, or undue influence; and so to justify relief on the ground of fraud. In the absence of such proof of actual fraud, I do not think it is incumbent on the purchaser of such an expectant interest to make good the bargain, by showing that a full and adequate consideration was paid.

With respect to the consideration in contracts of this kind; it was observed by Lord Hardwicke, in Nichols v. Gould, 2 Ves. sen. 422, "That every purchase of this kind must be on the foot of great uncertainty as to the value." And he asks, "Will a court of equity, after the contingency has fallen out one way, enter into the consideration of the value?" Or, as was said by the Chief Baron in Griffith v. Spratley, 1 Cox's Cas. 383, "The value of a thing is what it will produce, and it admits of no precise standard. One man may sell his property for less than another would. He may sell under the pressure of circumstances, which may make a smaller price more beneficial than a greater price would have been under different circumstances. If courts of equity were to unravel all these transactions, they would throw every thing into confusion, and set afloat the contracts of mankind."

In the case under consideration, many of the witnesses deposed that in their opinion the price agreed to be paid was adequate. The testimony on both sides shows that about one thousand two 509 hundred dollars *would have been the full market price for the whole fee simple, if sold upon the usual terms of credit. Deducting one-third, four hundred dollars, the value of the widow's dower, and eight hundred dollars remain to be divided amongst the three heirs. A present interest of two hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six and two-thirds cents to each, with a reversion in four hundred dollars, the one-third expectant on the widow's life estate. This estimate, however, is made upon the market price of the property, supposing the whole fee simple could have been sold. But it was undivided, and from its nature probably not susceptible of equal division. The consent of the dowress would have been necessary to a sale of the whole, out and out. If she refused, and elected (as in all probability she would) to have her dower laid off, the assignment of dower in such a property would necessarily have materially impaired the market price of the residue.. Under such circumstances, the value of the interest sold by the appellee is at best conjectural. And therefore we need not be surprised that many of the witnesses examined, looking to the mere money value of the interest sold, thought the price to be adequate. The most that can be said is, that perhaps at the time of the sale the price was a low one; and in the event which has happened, that the purchaser has made a good bargain. The inadequacy is very far from being so gross as to shock the moral sense; and it has uniformly been held, that inadequacy of consideration between persons who stand upon precise and equal footing is in equity of no account, unless from its grossness it is of itself evidence of fraud.

As to the allegation that the appellant has withheld a portion of the hand payment, it might constitute an objection to the specific execution of the contract at the suit of the appellant, if the same had not been executed; but in this case the 510 contract has been executed *by the conveyance. And besides, the retention of a portion of the hand payment is satisfactorily accounted for. The proof shows that it was withheld with the consent of the appellee until some enquiry could be made into the condition of the intestate's estate.

Regarding the case as if the whole interest sold was reversionary, the most favorable aspect for the appellee under which it can be contemplated, he has, in my opinion, failed to make out a claim to relief either upon the law or the facts of the case. In reality, however, the bulk of the property sold was a present interest in the undivided two-thirds. The reversionary interest embraced only the one-third to which the widow would be entitled for life. The doctrine of the English courts as to sales of reversionary interests did not apply to the most valuable portion of the property. Even if the English rule were recognized as obligatory, it might still be questionable whether it should be extended to the purchase of such an interest, the larger portion of which was a present interest in the seller. But resting my judgment upon the broader ground before discussed, that the purchaser of such an expectant interest is not bound to show that the price given was adequate, when no fraud is imputed or proved, I do not deem it important to pursue this latter branch of the enquiry any farther.

I think the decree was erroneous, and should be reversed, and the bill dismissed. But as the case was one of the first impression, I think it should be dismissed without costs.

The other judges concurred in the result of the opinion of Allen, P.

Decree reversed.

New Trial—After-Discovered Evidence.—For the proposition that a new trial will not be granted on the grounds of newly-discovered evidence when the evidence is merely cumulative, the principal case is cited and followed in Brown v. Speyers, 20 Gratt. 308, and note.

Principal and Surety—Discharge of Surety.—In Poling v. Maddox, 41 W. Va. 786, 24 S. E. Rep. 1002, it is said: "Nor is the promise of Poling to put no more collections in the hands of Maddox binding, as he had the right to do so, and his promise was based on no consideration, and is like the promise of a creditor not to make his debtor pay, or like a promise to a surety to exonerate him, which does not bind. An agreement without consideration is no bar to legal rights. Mosby v. Leeds, 3 Call 439; Herm. Estop. § 1093; Harnsbarger's Adm'r v. Kinney, 13 Gratt. 511."

The principal case is also cited in Coffman v. Moore, 29 Gratt. 248, and cases cited; Sayre v. King, 17 W. Va. 574; Glenn v. Morgan, 23 W. Va. 469.

2. Same—Same—Defence Allowable at Law.—In such a case the surety seeks relief on the ground that the principal obligor had sold to the obligee a tract of land for three thousand dollars, which was to be credited on the bond, but that only two thousand five hundred dollars had been so credited. This defense might have been made at law, and is no ground of relief.
3. Same—Same—Case at Bar.—The surety further charges that the obligee agreed upon the sale and purchase of said land, to release the sureties; but although there is proof that pending the negotiation, the obligee said he would take a bond for the balance from the principal obligor with his sons as sureties, and would wait with him for the money during his life, upon his paying the interest, and it was also proved that the principal obligor was anxious to relieve his sureties, yet in the final execution of the contract nothing having been provided to carry out the arrangement, and the obligee retaining the old bond, credited with the price of the land, and obligor paying interest upon it, there is no ground for relief on that account.
4. Same—Same—Same.—The principal obligor having been remiss in paying the interest upon the bond promptly, as he was required to do, on two occasions when he sent an agent to pay the interest due, directed him to pay the interest up to the period when the interest would next become due. This, however, was voluntary on his part, and not required by the obligee; but endorsements of the payments were made upon the bond. This is no ground of relief to the surety.

This case is a sequel to that of Harnsbarger's adm'r against Kinney, reported 6 Grattan 287. When the cause went back, Kinney filed his bill in the Circuit court of Augusta county, to enjoin the judgment upon various grounds; the first of 512 which was of after discovered *evidence. After stating the execution of the bond of April 1821, by Moses McCue and John H. Hyde to Addison Hyde, and its assignment to Harnsbarger, he charged that Harnsbarger knew that it was an accommodation bond, and that with that knowledge he discounted it at ten per cent. by the assignment of other bonds to Addison Hyde, which, at the same time and in his presence, were assigned by Hyde to McCue; and that Harnsbarger knew that Hyde had no right to them, but that they were intended to be assigned to McCue. He stated that since the last trial of the cause he had discovered most important evidence, which by no diligence could he have discovered before; since he had knowledge of no fact or circumstance to direct enquiry to it. That on the trials at law it was clearly proved by Addison Hyde that the said bond was an accommodation bond, and that Harnsbarger knew this at the time of the assignment to him; "but there was a failure of proof satisfactory to the court or jury, as it would seem from the result, to show that he gave less for it than its par value, which if proved would have made the transaction clearly usurious and void." That soon after the decision of the cause in the Court of appeals he had discovered for the first time, that a certain Overton Gibson would have been a material witness for him on the trial, to prove that the transaction out of which the bond grew was usurious. That said Gibson was frequently at the house of Harnsbarger about the date of the old bond from McCue and John H. Hyde to Addison Hyde, of the 30th of April 1821, in consideration of which the bond on which the judgment was rendered was given; and often heard from Harnsbarger the history of the circumstances connected with the execution of said bond. That Harnsbarger had informed Gibson that McCue had applied to him for a loan of money; that McCue had agreed to take bonds, and allow Harnsbarger to 513 shave his bond at a *large discount, and pay for it in bonds. And that Harnsbarger had informed said Gibson that he made by said exchange some three or four hundred dollars; which he said was a good day's work.

Other grounds for the injunction were, that the land sold by McCue to Harnsbarger and conveyed to Hamilton, was extorted from McCue at about half its value, under the pressure of his embarrassments, and when he was in a state of mind which partially if not entirely incapacitated him for the transaction of business. That there was an actual contract on the sale of said land, that if McCue would let Harnsbarger have it at a certain price Harnsbarger would release his securities; which condition was performed, and the contract of release thereby consummated. That Harnsbarger also agreed that if the interest on the balance of the debt remaining after the sale of the land, was punctually paid, he would indulge the said McCue, without the privity or consent of said securities; which latter condition was also performed for many years afterwards, whereby said securities were deprived of their bill quia timet. The prayer of the bill was for an injunction to the judgment; for a new trial; and for general relief. And the injunction was granted.

Harnsbarger's administrator answered, denying all knowledge of the usury, extortion or agreements for release of the securities or for delay, charged in the bill. The facts stated in the bill as to Harnsbarger's statement of the circumstances attending the execution of the first bond, and the profit which Harnsbarger made on the discount of the bond, were testified to by Overton Gibson; and his statement of the discount of the bond at ten per cent. was also testified to by Richard Gibson. There was also evidence as to the sale and purchase of the land, and the condition of McCue at the time.

514 *The cause came on in February 1853 upon a motion to dissolve the injunction, when the court declining at that time to express any opinion as to the claim of the plaintiff to the relief prayed for on any of the four grounds stated in his bill, nevertheless rejected the motion to dissolve the injunction, and gave the plaintiff leave to amend his bill, and put in issue another ground of relief appearing from the endorsements on the bond.

In pursuance of the leave given, the plaintiff filed an amended bill, in which he charged that Harnsbarger on the first of April 1833, did for a valuable consideration, contract and agree with McCue the principal debtor, to receive the interest in advance upon the bond upon which the judgment had been obtained against the plaintiff as surety for McCue; and that in pursuance of that agreement said Harnsbarger did on that day actually receive from McCue the sum of one hundred and eighty dollars which would have fallen due on said bond on the last day of April next thereafter. And in like manner said Harnsbarger did, on the 20th of November 1834, make another agreement with said McCue based upon valuable consideration, by which he agreed to receive from said McCue payment on account of interest not then due upon said bond; and accordingly he did on that day receive the sum of one hundred and twenty-seven dollars from McCue, that being the amount of interest on said bond to the 10th of April next thereafter; both of which payments said Harnsbarger caused to be endorsed on said bond. And the plaintiff averred that all this was without his knowledge or consent; and that in pursuance of said agreements said Harnsbarger did extend the day of payment to McCue from the dates of said payment up to the periods when the interest so paid in advance fell due; and that this giving time was without the consent of the plaintiff.

515 *The administrator answered the amended bill. He denied that any contract for indulgence or stay of suit was made between Harnsbarger and McCue, at the time the endorsements referred to in the bill were made on said bond. He said that the endorsements were made by Moses H. McCue, the son and agent of Moses McCue; that on neither occasion was there any contract for further indulgence on the bond; and that the bond was at the time due, and both the principal and interest were demandable of all the obligors in the bond. He alleged further that Harnsbarger was particular in requiring prompt payment of interest due him; and that McCue having been in arrear in that respect, when Moses H. McCue was sent to make said payments he was instructed, in consideration of the previous long delay in paying interest, to make the payment large enough to cover the interest for the current year. That this was the voluntary act of Moses McCue, not required or demanded by Harnsbarger; and that it was done without any stipulation or understanding that Harnsbarger should wait one moment if he chose to sue, or was required by the sureties therein to sue, on said bond.

Moses H. McCue was examined as a witness; and he sustained the statements of the answer. He stated that the endorsements on the bond were made by himself, and that the payments had been made by him as the agent of his father at the house of Harnsbarger: And he sustained the statements in the answer, expressly negativing any contract or agreement for delay; and stating that the payments were voluntary on the part of McCue, made because of his previous delays in the payment of interest, and to keep Harnsbarger in a good humor, in the hope that he would not press for the payment of the principal of the debt.

516 *The endorsements on the bond referred to in the bill and answer, were as follows:

April 1st, 1833.—Paid this day $180, being the amount of interest till 10th of April next. M. H. McC.

November 20th, 1834.—Paid this day $127, being the amount of interest on this note, down to the 10th of April next.

M. H. McCue.

The last payment made previous to these was April 16th, 1831, when the interest for three years was paid.

The cause came on to be finally heard in June 1854, when the court perpetuated the injunction. Whereupon Harnsbarger's administrator applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Stuart and H. W. Sheffey, for the appellant.

Michie and Baldwin, for the appellee.

SAMUELS, J. A plaintiff who comes into a court of equity asking the new trial of an issue at law, on the ground of having discovered evidence after the trial, must show that he has not been guilty of laches in making the discovery; that the evidence is material to the issue; that it is not merely cumulative, or in addition to other evidence of like import heard at the trial. In the view I take of this part of the case, it is not necessary to consider any question other than the one whether the newly discovered evidence is cumulative, or whether it be such that no evidence of like substance was heard by the jury which tried the case. It was incumbent on the plaintiff to make out his case in all its material parts; he should have shown what newly discovered evidence he proposed to offer on a new trial; also what evidence had 517 been offered *at the former trial, to the end that the court might see that the new evidence was not of the like substance and import with any portion of that already heard. The plaintiff in this case in his bill alleges that upon the former trial it was proved, "that the said bond of three thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars was an accommodation bond, and that said Harnsbarger knew it to be so, but there was a failure of proof satisfactory to the court or jury, as it would seem from the result, to show that he gave less for it than its par value, which, if proven, would have made the transaction clearly usurious and void." This is not an allegation that no proof as to the particular fact stated had been offered, but only that the proof was "not satisfactory to the court or jury."

Digitized by Google

This is not enough to justify the interference of the court; for in every instance in which the jury finds against a party who has offered proof to establish a fact or a series of connected facts to sustain the issue on his part, it is because the evidence is not satisfactory to the jury. The plaintiff seems to have been wholly intent upon proving in this case the usury alleged in defense, and to have omitted the plain duty, required by his case, of showing either that there was no proof at all, or no proof on which a jury might have acted, in regard to the fact he now seeks to prove by the newly discovered evidence. He has utterly failed to meet the exigency of his case, by showing that the evidence is not merely cumulative.

In the argument here, the counsel on both sides relied upon the record in the suit at law, of which the evidence at the trial is made a part. I do not perceive that this record has been made part of the record in the chancery cause (now before us) whilst in the Circuit court; and it cannot therefore be properly looked into. If it were otherwise, I would say that proof of precisely the same import as that now proposed to be offered, was heard on the trial 518 at law; and that the *new evidence is merely cumulative. Thus I am of opinion no new trial of the issue on the plea of usury should be directed.

The appellee seeks relief upon the further ground that his principal McCue in his lifetime had sold to Harnsbarger, the appellant's intestate, a tract of land at the price of three thousand dollars, to be applied as a credit to the bond on which the judgment was obtained; and that credit was not given for this price, but only for two thousand five hundred and twenty dollars, part thereof. Without stopping to comment upon the defects of the appellee's proof of the fact alleged, or on the probable application of a portion of the price to another debt from McCue to Harnsbarger, it is enough to say that this is a defense which, if well founded, might have been made on the trial at law, and that no reason is shown for the failure to make it there.

The appellee seeks relief upon the further ground that the contract by which McCue sold to Harnsbarger the tract of land already mentioned, was extortionate and unconscionable, and wrung from the fear and distress of the debtor by his grasping creditor. If this were all true as alleged, it is impossible to perceive how the appellee can found thereon any claim to relief in this case. At a proper time and between proper parties it might have been a question fit to be investigated whether the contract of sale should be rescinded; yet this would afford no relief to the appellee whose obligation existed before the sale; he could not claim to have a new and different contract established, and credit for a larger amount placed on the bond.

The appellee seeks relief upon the further ground that by the contract for sale of land above mentioned, the sureties Kinney and Sowers were to be discharged from all liability; and further that Harnsbarger should indulge McCue for the balance of the debt as long as Harnsbarger should live.
519 These grounds for relief are *not, nor is either of them, established by proof. It is shown that pending the negotiation for the sale Harnsbarger did say that if McCue would sell the land on certain terms, McCue should never be troubled for the balance due on the bond whilst his (Harnsbarger's) head "was hot;" that Harnsbarger offered to take a new bond for the balance with McCue's sons as sureties, but that it was not given; that McCue was anxious to relieve his sureties; that the deed was executed, and two thousand five hundred and twenty dollars credited on the bond. There is no proof whatever as to any thing said or agreed upon when the contract was finally consummated, and in the final execution of the contract the parties were aided by others who were fully competent to put their agreement into an authentic form. In the absence of proof to the contrary, we must hold that the bond still retained by Harnsbarger, with the credit endorsed but in nowise changed beyond placing the credit on it, showed all that was agreed to be done in regard to the bond or the parties to it; that the written evidence of what was done contains every thing upon which the parties had agreed.

The several grounds of relief above mentioned were not passed upon by the Circuit court. The decree of that court, it would seem, is founded upon the allegation in the amended bill, that Harnsbarger, on two occasions, without the consent of the surety, did agree to receive from McCue the principal a sum of money as interest on the bond in advance of the time at which the interest was payable; and that the interest on these several occasions was so prepaid and endorsed on the bond. The endorsements are found upon the bond giving credit for money paid for interest which was thereafter to accrue. The evidence of a witness proves that the money above mentioned was paid by him as the agent of McCue; that Harnsbarger did not require such prepayment, and that there was 520 no express *contract for indulgence in consideration thereof; that McCue was in pecuniary embarrassment, and that forbearance on the part of Harnsbarger was very desirable; that he had at times suffered the interest to fall in arrear, at which Harnsbarger was dissatisfied; that the prepayments were voluntary on the part of McCue, as well for the purpose of quieting Harnsbarger as of making amends for defaults in payment of interest at other times; that these were the motives which prompted McCue to make the payments in advance, but Harnsbarger was not informed of those motives.

Although it is not expressly stated in the decree of the Circuit court upon what ground the relief was granted, yet there is enough to show that it was upon the ground last stated.

It must be conceded that the doctrine of equitable releases to sureties is too firmly settled in Virginia by the decisions of this court to be again drawn in question; that an agreement for valuable consideration between a creditor and a principal debtor, whereby the creditor, without the consent of the surety, contracts to forbear for a definite time the collection of his debt, is, in equity, a release of the surety, cannot now be doubted. Yet when the attempt is made to bring a case of different facts within the principle of those decisions, we may well look into the principle itself to see whether its intrinsic justice and conformity with the general principles of equity require that it should be extended to a new class of cases. The decisions heretofore made have all proceeded upon the theory that by the contract for forbearance the surety would be subjected to liability for a longer time than that prescribed in his original obligation; that his right of substitution to the rights and remedies of the creditor would be impaired in case he paid the debt; and especially because the surety is thereby prevented from resorting to a bill quia timet, or a notice to the 521 *creditor to collect the debt. An agreement between creditor and debtor for forbearance is no bar to an action at law, unless it be a covenant never to sue, which is equivalent to a release to the party with whom the covenant is made. Regarding the subject as the courts of law regard it, a contract for indulgence would not delay a suit for the debt, and the surety might avail himself of his remedies to enforce the collection thereof, and thus obtain exoneration from liability. Ward v. Johnson, 6 Munf. 6; Steptoe's adm'rs v. Harvey's ex'ors, 7 Leigh 501; Devers v. Ross, 10 Gratt. 252.

Courts of equity, however, do interfere in any case in which the creditor and principal debtor, without the assent of the surety, make a contract for a consideration, however small, to delay the collection of the debt for a time, however short,' and as it seems, relieve the surety; and this without enquiring whether the obligation of the surety has been varied in any appreciable degree, or whether his remedies, for all practical purposes, have remained unimpaired. This doctrine is founded upon the hypothesis that the principal debtor might enjoin a suit brought in violation of the contract for indulgence, and thus specifically enforce that contract. If there be no surety, a contract for indulgence would be enforced in equity only in a case in which the general principles of the court require that such relief should be given; that is, in case adequate relief may not be had at law: yet, if a surety be bound, then the debtor is held to have the right, in all cases, to enjoin until the delay contracted for has been enjoyed; and the surety is thereby held to be discharged because of the change in his obligation, and the suspension of remedies whereby he might have sought exoneration. See 2 Rob. Prac. (old ed.) 134, and the cases there cited.

The case before us differs from all
522 others decided in *this court, in this, that no promise for indulgence was expressly given or contracted for; that the debtor having been in default in paying the interest theretofore due, made these prepayments as in some sort a compensation for his former remissness; and further in the hope of propitiating the creditor to give future indulgence. From these facts the attempt is made to imply a contract that Harnsbarger should postpone the collection of the debt to the time when the principal of his debt should have earned the interest so paid in advance. I am of opinion that such implication is strained and unjust, and at variance with the facts as shown in evidence.

In the argument here the counsel cited many cases decided in different courts on the question whether the isolated fact of prepayment of interest on a debt already due would of itself justify the implication of a contract for indulgence, whereby sureties would be entitled to a release in equity. Some of these cases are in conflict; others of them were decided upon the peculiar laws of the states in which they were made, and could afford no aid in the decision of a case in this state. Not regarding this as a case of that kind, I deem it unnecessary to consider the question. It is the duty of the court to declare the law upon the case as it stands, and not as it would be if some of the facts did not appear therein. It will be the time to decide this much controverted question when it shall arise in some case depending for its decision upon the solution thereof.

I am of opinion to reverse the decree, to dissolve the injunction, and dismiss the bill.

The other judges concurred in the result.

Decree reversed.

1. Tax Sales—Report of Surveyor—Duty of Court to Admit to Record.—It is the duty of a County court,

Tax Sales—Report of Surveyor—Duty of Court to Admit to Record—Mandamus.—For the proposition that the admission of the surveyor's report to record is purely ministerial and the county court may be made to admit it by mandamus proceedings, the principal case is cited and approved in the following cases: Doolittle v. County Court, 28 W. Va. 174; Paul v. Baugh, 85 Va. 961, 9 S. E. Rep. 329; Forqueran v. Donnally, 7 W. Va. 138, 145; Hays v. Heatherly, 36 W. Va. 631, 15 S. E. Rep. 229; Page v. acting under the Code, ch. 37, § 15, p. 203, in relation to land sold for taxes, to admit the report of the surveyor to record, if it conforms to the act. And the court has no authority to enquire into the regularity or validity of the sale made by the sheriff.

2. Same — Same — Same — Mandamus. — The Circuit court may proceed by mandamus to compel the County court to admit the report of the surveyor to record.

This was a mandamus issued by the Circuit court of Randolph county, on the motion of Hamilton Stalnaker, to the justices of the County court of Randolph, requiring them to admit to record the report of the surveyor of the county in relation to a tract of land sold by the sheriff for the taxes due upon it. The facts are stated by Judge Allen in his opinion. The Circuit court awarded a peremptory mandamus; and the justices thereupon applied to one of the judges of this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Hoffman, for the appellants.
Price, for the appellee.

ALLEN, P. The sheriff of Randolph county having sold a tract of land in said county on the 24th of September 1850 for the nonpayment of taxes due 524 *thereon, the appellee became the purchaser, as appears by the list of sales returned by the sheriff, and received from the sheriff his receipt for the price. The sale was of the entire tract; and on the 29th of June 1853 the surveyor of the county made a report in pursuance of the act found in the Code, ch. 37, § 15, p. 203; and the appellee moved the court to have it recorded. The motion was continued; and at the July term the appellee renewed his motion to have the report admitted to record. Certain persons appeared and resisted the motion; and the court being of opinion there was objection to the recording of the report, entered an order that the same be not recorded. The appellee excepted to the opinion and decision of the court, spreading the facts proved on the record; and afterwards presented his petition to the Circuit court of said county referring to and making the record and proceedings of the County court on the motion to record the surveyor's report, part of his petition, and asking for a mandamus to compel the County court to record the report.

A rule in the nature of a mandamus nisi was awarded; to which the County court made return, declining to order the surveyor's report to be recorded, for causes assigned.

The first, that the deputy sheriff who sold the land was at the time of the sale interested in the purchase; there being an agreement between him and the purchaser that he should have half of the land purchased, and that the purchase was made in pursuance of such agreement. Second, that the report was made by the surveyor on information derived from said purchasers, and does not set out the owners of adjoining lands. And in the third place, that the land had been redeemed by a payment to the clerk of the county, by whom the return does not show, on the 19th of August 1852; and also by a tender to the appellee on 525 the 31st *of October 1853, by the agent of parties claiming to be the equitable owners of the land, of the amount paid by the appellee, with interest at the rate of 10 per centum per annum, up to the time of the tender.

The Circuit court deeming the return insufficient, awarded a peremptory mandamus; from which decision the justices have appealed to this court.

The principal questions presented by the record have been settled by the decision of this court in the case of Delaney v. Goddin, 12 Gratt. 266. That case was elaborately argued and maturely considered; and all the judges were of opinion that the authority of the County court was limited to the enquiry whether the report of the surveyor is in conformity with the provisions of the section under which it is made; and if free from objection in this respect, it becomes the imperative duty of the court to order the report to be recorded. And a majority of the court held, that in passing on such question the County court is vested with no judicial power, but acts in a capacity purely ministerial; and that an error in refusing to order the report of the surveyor to be recorded, can only be corrected by mandamus.

The objections growing out of the alleged complicity of the sheriff with the purchaser, or whether the taxes and damages and cost of survey, where a survey was made, were paid by a party authorized by law to redeem, to the proper party and within the proper time, are matters not appearing on the report or the list of sales, or any thing connected therewith. The proper determination of them would involve enquiries into matters of law and fact, which the County court, acting ministerially and in this ex parte proceeding, cannot, in conformity with the decision in the case referred to, enter into. The survey and report returned by the surveyor describes the land with great particularity, referring to nu-
526 merous natural objects, *and naming many individuals through whose lands or near to whose lands or houses the lines of the tract in question passed. But he further certifies there are no lands owned known to adjoin the above named tract. The object of the report and survey is to give such description of the lands sold as

*Code, ch. 37, § 15, p. 203. "When also an entire tract of land is sold, and not redeemed within the said two years, the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, at his or their expense, shall have a report made by the surveyor of the county to the court thereof, specifying the metes and bounds of the land sold, and the names of the owners of the adjoining tracts; and giving any such further description of the land sold as will identify the same; and the County court, unless it see some objection to such report, shall order the same to be recorded."

will identify them. Specifying the metes and bounds and the names of the owners of adjoining tracts is the mode pointed out to identify them. The description given does identify the land by the lines as surveyed and the calls for all the other objects set out in the report. The survey is for the benefit of the purchaser, and can affect the rights of no other person. The materiality of a survey is apparent when made under the 14th section of the act, which provides for a survey where but part of a tract is sold, and directs how it shall be made; but where the whole tract is sold, the only effect of the survey is to furnish the purchaser with such a description as may identify the land. The surveyor must report such facts as may serve to describe and identify it. He acts officially, and cannot report the names of the owners of adjoining tracts, if they are not known to him. Whether other tracts do adjoin or not, might involve enquiries as to the boundaries of those tracts and an attempt to try questions without having the parties before the court, and without the means of arriving at a correct conclusion. I think the report comes up to the requisitions of the statute, and gives such a description of the land sold as will identify the same, and it was the duty of the court to order it to be recorded.

I think the judgment should be affirmed with thirty dollars damages and costs.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, P.

Judgment affirmed.

527 Marlow v. Bell's Lessee.

July Term, 1856, Lewisburg.

Land Patents—Calls for Natural Objects—Courses and Distances—Repugnancy.*—A patent of S calls to commence at a certain point admitted to be a corner of M's survey, and to run with his line a certain course and distance to a white oak corner of C; and thence with C's line a certain course and distance to another corner of C. Following the first call, it comes to a white oak corner of M, but not the corner of C; but to get to C's corner, the line must leave the second corner of M at nearly right angles and run seventy-nine poles, not running on the line of either M or C for this distance. The call for the line of M will, under the circumstances, be considered the correct call; and S's patent will be held to include all the land up to the line of M.

*Land Patents—Calls for Natural Objects—Courses and Distances.—Repugnancy.—In Clarkston v. Va. Coal, etc., Co., 93 Va. 260, 24 S. E. Rep. 987, it is said: "Where such repugnancy exists, the general rule is that both course and distance must give away to natural or permanent objects or monuments, and courses must be varied and distances lengthened or shortened so as to conform to the natural or permanent objects or monuments called for by the grant or survey. Dogan v. Seekright, 4 H. & M. 125; Baker v. Seekright, 1 H. & M. 177; Coles v. Wooding, 2 Pat. & H. 189; Smith v. Davis, 4 Gratt. 50; and Marlow v. Bell's Lessee, 13 Gratt. 527."

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of Ohio county by Bell's lessee v. Marlow. The plaintiff claimed under a patent to Moses Shepherd, dated the 24th of August 1803, for fourteen hundred and forty-one acres of land lying on the waters of Little Wheeling creek in the county of Ohio. The defendant claimed under a patent bearing date the 1st day of March 1831, for sixty acres. The only question in the cause was whether the patent under which the plaintiff claimed included the land claimed by the defendant under his patent.

It appears that prior to the patent to Shepherd, Robert McCoy owned a tract of land of four hundred acres, which lies north of the land patented to Shepherd; and Samuel McConnell owned a tract of four hundred acres, which lies east of Shepherd's tract. Shepherd in his survey and patent calls for two lines of McCoy's patent. The first of these calls is for a line running S. 24 E. 170 poles, to a chestnut oak corner to Robert McCoy. This, it was agreed, was at the point G, in the accompanying 528 diagram. The second was, *"Thence with his line, N. 75 E. 265 poles to a white oak corner to Samuel McConnell. The next call was," thence with his lines S. 16 E. 180 poles to a white oak.

The beginning corner of McCoy's survey was at a white oak at H; and the call in his survey for the line from G to H is N. 75 E. 265 poles. The survey made in the cause makes the call N. 77 E. 280 poles. It was agreed that I and K were true corners of McConnell's survey; and that the line I K was a true line of that survey. The call in the survey for that line was, Thence S. 16 E. 180 poles to a large white oak. The survey made in the cause makes the distance 183 poles. It was agreed that K was a corner of Shepherd's survey: And it was agreed that the lines and corners G H I represent the true lines and corners of the survey made for the defendant. The line H I was the line, and they were the corners of a survey made in 1818 for Hugh McCutcheon, lying on the east of that line.

For the lines G, H, I and K, see diagram.

Upon the trial the parties dispensed with a jury, and submitted the cause to the court; and there was a judgment for the plaintiff. Whereupon the defendant Marlow applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Russell, for the appellant, insisted that in running the line of Shepherd's patent from the point G, one part of the descriptive call must necessarily be abandoned; as it was impossible to go by one line from the corner at G to McConnell's corner at I and follow McCoy's line, which ran to H and there stopped. And therefore as McConnell's corner at I was well known, and was called for, it was more reasonable to calling for McCoy's line, than in calling for McConnell's corner. He referred to Hiscocks v. Hiscocks, 5 Mees. & Welsb. 363; Taylor's devisees v. Burnsides, 1 Gratt. 165, 201; Greenl. Jacob, for the appellee, insisted on the converse of the proposition. He referred to Johnson v. McMillan, 1 Strobh. Law R. 143; White v. Gay, 9 N. Hamp. R. 126; Hall v. Gittings, 2 Har. & John. 112; Jackson v. Hudson, 3 John. R. 375; Shultz v. Young, 3 Ired. Law R. 385; Carroll v. Norwood, 5 Har. & John. 155; Pennington v. Bordley, 4 Id. 457; Cox v. Couch, 8 Barr. R. 147; Jarrot v. McIlvaine, 1 Rich. R. 14; Hull v. Fuller, 7 Verm. R. 100; Law v. Hempstead, 10 Conn. R. 23.

ALLEN, P. Upon the trial of this ejectment, the controversy turned upon the construction of the description of the land contained in the grant under which the lessor of the defendant in error claimed. That grant is dated in 1803; the grant under which the plaintiff in error claimed, bears date on the 1st of March 1831. This action was commenced in 1839. If, therefore, the descriptive calls of the grant to the person under whom the defendant in error claims, embrace the land in controversy, judgment was properly rendered in his favor.

The grant to Moses Shepherd for one thousand four hundred and forty-one acres, under which the defendant in error claims, after setting out several lines and corners about which there was no dispute, and 530 all of *which it was agreed by the parties in the agreement of facts filed, are correctly laid down and designated in the plat and report made out and returned in the cause by A. P. Woods, surveyor; called at the point G on said plat for a chestnut oak corner to Robert McCoy, about which or the fact of its being McCoy's corner there is no controversy; both parties claiming and calling for it as McCoy's corner in their respective grants. From this admitted corner of McCoy, Shepherd's patent proceeds as follows: "Thence with his line N. 75 E. 265 poles to a white oak corner to Samuel McConnell. Thence with his lines S. 16 E. 180 poles to a white oak, conceded to be at K on the diagram. This last line terminating at K is a line in the patent to McConnell called for in his grant as beginning at McConnell's white oak corner admitted to be at letter I on the diagram, and running from the white oak at I, S. 16 E. 180 poles to the white oak at K. McConnell's corner at I is distant 79 poles from the termination of McCoy's line with which Shepherd calls to run, and at the end of which he calls for the white oak as a corner to Samuel McConnell: The corner of McConnell at I is nearly at right angles with the end of McCoy's line. To reach the corner of McConnell at K, the next call of Shepherd's grant, the line must be extended 79 poles; and instead of running with McConnell's lines throughout the whole extent, it would run for 79 poles through land vacant at the time until it reached McConnell's corner at I; and from I it would run with his line to K.

The defendant in error contends, that the true boundary of Shepherd's grant was the line of McCoy's grant, for the whole of which he called, and from the termination of the line, the correct boundary is to be ascertained by running nearly at right angles with McCoy's line to the first corner of McConnell at I, and continuing on the course called for with McConnell's line from I to K.

531 *The plaintiff in error insists, that the true boundary of Shepherd's grant is a straight line from the point G, called for as McCoy's corner, the agreed point of departure, to McConnell's white oak corner at I; and thence with McConnell's line as called for, S. 16 E. 180 poles, to the corner at K; thus departing entirely from McCoy's line as called for by Shepherd, and materially changing the course and distance. The line in question, as called for both by McCoy and Shepherd, being N. 75 E. 265 poles, found on actual survey to be N. 77 E. 280 poles, a difference of two degrees in course and fifteen poles in distance. Whereas the straight line is found on actual survey to be N. 88 E. 305 poles; a variation of thirteen degrees in course and an increase of forty poles in distance.

It is not controverted in argument, that where notorious land marks, as corner trees or natural objects, are called for, they are to be regarded as termini, and a straight line is to be run from one terminus to the other, without respect to course or distance. The case of Smith v. Davis, 4 Gratt. 50, recognizes this as a general rule. But though this be the true rule where no other call is found in the grant but the call to run from one terminus to another, there certainly may be other calls which show the line was not intended to be a straight line; as where a call is to run with a river or a public road from one terminus to another, the stream or road, if it leads to the other terminus, must be followed, though it may diverge from a direct line between the two points. The same rule would apply to a marked line, if there was enough to show that such line, though not a direct line, was intended as the boundary; provided by following the marked line the other terminus can be reached. The difficulty in this case grows out of the fact that by following the line of McCoy's grant from the corner at G to the end thereof, as called for in Shepherd's grant, though a 532 *white oak corner is found at the termination of the line of McCoy, it is not the white oak corner of S. McConnell, as called for. That corner is not found at the end of the McCoy line, or in the direction of it, but nearly at right angles with the end of said line and seventy-nine poles distant from it. If a direct line in legal construction, in the absence of proof of an actual survey on the ground, between the two termini is to be adopted, then the call to run with McCoy's line throughout its whole extent must be rejected. But by following the line as called for to its termination, and then running the next line by McConnell's corner at I to the corner at K, the call for McConnell's corner is reached, though not in the direct line as called for. It may be remarked, that there is no direct evidence in the record of any actual surveying on the ground when the original survey of Shepherd was made. And it is just as fair to presume he knew where McCoy's line was as that he knew the position of McConnell's corner. I think, indeed, it is the fair inference, deduced from the calls in the different surveys and the facts agreed, that he was much more likely to have known the position of the line than the corner. He was causing a survey to be made of waste and unappropriated land. He saw a large body of such land bounded in several places by the lines of previous grants. His survey calls to begin on a corner of Samuel Buchanan, and to run thence with his lines. It calls elsewhere for a corner of William Shepherd, and to run with a line of his survey. It afterwards runs with two lines of McCoy, and with two lines of the McConnell grant. Seeing the body of land he was about locating and surveying was bounded to a considerable extent on the western, northern and eastern sides by older grants or surveys, it was natural he should call for them. The land was vacant along the lines called for; and as he adopts the lines of McCoy

533 *where he runs with them throughout the whole distance, and precisely as they are found in McCoy's grant, it is manifest he intended to appropriate the vacant land up to McCoy's line, and to make his line the boundary of his tract on that side as far as it extended.

The land law, 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 328, § 30, provides that the surveyor, at the time of making a survey, shall leave no open lines, but shall see the same plainly bounded by marked trees, except where a water course or ancient marked line shall be the boundary. It thus appears that the law regards an ancient marked line as sufficiently notorious to dispense with any further survey. It does not appear that the line of McCoy was marked. The corners, however, are found at each end, proving that it was actually run and probably marked; and it is admitted to be McCoy's line, and both parties call for it at the place designated in the plat. It is clear that McCoy's survey was before Shepherd when his survey was made; and from calling for the corners at each end of the line, the reasonable presumption is that he knew where the line was, and intended to call for it as his northern boundary in this portion of the survey. McCoy's line terminated at a white oak corner; and he called for a white oak, but by mistake supposing McConnell to corner on the same tree, and intending to run with two of his lines, he called for it as McConnell's corner. There is no mistake as to the object called for, a white oak, or as to the position of the white oak at the termination of McCoy's line. I think the object so called for must, in legal construction, be regarded as one of the land marks to which the party has a right to go, although he was mistaken in supposing it to be the corner of McConnell's survey. The line called for was called for as the boundary, and the object at which it terminates limits its extent in that direction. It shows the distance to 534 which the boundary *extends in the direction of the line called for; and if McConnell's corner be not found at the termination of the distance, yet by stopping at the distance called for and then running to the object and so by it to the next corner, effect is given in a measure to every call of the grant, and certainly much less violence is done to the calls than if that which is most material should be entirely disregarded. The case of Shultz v. Young, 3 Ired. R. 385, was similar in all its circumstances to the present. There the deed called to run south with A B's line 310 poles to C D's old corner. A B's line did not reach the corner, but at the end of A B's line it was necessary to run at right angles to reach C D's corner. It was held that the line should be run 310 poles on A B's line and then a straight line to C D's old corner, as that best conformed to the description of the deed, though it was necessary to run two lines instead of the one called for.

The court was of opinion that there were manifest and strong reasons for believing that the line called for was well known to the parties: And so believing, determined that the call for the terminus should not overrule the rest of the description. It is equally manifest from the calls of this grant, that the locator here knew that the waste land he was appropriating was bounded in part by older surveys; that he knew the general position of these surveys and where the lines run; that the surveys were before him, and that he intended to adopt and did adopt the lines of such surveys where called for, precisely as they had been run originally, and to make them the boundaries of his survey. And these things being so, it seems to me the call for McCoy's line cannot be rejected. I think therefore that the judgment of the Circuit court should be affirmed.

The other judges concurred.

received a paper as evidence without the knowledge or consent of one of the parties to the arbitration, though they say that their opinions were formed before it was received, their award is void.

John Jenkins died prior to June 1835, after having made his will, which was duly admitted to probat in the County court of Preston county. By his will, after giving to his wife for her life a part of the tract of land on which he lived, and to his son Jonathan Jenkins, the land on which he lived, which was a part of the first tract, he says: "Thirdly. The lands I now live on, exclusive of that which I have bequeathed to my son Jonathan Jenkins, I give and bequeath to John Smith my son in law and Rebecca Smith, my daughter, after my wife's decease, fully to be possessed and enjoyed by them during their natural lives; and after their decease to fall to their son, John Jenkins Smith. And in case of his death, the land is to fall to the rest of John Smith and Rebecca Smith's children." The land devised in this third clause of the will is stated in the bill to be between one hundred and fifty and one hundred and sixty acres.

In March 1836 John Smith and wife and John Jenkins Smith and wife united in a deed, by which they conveyed to Jonathan and Graham Jenkins all their interest in the land devised to them by John Jenkins, and covenanted to warrant the land against their respective heirs.

John Jenkins Smith died in 1841,
536 in the lifetime of *John Smith and his wife, leaving a widow and two children. John Smith survived his wife and died in 1853, leaving several children, and real estate which, exclusive of his widow's dower, was valued at his death at nine hundred dollars; and which pending this suit was valued at one thousand four hundred dollars.

In February 1854 Abraham Liston, who had married a daughter of John Smith, and Jonathan and Graham Jenkins, entered into a mutual bond, in which, reciting that there was a controversy between them concerning the will of John Jenkins and the purchase of real estate, they submitted the said controversy to the arbitrament of three persons named, or any two of them; and convenanted to abide by their award, in the penalty of two thousand dollars.

Two of the arbitrators on the 22d of February 1854 made an award in the case, by which they awarded that Jonathan and Graham Jenkins were to keep the farm, by paying to Abraham Liston seven hundred dollars, in specified payments: Or if they should be unwilling to keep it upon these terms, and should express said unwillingness by 6 A. M. on the next Friday, then they awarded the farm to Liston, upon condition of his paying the above sum of seven hundred dollars in the manner specified.

Within the time specified, Jonathan and Graham Jenkins gave notice to Liston, that they had agreed to abide the decision of the arbitrators and pay him seven hundred dollars. And on the 27th of February 1854 Liston wrote at the foot of the award that he bound himself to make a good and warrantee deed against the children of John and Rebecca Smith and none others, within twelve months from that time.

It appears that whilst the arbitrators were engaged in considering the case, a 537 paper written by a person *in Pennsylvania, was put into their hands as evidence in the absence of the Jenkinses. One of the arbitrators who made the award says he had made up his opinion before he saw this paper, and that he did not use the paper as evidence at all. The other says he had made up his opinion before the paper was shown to him, and that he did not consider it as evidence; but it strengthened him in the opinion that no fraud had been committed. The contents of the paper do not appear.

The Jenkinses having refused to execute the award, Liston and wife and the other children of John and Rebecca Smith filed their bill in the Circuit court of Preston county against them to enforce it; alleging that Liston was authorized by most of the other heirs to prosecute their claim for the land; and that he submitted the whole matter in controversy to arbitration.

The defendants insisted that under the will of John Jenkins, John Jenkins Smith had the remainder in fee in the land. That if the arbitration only extended to Liston's interest, the award was unconscionable; and that if it was an award for all the complainants, they were not bound by it; and therefore the defendants were not bound. That in fact the arbitrators were only authorized to decide upon Liston's interest, and had exceeded their powers. That improper testimony had been submitted to the arbitrators without the knowledge of the defendants. And that the plaintiffs had inherited real estate from their father John Smith, and were therefore bound by his warranty of the land to the defendants.

The cause came on to be heard in August 1855, when the court below held that the award should be specifically executed; and made a decree accordingly. Whereupon the defendants applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

SAMUELS, J. It is unnecessary to the proper decision of this case to determine whether Abraham Liston could make a submission to arbitration valid in law to bind his own wife and other femes covert in their rights to real property; or whether the submission before us can be held to that, where arbitrators admit evidence without the knowledge or consent of one of the parties their award is void, the principal case is cited and approved in the following cases: Dickinson v. embrace those rights; or whether an intelligible construction can be placed upon the submission; or whether the award made is within its terms. If all these questions should be decided in favor of the appellees, still the decree directing the specific performance of the award must be reversed because of misbehavior in the arbitrators. The record shows that in the absence of the appellants, and without their knowledge, the arbitrators received from the appellees, or some of them, or from some one on their behalf, a written paper to be used as evidence upon the questions involved in the submission. What the paper contained, or whether its contents were sworn to, the record does not show. One of the arbitrators proves that, having previously made up his opinion as to what the award should be, the contents of the paper had the effect of confirming him in that opinion.

It has always been an object of great concern with the courts to keep the administration of justice free not only from partiality, but also from any suspicion thereof. It is due to all parties, whether asserting or defending their rights in courts of record, or before domestic tribunals of their own choice, that they should hear and know everything alleged or proved in opposition to the rights claimed. If, however, evidence on behalf of one party may be secretly heard, his adversary is deprived of the right to explain or disprove what is alleged to his prejudice.

539 *Many cases may be found affirming the position laid down: there is no conflict of opinion in regard to the general principle itself, although there may have been some in applying it to the facts of particular cases.

The case of Graham's adm'r v. Pence, 6 Rand. 529, is sustained as well by the cases cited by Judge Carr, who delivered the opinion, as by many others. It may therefore be safely declared that an award cannot be sustained if made in favor of a party who has secretly offered evidence which has been received by the arbitrators whilst acting in their capacity as such. Nor will the case be withdrawn from the operation of the general rule by proof that the award would have been the same without such proof. The law in its jealousy will not permit an enquiry into the effect of the evidence so received; it tends to partiality and corruption, and nothing less than the complete vacation of the award will satisfy the law.

There is no particular reason to impute improper motives to the arbitrators who made the award in question; they probably received the evidence in ignorance of the proprieties of their position.

It is said in behalf of the appellees, that the paper alleged to have been executed by the appellants after the award was made, agreeing to keep the land and pay the sum of seven hundred dollars, is in itself such a contract as the court should cause to be enforced. I am of a different opinion, however. The arbitrators had decided that the appellants should either give up the land and receive seven hundred dollars from the appellees, or retain the land and pay seven hundred dollars to the appellees, and that the appellants should make their election in a limited time. The paper referred to was merely to show that, of the two alternatives offered by the award, the appellant selected to keep the land and pay 540 the money; but it was in *nowise intended as a new and original contract of sale.

I am of opinion the decree should be reversed and the bill dismissed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

July Term, 1856, Lewisburg.

(Absent, DANIEL, J.*)

1. Navigation Companies—Failure to Complete Improvements of River—Liability—Case at Bar.—The James river and Kanawha company not having completed the improvement of the Kanawha river as prescribed in their charter, and not having charged tolls as authorized by said charter, are not liable for damages occurring in the navigation of the river, for not having such an improvement as the charter prescribes.
2. Same—Failure to Keep Channel Open—Liability.†—The said company being authorized by law to charge tolls on the Kanawha river not exceeding those allowed to be charged by their predecessors the James river company, are bound to keep the navigation of the river in the condition in which the James river company was required to keep it, and are liable for any damages sustained by their failure so to keep it.
3. Same—Same—Successors—Liability.—The James river company was only required to improve the Kanawha river in the mode suggested in the report of the principal engineer of the state made in January 1820, and referred to in the act of the 17th of February 1820. This did not contemplate a continued line of improvement, but that specified works should be done at specified places. And for damages occurring in consequence of obstruc-

4. Same—Buoy—Statute—Case at Bar.—The ninth section of the act of February 27th, 1829, Sup. R. C. p. 469, does not require the company to place buoys or beacons on a snag lodged temporarily in the river at a place at which, by the plan of improvement suggested by the principal engineer and adopted by the act of February 17th, 1820, no work was required to be done.*

5. Same—Land Deposits—Statute—Case at Bar.—The tenth section of said act of February 27th, 1829, only refers to depositions of sand, &c. in the artificial channels and sluices made in the improvement of the navigation of the river, and not to such depositions in the natural channels of the river.*

542 *In January 1820 the principal engineer of the Board of public works of Virginia made a report to the board upon a mode of improving the navigation of the James and Kanawha rivers. As to the Kanawha river commencing at the Great falls, which is ninety-four miles from its mouth, the engineer reports upon each mile separately, stating the then condition of the river, and the mode and estimated cost of improving the navigation. From this report it appears that in parts of the river the navigation was good, and nothing was necessary to be done. Thus the third mile is stated to be excellent navigation; so of the sixth, seventh and eighth miles; so of the fourteenth and fifteenth; of the seventeenth and eighteenth; and so from the twenty-eighth to the thirty-sixth, both inclusive; and this became more and more the condition of the river as it was descended; and from the eightieth to the ninety-fourth mile, both inclusive, the navigation was reported to be good, with scarce any fall in any part of this distance; and nothing was proposed to be done below the seventy-ninth mile. The fall in the river, including the Great falls, was one hundred and twenty-six feet: and the whole cost of the improvement of the river upon the plan of the report, was estimated at twenty-nine thousand six hundred and fifty dollars. The general mode of improving the river was by digging channels through the shoals, removing rocks at particular places, and making wing dams to collect the water.

By an act passed on the 17th of February 1820, the general assembly of Virginia, reciting that it would be greatly beneficial to the good people of the commonwealth to improve the navigation of the James and Jackson's rivers, to the mouth of Dunlap's creek, to make a road from thence to the Great falls of the Kanawha river; and to make the last mentioned river conveniently navigable from the Great falls thereof
543 to *the Ohio river, provided by the first section of the act for a modification of the charter of the Old James river company, so that it should be merely the agent of the state in the execution of the proposed improvement of the rivers. The second section of the act directed that the company should proceed: "First, to render the Great Kanawha from the Great falls thereof to the Ohio river navigable at all seasons of the year, for boats drawing three feet water, according to the plan of the principal engineer, in his report to the Board of public works made in January 1820." And when the work was done to a specified point on the river, the company was authorized to charge certain tolls; they being the same, whatever distance the freight was carried on the river.

By an act passed the 24th of February 1823, the old organization of the James river company was abolished, and the governor, lieutenant governor, treasurer and first and second auditors, and their successors in office, were declared to be the president and directors of the James river company, with the powers and duties of the former officers of the company.

From 1823 to 1829 the James river company proceeded to improve the navigation upon the plan pointed out in the engineer's report; and by a subsequent act a collector's district for the collection of tolls on the river was established at Charleston. There was great dissatisfaction, however, with the navigation upon the part of the persons navigating the river, and difficulty in collecting the tolls, as the boats frequently passed below the collection district without paying the tolls; and were thus beyond the reach of the collector. To provide for these difficulties and complaints, the act of February 27th, 1829, was passed. By this act the tolls were reduced; that on salt, which was the principal article carried on the river, was reduced to one-half cent a bushel: And the collection district 544 was *extended to the mouth of the Kanawha river, including all the shores, bays and inlets of said river within that distance; and various provisions were made, to enable the collector to collect the tolls. By the ninth section of the act, the James river company was required to cause buoys to be placed in the Kanawha river, so as readily and clearly to point out to navigators all the entrances and lines of sluices, the wing dams and jetties, and generally the course of the channels. And also to cause beacons to be placed on the bars, rocks and other obstructions to the navigation, not within the sluices and channels, but which from their position, or from other causes, were likely to endanger the safety of vessels or boats navigating said river; which buoys and beacons were to be so constructed as to be visible until the water of the river should rise five feet above its ordinary lowest level. By the tenth section the company was required to cause all depositions of sand, gravel, timber or other obstructions in the channels, sluices or passages of the said river, to be removed therefrom, so as to restore to the said channels, sluices and passages the width and depth of water produced therein by the works recently constructed on said river; and at all times to keep the said channels, sluices and passages free from depositions or other obstructions which might impair or impede the navigation. Provided that nothing contained in that act should authorize the expenditure of more than one thousand dollars.

By an act passed the 16th of March 1832, the present James river and Kanawha company was incorporated. The provisions of this act bearing on the case are given by Judge Lee in his opinion.

In January 1850 Samuel H. Early instituted an action on the case in the Circuit court of Mason county against the James river and Kanawha company, to re-545 cover *the value of a boat and its cargo of salt, which had been lost by striking on a snag in the Kanawha river. The amended declaration contained three counts, the substance of which is stated in the opinion of Judge Lee, so far as is necessary to show the question decided by this court. That question is, Whether the company is liable for a loss occasioned by a tree which had lodged in the river some miles below the works erected by the James river company, and where the engineer's report stated the navigation to be good, and nothing was required to be done? The defendant demurred to the declaration, and each count thereof; but the court overruled the demurrer. Upon the trial a number of exceptions were taken to rulings of the court; but they were not passed upon by this court, and therefore need not be further noticed. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for five thousand four hundred and ninety-one dollars and seventy-one cents, with interest from the date of the judgment. Whereupon the James river and Kanawha company applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

B. H. Smith and Grattan, for the appellants, and Patton and McComas, for the appellee, argued the cause on all the questions involved in it; but the opinion of the court is confined to a single question, and that is very fully considered by the judge.

LEE, J. I concur with the counsel in thinking that the most important and material question in this cause arises upon the demurrer to the declaration: and that is whether taking the declaration in its broadest sense and strongest import, and disregarding all matters of form and all technical defects and omissions which might be remedied or supplied, such a case is alleged as entitles the plaintiff in 546 the action to *recover against the defendant for the injury alleged to have been sustained.

The declaration (as amended) consists of three counts. The first alleges that the defendant being a body corporate created by act of assembly, was clothed with certain rights and privileges and charged with certain duties pertaining to the navigation of the Kanawha river among which was the duty of keeping the river within the line of their improvements free from all obstructions to the navigation; that this duty it had failed to perform; that it had suffered a large snag to be and remain in the river at a certain point specified as "in the neighborhood of Seven mile rock about seven miles above the mouth of the river in Mason county and within the line of their improvement," whereby the navigation of the river was obstructed; and that by reason thereof the plaintiff in navigating the river with a boat loaded with salt struck and stove his boat upon the snag whereby both boat and cargo were wholly lost.

The second count alleges that one of the duties of the company was to place buoys in the Kanawha river to indicate the entrance of the sluices, wing dams and jetties, and generally the courses of the channels, and also to cause beacons to be placed on the bars, rocks and other obstructions to the navigation which though not within the channels or sluices yet from their positions or other causes were likely to endanger the safety of boats and vessels navigating the river but that the company in disregard of this duty had failed to place a beacon at or upon a large snag in the river about seven miles from the mouth at or near the Seven mile rock, which snag from its position in the river did endanger the safety of vessels and boats navigating the same and that by reason of such neglect, the plaintiff had stove a boat with which he was navigating the river upon the snag and both 547 it *and a large cargo of salt with which it was freighted were wholly lost.

The third count alleges that it was the duty of the company to remove all depositions and obstructions in the channels and passages of the river which might impede the navigation, but that in disregard of this duty it had unlawfully permitted a large snag to be and remain in the river at the same point designated in the two previous counts being a portion of the line of the company's improvement; by reason of which the navigation was greatly obstructed, so that a boat with which the plaintiff was navigating the river ran against and was stove upon the snag, and both it and its cargo were wholly lost.

The act of assembly referred to in each of the counts of the declaration is the act entitled "an act incorporating the stockholders of the James river and Kanawha company," passed March 16, 1832. After a preamble reciting that the measures theretofore adopted by the general assembly for the purpose of connecting the tide water of James river with the navigable waters of the Ohio had been found inadequate to effect that object by such a line of transportation as the public interest required, the act provided for the opening of books for subscriptions to the capital stock of a new company in which the state was to take ten thousand shares; and when three-fifths of the stock should have been subscribed by persons other than the commonwealth and the required sum paid on each share, the company was to be incorporated by the name of "The James River and Kanawha Company," with the usual rights and incidents, and declared to be to every intent and purpose in law the successors of the then James river company. By the twentieth section, the whole interest of the commonwealth in the works and property of the James river company was transferred 548 to the *new company to be held for the use of the stockholders; and the new company was declared to be thenceforward (after the period at which the transfer was to take effect) entitled to all the tolls, rents and other emoluments, rights, privileges and immunities enjoyed by the James river company subject however to the incumbrances, limitations and restrictions in the act declared. By the twenty-second section the new company was charged with the duty of connecting the tide water of James river with the navigable water of the Ohio by one of three plans of improvement at their election, that is to say, either by a continuation of the lower James river canal to some point not lower than Lynchburg, a rail road from its western terminus to some convenient point on the Kanawha below the falls and an improvement of that river thence to the Ohio so as to make it suitable for steamboat navigation; or secondly by such a combination of the canal and a rail road from its western terminus to the Ohio; or thirdly by a continued rail road from Richmond to the Ohio.

By the twenty-sixth section it was provided that if the western termination of the rail road should be at any point on the Kanawha above its mouth, then the navigation of that river thence to the Ohio should be improved by locks and dams or otherwise so as at all seasons of the year to afford a safe and convenient navigation for steamboats of not less than one hundred tons burden.

By the twenty-seventh section the company was required to commence its works within two years after the passing of the act and to finish them within twelve years after the first general meeting of the stockholders, on pain of forfeiting their charter and property which in that event were declared to be vested in the then existing James river company for the benefit of the commonwealth. By the act of the 549 *6th March 1833, the time within which the works were to be commenced was extended to the end of two years after the passage of that act and twelve years allowed for the completion of the works after the first general meeting of the stockholders. By the act of March 1, 1847, this time was extended to the 25th of May 1859, and is therefore not yet expired.

By the forty-sixth section of the act of 1832, the company was authorized upon the completion of the improvements upon the Kanawha river as therein directed, to demand and receive on articles transported by water on their line of improvement, in lieu of the tolls then authorized by law, such as the company might assess not exceeding certain rates per ton per mile specified in the act; and until the river should be rendered navigable in the manner prescribed from the terminus of the rail road to the mouth of the river, it was authorized to demand and receive such tolls as it might assess not exceeding those then allowed by law.

Turning now to the provisions of the several acts concerning the James river company, it will be seen at once that a new and very different improvement of the Kanawha river was contemplated by the act of 1832 from that projected by the former. By the second section of the act entitled "an act to amend the act entitled 'an act for clearing and improving the navigation of James river,' and for uniting the eastern and western waters by the James and Kanawha rivers," passed February 17, 1820, the company was required to proceed to render the Kanawha from the falls to the Ohio navigable at all seasons for boats of three feet draught, according to the plan of the principal engineer in his report to the Board of public works made in January 1820. This improvement was plainly not intended by the legislature to be a complete and perfect improvement of the river, but to 550 be in its character *partial limited and sporadic. The plan of the engineer referred to proposed only to improve the navigation at different points specified along the river by opening sluices through certain shoals, deepening the channel in particular places, removing rocks at certain points and the like; and the particular places at which work is to be done are all plainly set down and an estimate made of the probable cost of the work necessary to be done at each. At all other places the natural state of the river is assumed to be sufficient to afford an ordinary navigation of three feet in depth. Under the provisions of that act, a continuous and connected improvement was not contemplated. The intended improvement was to consist of a succession of works at the different points named, the river elsewhere and between the different works of the company, being assumed to be an open navigable highway in regard to which no duty is imposed by the act upon that company. The act of February 24, 1823, to make more effectual provision for carrying the former into effect, refers to the mode of improvement as contemplated by that act, and the plan of the engineer is thus made as much a part of both acts as if embodied in them at length, nor until the act of 1832 creating the James river and Kanawha company, was any change made or any different plan adopted for the improvement of the Kanawha.

If this view of the nature of the improvement designed by the acts concerning the James river company needs any confirmation, it will be found in the amounts authorized to be borrowed for the purpose of completing the works with which it was charged, which would seem to be comparatively inconsiderable and such as would only suffice for works of a partial and limited character; and especially the very moderate sum which the improvements on the Kanawha were to cost according to 551 the engineer's estimates and *which must have been in the contemplation of the legislature at the time; and in the character of the several tariffs prescribed for the tolls which were at different times authorized to be collected by the former company. All of these as well that of the act of 1820, that in favor of the salt interest of the act of February 28, 1821, that of the act of March 1, 1828, and that of the act of February 27, 1829, unlike that prescribed by the act of 1832, were specific tolls fixed at an arbitrary rate having no reference to the distance navigated; whilst the tolls authorized by the act of 1832 for the new improvement which was to afford a constant navigation for steam boats of an hundred tons burden, are all graduated by a scale of exact distance navigated, and not to exceed a given rate per ton per mile.

By the terms of the act of 1832, the tolls authorized to be taken for the new improvement of the Kanawha river, were only to be collected when the improvements on the same should have been fully completed as by that act authorized and directed; and in the absence of any express provision in the act upon the subject, it would seem clear that the company could not be held liable for an injury to an individual occasioned by any neglect or breach of duty on its part in respect to the new and more perfect improvement of the river projected by the act until it had entitled itself to demand the tolls thereby provided upon the completion of its works, or had exercised the right to demand such tolls upon the assumption that the works had been completed. The right to demand the tolls and the liability for neglect of the duty upon the performance of which the tolls were authorized, are reciprocal and correlative: the tolls are the remuneration to the company for its expenditures on its works and the consideration and basis for any legal liability that 552 may be cast upon it for any *omission or neglect of duty in respect of the new works with which it was charged.

Now there is no express provision in the act in regard to liability for neglect of duty in reference to the improved navigation of the Kanawha river. The subject of such liability is left by the act to the general principles applicable to the case and to the relations in which the company stands to the public and individuals. That the company may upon proper allegations be held liable for an injury to an individual navigating the Kanawha occasioned by neglect of its duty in reference to the new improvement with which it was charged after it shall have exercised the right to demand the tolls provided by the act (which is in effect an affirmation upon its part that it has completed its works according to the requirements of the act) I entertain no doubt. It is not a public corporation representing the public and administering public funds for the benefit of the public, but it is a joint stock company which has undertaken the construction of a work useful to the public certainly but intended for the private emolument of the stockholders in dividends of the profits. There can be no good reason why such a corporation should be exempt from liability for injuries occasioned by its neglect. It is a maxim of the common law that one specially injured by a breach of duty in another shall have his remedy by an action; and the case of a corporation should be no exception. It undertakes its corporate duties by its own consent and receives an equivalent for their performance. And it may be considered now well settled that such a corporation will be liable for damages specially occasioned to an individual by a breach or neglect of its corporate duties. Mayor of Lynn v. Turner, Cowp. R. 86; Yarborough v. Bank of England, 16 East's R. 6; Townsend v. Susquehanna Turnpike Co., 6 John. R. 90; Riddle v. Proprietors of Locks and Canals on Merrimack 553 River, *7 Mass. R. 169; Chesnut Hill T. Co. v. Rutter, 4 Serg. & Rawle 6. That the state owned a large interest in the stock of the company will not vary the case. The act of incorporation declares that it may sue and be sued, may plead and be impleaded; and a mere interest taken by the commonwealth in the stock would not be sufficient to bring an action against the company for neglect of its corporate duty within the influence of the decision in the case of Sayre v. The Northwestern Turnpike Road, 10 Leigh 454, and the class of cases upon the authority of which that case is supposed to have been decided and which are referred to by Judge Allen in delivering his opinion in the case of Dunnington v. The Northwestern Turnpike Road, 6 Gratt. 160, 171.

But in order to charge the company with the consequences of a neglect of duty in reference to the new and more perfect improvement projected by the act of 1832, a proper case showing that it was so responsible, and setting out the nature of the duty and the character of the supposed liability must be distinctly alleged. If it be not averred that the company had taken possession of the river under its charter and had completed its new works according to the requirements of the act, or had demanded and collected tolls according to the improved tariff authorized by its charter, enough at least should be averred to show that in point of time, place and circumstances the company was chargeable with the consequences of neglect of duty in reference to the new improvement. Now of the three counts in the declaration the first is the only one which can be supposed to have any reference to the new duties imposed upon the company for the purpose of affecting the more perfect improvement of the navigation of the Kanawha designed by the act of 1832. The second and third counts although they speak of duties
554 with which the company was *charged

by the act of 1832 in reference to the navigation of the Kanawha, yet are plainly founded upon the ninth and tenth sections of the act of the 27th of February 1829 prescribing certain duties to be performed by the James river company in reference to the navigation of the Kanawha contemplated by that and previous acts concerning that company, and which duties it is assumed devolved upon the James river and Kanawha company by the provisions of the act of 1832 in anticipation of the more perfect improvement required by that act. But this first count only alleges in general terms the duty to remove obstructions within the line of its improvement and the failure to perform that duty, specifying the obstruction complained of. It does not specify whether the supposed duty related to the new improvement or to the previous navigation of the river confided to its charge. It does not aver that the company had elected the plan which makes the Kanawha river a part of its line of improvement nor that it had completed its works and taken possession of the entire water line by exercising or claiming to exercise the right to demand the improved tolls according to the act of 1832; it does not charge a failure to render the river navigable for steam boats of the specified tonnage, nor does it contain any other sufficient averments to charge the company as for a breach of corporate duty in its failure to provide the new and improved navigation required by the provisions of that act.

I think it clear that the liability sought to be asserted in this case cannot be maintained upon the ground of any neglect or breach of duty on the part of the company in failing to provide the more perfect navigation required by the twenty-second and twenty-sixth sections of the act of 1832; and if it can be successfully asserted, it must be on the basis of its succession to the rights of property, privileges and 555 *franchises of the James river company and by consequence to the burdens and duties devolved upon that company by the laws then in force.

Counsel have argued it is true that no liability to an action at the suit of a party injured even by its neglect of duty devolved upon this company in virtue of its succession to the former company's rights and duties, because it succeeded as well to the privileges and immunities enjoyed by that company as to its rights and duties, and that one of those immunities was exemption from liability to be sued by an individual for neglect of duty, because as it is said, the James river company was but the agent of the commonwealth, administering public funds and holding only in trust for the commonwealth, and thus as being in effect the commonwealth itself for the purposes of the acts, was not liable to any such action. But I cannot assent to this reasoning. Even if it be conceded that the James river company was not liable to an action upon the principle of the decision in Sayre v. The Northwestern Turnpike, it by no means follows that the present company would be entitled to the same exemption. The reason of that case cannot apply to this. The exemption from liability to be sued is a privilege peculiar and personal (so to speak) to the commonwealth and does not extend to her assignee any more than would her privilege not to be sued for land claimed by her extend to her grantee of the land. The transfer of the "privileges and immunities" of the James river company was not intended to place the James river and Kanawha company above the law and to leave individuals who might be specially injured by the neglect of its corporate duties without remedy or redress. It would be grievously unjust that such a corporation should be clothed with a privilege of this character only properly pertaining to the sovereign authority of the state, and there is no sufficient reason for sup-556 posing *that the legislature ever intended to confer it upon this company.

I think therefore whether the James river company would have been liable or not for neglect of its duties in reference to the "convenient navigation" of the Kanawha river contemplated by the act of 1820 and the subsequent acts concerning that company (a question upon which it is unnecessary to express any opinion) that the present company having taken upon itself the performance of those duties in consideration of the privileges conferred upon it and among the rest of the right to demand the tolls allowed to the James river company until the new improvement should be completed, will be liable for any breach or neglect of duty in reference to the navigation of the Kanawha which it was bound to keep up until the new works should be completed, to any one sustaining special damage thereby in the same manner as it will be liable for nelgect of its corporate duty in reference to the more perfect improvement contemplated by the act of 1832 after it shall have placed itself in a condition to be subject to such responsibility.

But to subject it to such liability the neglect of duty must be plainly and sufficiently alleged. It must be charged that the injury complained of was occasioned by some act or omission of the company for the consequences of which it was legally responsible. The enquiry then occurs what were the duties of the James river company required to be performed with a view to render the Kanawha river "conveniently navigable" as contemplated in the preamble to the act of 1820.

Now, as has been already stated, it is clear it was not made the duty of that company to provide a perfect and complete navigation of the Kanawha throughout its entire length from the falls to the Ohio.

Before the act of 1820 was passed it
557 appears that the *Board of public works had caused a survey to be made by the principal engineer of the James and Kanawha rivers and of the intermediate country with a view to the commercial communication which it was desired to establish between the eastern and western waters of the state. In January 1820 a detailed report was made by the engineer of the results of his exploration and examination, accompanied by his recommendation as to the plan and mode of improvement by which the desired communication might be effected, and his estimates as to the cost of the works and the amount of expenditure necessarily involved. Amongst the rest is the plan proposed by him for the improvement of the Kanawha river. Every mile from the falls to the mouth is examined, the state of the navigation, as found, reported and the mode and method of improving it specified particularly. The different points at which work is required and the kind of work at each point, are stated with great precision and particularity. Upon the intermediate portions of the river where no work is required to be done it assumed that in its natural state the river afforded a sufficient navigation for ordinary purposes, and estimates are furnished of the cost of the works that would in the opinion of the engineer suffice to secure a navigation of three feet at all times. The total amount of these estimates is twenty-nine thousand six hundred and fifty dollars. This report was adopted by the legislature as the basis of its legislation on the subject; and by the act of 1820, the James river company was directed to make its improvement of the Kanawha upon the plan thereby proposed. It is clear therefore that a limited and partial improvement only was contemplated by the legislature and not an entire connected improvement throughout the whole course of the river below the falls. Unlike the act of 1832 which required a navigation for steam boats of a 558 *certain tonnage to be provided by locks and dams or whatever other means might be found necessary, throughout the entire length of the river below the western terminus of the rail road (if the combined method of a rail road and a river navigation should be adopted) the act of 1820 only required the improvement of particular places in the river upon a prescribed plan. Thus it only contemplated such an improvement of the navigation as the execution of the detached works prescribed by the engineer's report would afford. It was assumed that this mode of improvement would insure an ordinary navigation of three feet. But if this expectation should not be realized the company could not be held responsible. It was responsible that the required works should be constructed in conformity to the plan of the engineer, and that they should be kept in proper repair. For although there is no express provision in the act of 1832 requiring the James river and Kanawha company to keep the works in repair, I think it is their duty so to do. They are entitled to collect tolls according to the rates of former laws until the improvement required by the act of 1832 shall be completed; and it is impossible to suppose that the legislature intended they might abandon all the old works, suffer them to become entirely useless for want of repairs, and yet permit them to demand the tolls allowed for the improvement which in a proper state of repair they afforded to the navigation. I consider that to keep the works in a sufficient state of repair so as to afford such aid to the navigation as was intended by the act of 1820, is the condition of the right to demand the tolls, and that such demand amounts to an affirmation on the part of the company that they were in such a state of repair. I do not mean by this that a party could successfully resist the payment of tolls by alleging that the works were not kept in proper 559 *repair. What I mean is that the company would be liable for special injury occasioned to an individual by reason of its works not being kept in the condition required by law. Beyond this however, its liabilities cannot be carried. If the works were executed upon the prescribed plan, and kept in due repair, the company cannot be held liable for losses not attributable to any default or neglect on its part, but occasioned by defects or insufficiencies in the plan of improvement or which occurred outside of its works upon those portions of the river which were reported by the engineer as not requiring any improvement and which were therefore not placed by the act in charge of the company.

To charge the company then with the consequences of an injury sustained by a party in navigating the river it must be distinctly averred that it was occasioned by some unlawful act of the company or its omission or neglect to do or provide something which the report of the engineer or the law required. It should at least be averred that the place at which the alleged injury occurred was one of those at which the company was required to do the necessary work for the improvement of the navigation and that the injury was occasioned by its default.

Now in this respect the first count is plainly defective. The allegation is that it was the duty of the company to keep the river free from obstructions within the line of its improvement which duty it failed to perform. This is not a sufficient allegation that the obstruction occurred in any part of the company's works or at any place which the company was bound to keep clear of obstructions. The James river company had no line of improvement in the sense intended in the declaration. The phrase appears to be borrowed from the act of 1832 which treats the entire river below the western terminus of the railroad as 560 *occupied by the line of the company's improvement, and graduates the tolls according to the distance navigated; but it can have no application to the particular improvement in detached parcels and in different places required by the acts concerning the James river company. It is too vague and indefinite at best to fix the place intended within the limits of the company's works or to designate it as one of those at which the company was charged with the duty of improving the natural navigation of the river. But this count not only fails to show that the place in question was one of those which the company was charged with the duty of improving, but in point of fact it shows very distinctly that it was not. The place of the injury is sufficiently identified as being "in the neighborhood of the Seven mile rock about seven miles above the mouth of the river." Now if we turn to the engineer's report we find that for fifteen miles above the mouth of the river he pronounces the navigation good in the natural state of the river and requiring no improvement of any kind whatever. His plan of improvement requires nothing whatever to be done below the seventy-ninth mile (computing from the Great falls) which terminates fifteen miles above the mouth of the river; and thus the place at which the injury is alleged to have been sustained was one at which no duty devolved upon the company in reference to the navigation of the river and for the sufficiency of which it was no more responsible than any other person whatever.

I think it clear therefore that the first count wholly fails to make out any case to charge the company with the consequences of the injury and loss alleged to have been sustained.

The third count is obnoxious to very much the same objection as the first. It does not sufficiently allege that the place at which the injury of which it
561 *complains occurred was one of those at which the company was required to make any improvement by the report of the engineer or the acts which adopted it. The breach of duty of which it complains was in the failure of the company to remove depositions and obstructions in the passages, sluices and channels of the river, which it is alleged it was its duty to remove in order that such passages, sluices and channels might afford a free and unimpeded navigation. The count is evidently framed under the tenth section of the act of February 27, 1829, upon an entire misconception as I think of the true intent and meaning of that section. It proceeds upon the assumption that that section makes it the duty of the company to remove depositions and other obstructions in all the passages, sluices and channels of the river, whether artificial or natural. Such is not the meaning of the section. It did not intend to require any new improvement or any work to be done at other places than those specified in the engineer's report. It was not the purpose of the act to extend the company's charge and responsibilities over those portions of the river which had been reported as affording a sufficiently good navigation in its then condition. The true object was to cause the works that had been constructed upon the engineer's plan, to be repaired and reinstated in the condition in which it was contemplated they should be kept by the engineer's report. The passages, sluices and channels spoken of were the artificial passages, sluices and channels produced by the works of the company constructed upon the engineer's plan and which it would seem had become obstructed by depositions of sand, gravel and timber impeding the navigation through them, and not the natural channels of the river at other places. This is apparent from the terms of the section which require the obstructions to be removed so as to restore to the channels, sluices and passages 562 *referred to, the width and depth of water produced in them by the works then recently constructed upon the river; and it is confirmed by the limited amount of the expenditure authorized for the purpose which was not to exceed one thousand dollars. I think therefore this third count equally fails to make a case of such neglect of duty on the part of the company as would charge it for the consequences of the injury complained of.

The remaining count is the second which alleges the neglect of duty on the part of the company to consist in the failure to place a beacon or beacons at or upon the snag in the river which occasioned the injury. This count is evidently framed upon the ninth section of the act of February 27, 1829, but as I think, under a misconception of the true meaning of that section. The bars, rocks and other obstructions upon which it was made the duty of the James river company to place beacons were such as were of a fixed and permanent character then in the river or at the banks or in such other positions that they might endanger the navigation. They were such as formed part of the natural features of the river. It was not designed to require beacons to be placed upon a casual, temporary, movable impediment such as that specified in the declaration. A tree which having been adrift, had accidentally become stationary in the river forming whilst it remained in that position "a snag" could not have been within the meaning of the legislature. It might be in a given place on one day and in a different on the next; and with the first rise of the water if not sooner, it would probably disappear entirely. Such an obstruction as this would not admit of the erection of a beacon upon it and is to be guarded against and avoided by the care and vigilance of those engaged in the navigation. This count therefore I think without any just foundation to sustain it.

563 *The views which I have thus expressed all go to the foundation of the action, and thus it becomes unnecessary to express an opinion upon any other of the questions raised and discussed by the counsel. The only remaining question is as to the disposition of the case if the demurrers to the declaration be sustained. If the defects were merely in the statement of the case and might be remedied by a proper amendment, then according to the settled practice of this court, the cause should be sent back to the Circuit court to give the party the opportunity to make such amendment. But such is not their character. They are defects in the very substance of the case itself, and such as cannot be helped by any amendment consistent with the allegations and proofs in the record before us. These all show that the party has and can have no cause of action against this company for the loss which he has sustained. I think therefore no useful purpose can be answered by sending the cause back and that it should be finally determined here.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment and render final judgment for the plaintiff in error.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Judgment reversed, the demurrer sustained, and final judgment thereon for the defendants.

564 *Amick v. Tharp.

July Term, 1866, Lewisburg.

Obstruction of Water Channel—Liability.*—City authorities change the channel of a drain so as to throw the water flowing along it upon the lot of T lying below. He cannot obstruct the channel so as to cause the water to flow back upon and injure the lot of A lying above his.

This was an action on the case in the Circuit court of Ohio county by Jacob Amick against Daniel V. Tharp, to recover damages for an injury done to the plaintiff's lot in the city of Wheeling, by the obstruction of a drain by which the water from a spring on the plaintiff's lot, and that which flowed from the surface of the ground after a rain, had been accustomed to run off. On the trial of the cause it appeared that there had been from time immemorial a ravine through which water could flow to Wheeling creek from a certain part of the city of Wheeling. The bottom of this ravine was from thirty to forty feet wide. This ravine seems to have run through the rear of lots laid off on each side of it; and the city authorities having determined to fill it up at least for a part of its distance, had a culvert built in the bottom of the ravine for the purpose of carrying off the water, and then filled up the ravine over the culvert with earth. This culvert the defendant insisted, and introduced evidence tending to prove, was not built over the ordinary channel along which the water ran at the bottom of the ravine, but that it was built from fifteen to thirty feet from said channel, and was thus put upon the lot of the defendant. This work was done under the superintendence of the plaintiff, who was a street commissioner of the city of Wheeling.

565 *At the time the culvert was built and the ravine was filled up, neither the plaintiff or defendant owned his lot. The plaintiff afterwards purchased the lot on the north side of the alley, on which the spring before mentioned was situated; and the defendant purchased his lot on the south side of said alley, lying further down said ravine, and extending below the point to which the culvert extended: And the mouth of the culvert being on his lot and throwing the water thereon, he filled up the ravine on his own lot so as to shut up the mouth of the culvert; and thus prevented the flow of the water through the culvert, and caused it to be thrown back on and over the lot of the plaintiff where it lay stagnant.

The evidence having been introduced, the court, on the motion of the defendant, instructed the jury, "That the defendant had a right to fill up his lot, as aforesaid, notwithstanding such filling up may have stopped the flow of water through said culvert, and caused the same to overflow the property of the plaintiff; provided the jury believe that the course of said drain was changed so as to cause the water to flow over a different part of his lot from the place where it had always been accustomed to flow: And that the city had no authority so to grade an alley as to throw the water of such drain on the property of a citizen without compensation, and thereby deprive him of the right to exercise any authority as owner which he previously had over his own property." To the giving of this instruction the plaintiff excepted: And there having been a verdict and judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff applied for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Russell, for the appellant.
Fry, for the appellee.

566 *DANIEL, J. In the view which I take of this case, it does not seem to me necessary to enquire whether the city of Wheeling, in grading the street and constructing the culvert in the proceedings mentioned, did or did not act in pursuance of a lawful authority. There is nothing in the evidence, upon which the instructions of the Circuit court are founded, to show that these works had caused any obstruction to the course of the branch in its passage over the lot of the plaintiff, or had in any manner become, or were likely to become,

*Obstruction of Water Channel—Nuisance.—In Masonic Temple v. Banks, 94 Va. 697, 27 S. E. Rep. 490, the court said: "The right of the complainant and the erection of the dam by the defendant were not disputed: and it was clearly shown that the basement and cellars of the complainant's building were flooded with water as the result of the erection of the dam. The act of the defendant in obstructing the stream and causing the water to overflow the premises of the complainant was unlawful and constituted a nuisance. 1 Wood on Nuisances, secs. 1 and 117; Burwell v. the cause of injury to his property, till the flow of the water through the culvert was stopped by the defendant. And indeed the instructions of the Circuit court proceed on the hypothesis that the works of the defendant on his own lot were the proximate cause of the overflow of the plaintiff's; and declare to the jury that the defendant had a right to fill up his lot, notwithstanding such filling may have stopped the flow of water through the culvert and caused the same to overflow the property of the plaintiff; provided the jury should believe that the course of the drain was changed by the works of the city above mentioned, so as to cause the water to flow over a different part of his lot from the place where it had always been accustomed to flow; and that the city had no authority so to grade an alley as to throw the water of such a drain on the property of a citizen without compensation and thereby to deprive him of the right to exercise any authority as owner which he previously had over his own property.

In Angell on Water Courses, § 389, it is said that a party aggrieved may remove a private nuisance if it can be peaceably done. Thus, if a ditch is dug, by means of which the water is diverted from the land of a riparian proprietor, through whose land it would otherwise flow in its 567 natural course, he may go upon *the land of the wrongdoer and fill it up. So the law affords the owner of land protection against the flow of back water on his land or upon his mill; and he may lawfully enter upon the land of the person causing the injury, and remove the obstruction by which it was occasioned. And in the same treatise, § 332, it is declared that a riparian proprietor, whose lands are directly inundated by the acts of his neighbor, can not only by the common law recover adequate damages, but he is allowed by the same authority to defend his land against encroachments; and if any consequences detrimental to the wrong doer result from this course, they afford no legal ground of complaint. The same doctrine is asserted in Hilliard on Real Property, vol. 2, p. 120, where it is said that if the land of one person is overflowed through the act of another, the former may erect any obstruction which may be necessary to keep off the water, and will not be answerable for damages thereby occasioned to the wrongdoer. But the important qualification is added, that "he cannot lawfully cause damage to third persons by such erection."

In looking to the cases cited in the foregoing passages in support of the proposition therein asserted, it will be seen, I think, that, whilst the right of a party aggrieved to protect his property from the injurious consequences of works unlawfully erected, by the abatement of such works, is well established, the circumstances which justify a resort to counter works which must result in damage to the property of the wrongdoer, are by no means very clearly defined. Be this, however, as it may, I have been unable to find any precedent which would justify a party, in a case like this, where the evidence affords the presumption that there was ample time to resort to other means of protection, in placing such obstructions to the flow of the water as would inevitably cause the overflow 568 of *the lands of a third person. And justice and fair dealing would seem to require of a person who, under such circumstances chooses, instead of resorting to the legal tribunal, to take his redress or protection into his own hands, the caution, that his proceedings do not involve the ruin or injury of third parties. It seems to me that the cases which deny to the original wrongdoer the right to recover for damages done to his property by countervailing works, have gone full far enough in vindicating the right of self-protection; as under their sanction slight wrongs may, in some cases, be redressed by very serious injuries. A just deference to the rights of unoffending third parties and a proper regard for the peace and order of society, forbid a further extension of the doctrine. Under the instructions of the Circuit court, a person whose property is injured in any degree, however slight, by the unauthorized diversion of a stream from its accustomed flow, may justify the erection of any work necessary to the complete protection and full enjoyment of his property, though the necessary consequence is not merely to endanger but to visit with certain destruction the property of a neighbor, however valuable; and he may thus, in order to prevent or repair a loss, or obviate even an inconvenience, however trifling, carry ruin to the fortunes of innocent parties, and then refer them for redress to the remote, and perhaps insolvent wrongdoer.

In the absence of authority plainly so declaring the law, I cannot give my assent to a doctrine which may work out such unjust results.

On the contrary, justice and convenience seem to me to require, in such cases, that an aggrieved party should not be compelled, in seeking redress, to look beyond the person whose acts are the proximate cause of the injury done to his property. When he shows that but for the act complained 569 of he would have *sustained no injury, he establishes a right to have redress at the hands of the person who did it. No sufficient answer to the complaint is made by the plea that such act was done by the defendant to repair an injury to his own property, proceeding from the illegal acts of a third person.

The cases in which parties have been held excused for acts done injurious to the property of others, under circumstances of imminent danger expected from fire or flood, furnish, I think, no rule or argument in support of the instructions of the Circuit court. In such cases of accidental and extraordinary casualty, where the law is powerless to afford either protection or redress, each person exposed to the danger is left to adopt the best means within his power to avert the threatened mischief; and if consequences prejudicial to the property of others ensue, the defense and excuse are found in the pressing emergency of the occasion. The difference between such cases and those where the parties have it in their power to appeal to the preventive and remedial justice of the court; and have also time and opportunity afforded to select the means of preventing or repairing the mischief without damage to others, is so obvious as to need no comment. And it is also to be observed, that even in cases of the threatened outburst of a flood or spread of a conflagration, the right of a person to protect his property cannot be exercised in total disregard of the rights of others. He must still, in the selection of the means of protection within his power, use care to prevent unnecessary injury to the property of others. Noyes v. Shepherd, 30 Maine R. 173, 179; Beach v. Trudgain, 2 Gratt. 219.

In the first mentioned case, where the defendant was sued for damages resulting from the use of means employed to prevent an expected inundation from the waters of a pond which threatened to do great 570 injury *to the property of the defendant and others, he was held to show that he had observed ordinary care in his proceedings: And in the case of Beach v. Trudgain, in which parties, pulling down a house in a town to arrest the spread of a fire, were sued by the owner, this court held that they were responsible for the damages thereby sustained by the owner, if the house might have been prevented taking fire by the use of the means within the power of the parties pulling it down.

If any analogy favorable to the defense could be drawn from the indulgence extended to parties acting under the pressure of imminent danger, (and I have already expressed the opinion that the analogy does not hold,) I should still be of the opinion that the rule declared by the Circuit court was too broad, inasmuch as it asserts the unqualified right of the defendant to use his property, under the state of things disclosed in the proofs, to the prejudice of his neighbor, without any reference to the consideration whether he might not have prevented damage as well to his own property as to that of the plaintiff, by the use of other means.

Before a party, in a case of the kind under consideration, should be allowed to repair an injury or indemnify himself against a loss by the employment of means, of which mischief to the property of third persons is the natural and inevitable result, he should be at least required to show that he could not have prevented the damage by the use of means involving no greater trouble or expense than that encountered in the use of those selected. And in this case, whilst the ordinary remedies recognized by the law were open to the defendant, (which differs his case from those just commented on,) there is an absence of any proof to show that he might not have restored the stream to its original channel, or, whilst filling 571 up his *lot, might not have provided a passage for the water, so as to prevent the overflow of the plaintiff's land, without any further outlay of money or use of labor than that employed, and without being curtailed in any manner of an equally full and convenient enjoyment of his own lot.

The evidence, that the plaintiff was the street commissioner of the city of Wheeling, superintending and directing the work at the time of the grading of the alley and the construction of the culvert, seems to me to make no difference in the case. At that time, (the bill of exceptions states,) neither the defendant nor the plaintiff had purchased their lots. No portion of the culvert was upon the plaintiff's lot; and his entire connection with it ceased before the defendant became the owner of his lot. The plaintiff, after the culvert was completed, had no control or power over it. Its continuance was not in virtue of any permission, license or grant from him. It was wholly the property of the city, by whose order it was built, before the defendant or the plaintiff had acquired any rights of property to be affected by it; and its continuance thereafter, by which alone the defendant could have been injured, was by the authority of the city alone. This evidence of the plaintiff's connection with the works of the city does not seem to have formed in any degree the basis of the instructions given to the jury; and I am of opinion that it does not relieve them of the objections which I have pointed out.

I am of opinion to reverse, and remand the cause for a new trial.

The other judges concurred.

The judgment was as follows:

It seems to the court, that whether 572 the city of *Wheeling had or had not lawful authority to grade the alley or construct the sewer in the bill of exceptions mentioned, so as to cause the water which had hitherto flowed over a part of the lot of the defendant to flow over another part of said lot, to the injury of the defendant, the defendant had no legal right to obstruct the flow of water through said sewer so as thereby to cause the water to be dammed and thrown back on the property of the plaintiff, to his injury: And consequently, that the Circuit court erred in giving the instructions in said bill of exceptions mentioned. It is therefore considered, &c., that the judgment be reversed, &c., with costs, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for new trial; on which the Circuit court will not repeat such instructions, if asked.

plaintiff's daughter, to enhance the damages, he may prove that the defendant promised to marry her, and by means of said promise had succeeded in debauching her.

This was an action instituted by George W. Campbell against John White, for the seduction of the daughter of the plaintiff. On the trial, after the plaintiff had introduced evidence tending to prove that the defendant had debauched his daughter, to enhance the damages, he proposed to prove that defendant had promised said daughter to marry her, and by means of said promise had succeeded in debauching her. The defendant objected to the admission of this evidence; but the court overruled the objection; and he excepted. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for eight hundred dollars. Whereupon the defendant applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Robert Johnston, for the appellant.
Fry, for the appellee.

MONCURE, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action brought by a father for the seduction of his daughter is founded on the supposed relation of master and servant; and at common law, it was necessary to aver and prove loss of service in order to maintain the action. It was long and well settled, however, that loss of actual service had little to do with the action; and that, in substance, it was an action for damages, not only for the loss of service, 574 *but also for all that the plaintiff could feel from the nature of the injury. The jury, in assessing the damages, might consider his loss of the comfort, as well as the service, of the daughter, in whose virtue he could feel no consolation, and his anxiety as the parent of other children whose morals might be corrupted by her example. Greenl. Ev. § 579. The Code, ch. 148, § 1, p. 589, has provided, that "an action for seduction may be maintained without any allegation or proof of the loss of the service of the female by reason of the defendant's wrongful act." The action is now, in form as well as substance, an action to recover damages for the wound inflicted by the seducer on the peace and happiness of the injured father. These damages are exemplary; and whatever evidence reasonably tends to aggravate the offender's wrong, and show the extent of the father's loss, is legal and proper. Evidence of the means by which the seduction was accomplished is of that character. And upon principle, therefore, it would seem to be very clear, that if the wicked act was accomplished by means of a prior promise of marriage, evidence of such promise would be admissible in aggravation of the damages. That such promise is an independent cause of action by the daughter, is no good reason why it should not be proved in aggravation of damages in the father's action for seduction. His action is ex delicto; her's ex contractu. The evidence is merely collateral to his action, while it is the very foundation of her's. Each has a perfect right to recover damages to the full extent of the wrong done to each; and in order to do so, may prove whatever may reasonably serve to show the measure of damages sustained by each.

Thus stands the case on principle. How does it stand on authority? We have no decision of our own on the subject, and are therefore let free to follow 575 *principle, aided by whatever light we may be able to derive from decisions elsewhere. In Dodd v. Norris, 3 Camp. R. 519, decided at nisi prius in 1814, Lord Ellenborough held that the daughter, examined as a witness in the action, might be asked whether the defendant had not paid his addresses to her in an honorable way, but not whether he had promised to marry her. To admit evidence of a direct promise of marriage would be, he said, to allow the parent to recover damages for a breach of that promise upon the testimony of the daughter. We cannot see the force of the distinction thus drawn between evidence of a direct promise of marriage, and evidence tending to prove such a promise. If one is admissible, the other should be. This case has never, so far as we have seen, been directly recognized as a binding authority in England. In Elliott v. Nicklin, 5 Price's R. 641, decided by the Court of exchequer in 1818, Dodd v. Norris was referred to and explained by Garrow, baron, who had been counsel in the case. There the evidence was not of a promise of marriage, but that the defendant was addressing the plaintiff's daughter; and the court unanimously admitted the evidence. They carefully avoided deciding the question whether evidence of a promise of marriage would have been admissible, as the case did not require it. There has been no other English case on the subject since Dodd v. Norris, that we have seen. There is a prior case, Tullidge v. Wade, 3 Wils. R. 18, decided in the Common pleas in 1769. But in that case the evidence was admitted, and with approbation, by Lord C. J. Wilmot; though Bathurst, one of the justices, said such evidence was improper. In New York, it seems, the doctrine of Dodd v. Norris has been followed. 1 John. R. 296; 2 Wend. R. 459; 7 Id. 193. Though it has been much modified in a more recent case. 5 Denio's R. 367.

Few other cases on the subject are to 576 be *found in the American books.

Some of the best elementary writers seem to disapprove the doctrine of Dodd v.

by the father for the seduction of his daughter he may prove, to enhance the damages, that the defendant promised to marry his daughter and by such means succeeded in debauching her. This is approved in Hudkins v. Haskins, 22 W. Va. 660, where it is said that if a promise of marriage, etc., is alleged in the declaration it will be treated as mere surplusage, since that fact can be proved at the trial as well without as with such allegation.

577 *Gilkeson v. The Frederick Justices.

October Term 1856, Richmond.

1. Taxation—Constitution—Construction.—The constitution of Virginia, article 4, § 22, 23, 25, in relation to taxation and finance, relate to taxation by the general assembly for purposes of state revenue, and do not apply to taxes, levies, &c. by counties, corporations, &c. for the local purposes of such bodies.†

2. Same—Same—Levy by Municipal Corporations.‡—The general assembly has full power to authorize counties, municipal corporations and the like, to levy taxes within their bounds for their peculiar purposes. And the mode, subjects, and extent of such taxation is not limited or regulated by the provisions of the constitution in relation to taxation and finance.

3. Statute—Assessment on Sheriff—Constitutional.—The act of June 7, 1852, Sess. Acts of 1852, p. 12, authorizing assessments in certain cases on the office of sheriffs and sergeants, is not in violation of the constitution.§

4. Same—Same—Case at Bar.—An assessment of four hundred dollars upon the sheriff of Frederick county, laid on the 4th of October and to be paid on the 1st of February following, is not in violation of the act of 1852.§

5. Same—Same—Time of Payment.—If the time of payment fixed by the court was inconsistent with the act, that would not render the assessment void; but it would be corrected as to the time of payment.

At a court held for the county of Frederick, all the justices of the county having been summoned for the purpose, it was ordered that the sum of four hundred dollars be taxed on the sheriff of the county, to 578 be *paid on the first of the next February. At the April term of the court for 1853, Thomas A. Tidball was appointed a commissioner to settle the accounts of William D. Gilkeson, for all charges of the county against him as sheriff of the county. And Tidball having reported to the court that the sheriff refused to pay the tax assessed upon his office, the court at its May term directed the attorney for the commonwealth to take the necessary steps to enforce the payment thereof. In pursuance of this direction, the attorney gave to Gilkeson a written notice that at the June term of the court a motion would be made in the name of the commonwealth for the use of the county of Frederick, for a judgment against him for the said sum of four hundred dollars.

At the June term the motion came on to be heard, when the court awarded a judgment against Gilkeson, who was still the sheriff, for the sum of four hundred dollars, with interest from the date of the judgment. Gilkeson thereupon took the case to the Circuit court by supersedeas: But when the cause came on to be heard in that court, the judgment of the County court was affirmed. He then applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Philip Williams, for the appellant.
Byrd and Holliday, for the appellee.

SAMUELS, J. The plaintiff seeks to reverse the judgment in this case for two reasons:

1st. Because the statute of June 7, 1852, Sess. Acts, p. 12, § 1, is not such as the general assembly might enact under the constitution of Virginia.

2d. Because, if the statute be constitutional, yet the action of the County court under it is not warranted by the law.

The power of the courts to decide 579 against the validity *of a statute which is in conflict with the constitution, is beyond question. The duty of the court so to decide, when a proper case is presented, is manifestly plain.

We are referred to the constitution, article 4, title "taxation and finance," § 22, 25, with which, it is alleged, the statute under consideration is in conflict. It is said to be in violation of these provisions of the constitution in this, that it allows a rate of taxation which is not "equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth;" nor equal and uniform within any one county: That a subject, the office of sheriff, is taxed, the incumbent of which, being assessed with a tax on the fees or income of his office, is exempt from any further tax, a license tax, on the office itself: That the general assembly itself has no power to impose a tax such as this, and of consequence, could not delegate to the county courts the power to impose it.

It is necessary, to avoid confusion and its consequent error, to keep separate things which are essentially different; to distinguish between the revenue of the commonwealth at large, its modes of assessment and collection, and the revenues of the counties, (levies, poor rates and other charges,) and their modes of assessment and collection. As to the commonwealth's revenue; the constitution, article 4, § 22, prescribes that "taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth, and all property other than slaves shall be taxed in proportion to its value, which shall be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by law." This section manifestly relates to the commonwealth's revenue, and to nothing else: Its place in the constitution and its language require that it should be so construed. That it does not apply to county charges is apparent from the fact that they are nowhere mentioned in the constitution. It is not proper to seize upon general words used with 580 reference to *one subject, and apply them to a subject not in the mind of the law giver when the words were used. Pendleton, judge, Case of the County levy, 5 Call 141. We could not give the construction contended for by applying this section to county charges, without imputing to the framers of the constitution either gross ignorance of the condition of the several counties of the state, or a willful disregard of justice. The framers of the constitution did know that there was a great difference in the amount of county charges in the several counties; they did know that, at different times in the same county, there was great inequality in the amount of those charges; yet to have prescribed a rate "equal and uniform" for all counties, without regard to their wants, would have been highly unjust. Although the people of Virginia may be rightfully required to contribute to the expenses of their government in all its departments, yet if in some local departments their expenses be small, they cannot be required to pay large sums for the mere purpose of preserving an "equal and uniform" rate of taxation. Thus I am of opinion that the rate of taxation prescribed by the twenty-second section is not necessarily to govern in levying to defray county charges.

For the same and other reasons, not yet expressed, I am of opinion that county levies and other charges are not affected by so much of the twenty-second section as requires taxes to be laid on all property, other than slaves, in proportion to its value; nor by no much of the twenty-third section as prescribes a tax on each slave over twelve years of age, equal to the tax on land, of the value of three hundred dollars. As already said, this part of the constitution, from its face and context, is intended to apply to the commonwealth at large, and not to counties or subdivisions. The contemporary history of the adoption of the constitution leaves no doubt on the subject.
581 These sections were *inserted to reconcile an alleged antagonism of interests between the western and eastern portions of the state. The western portion of the state had a large relative portion of the white population, and but a small relative portion of the slaves, within the commonwealth; the people of the western portion desired to make internal improvements which would require the expenditure of large revenues; and the people of the eastern portion of the state, who held much the largest proportion of the slaves, were apprehensive that the large revenues required might be levied by making a discrimination against property in slaves; and to obviate this apprehension, the rule of equality and uniformity was adopted and made part of the construction. If we look to these sections standing alone, or in connection with the reasons for their adoption, it must be seen that they have no application whatever to county charges of any kind.

It is said, moreover, that the statute is in violation of the twenty-fifth section of the fourth article of the constitution, which provides that "the general assembly may levy a tax on incomes, salaries and licenses; but no tax shall be levied on property from which any income so taxed is derived, or on the capital invested in the trade or business in respect to which the license so taxed is issued." The same general answer may be given to this objection, that was given to that in regard to the rates and subjects of taxation; that is, that the section applies only to the commonwealth's revenue and not to county levies. If it were otherwise, however, the plaintiff would find great difficulty in bringing himself within the terms of this section. It was intended thereby to protect any party from double taxation—once on his income, and again on the property yielding the income. Property, and income from the same property, cannot both be taxed at the same time; but unless we 582 hold the office of *sheriff to be property, the case does not come within the twenty-fifth section. This office, or an office of any kind, is not embraced by any just definition of the word property.

It is alleged, moreover, that the general assembly itself has no power to impose a tax such as this, and that therefore it could not delegate it or confer it on the county courts.

In ascertaining the extent of the legislative authority vested in the general assembly, it must be borne in mind that the federal constitution, within its limited scope, the bill of rights and the constitution of Virginia, prescribe its only limits. No suggestion has been made that either the federal constitution or the bill of rights is invaded by the statute under consideration; they may therefore be dismissed from further investigation. The constitution of Virginia contains certain mandates and certain restrictions applicable to the departments of state government, legislative, executive and judiciary, respectively. It is a modification and arrangement of the sovereign power retained by the state, and a distribution thereof amongst the appropriate departments. The legislative department (now under consideration) is clothed with the power of making any law within the limits above stated. The constitution of Virginia requires certain laws to be enacted; it forbids the enactment of certain other laws. It is said that the statute before us is of the forbidden class; that levies or county charges come within the twenty-second and twenty-fifth sections of the fourth article of the constitution; that the rates and subjects by and from which state revenue is to be levied, are to be observed in county levies. The answer to this objection has been already given; it is that these sections were intended to apply only to the state revenue.

The constitution, article 6, § 28,
583 directs that "the *justices shall receive for their services in court a per diem compensation, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the county treasury." This is the only section having the slightest reference to the expenses within the counties. The organization of the county treasury and its mode of supply are in nowise provided for by the constitution. They were left to pass (with innumerable other subjects) under the control of the legislature. There they had been from a time anterior to the adoption of the first constitution, during all the time of the first and second constitutions, and there the third and last constitution still leaves them.

The power of the general assembly to confer authority on county courts, city councils, coporations and other organized bodies to impose local taxes for local purposes, had been exercised from the adoption of the first constitution down to the formation of the last. The rates and subjects of taxation were different in many instances, if not in all; the powers conferred were not always the same, but were varied to meet the exigencies of particular circumstances, and frequently were left to the discretion of the body on which they were conferred. All this was known to the convention; yet no explicit provision was inserted in the constitution changing this power of the general assembly. Surely if a change in the whole scheme of local taxation was intended, the convention would have expressed the intention in plain terms, and not have left us to arrive at it by a forced construction.

The objection to this power of the general assembly has been passed on several times by this court; and the power under the first and second constitutions has been affirmed. In 5 Call 139, we find an opinion of Judge Pendleton in the Case of the County levy, said to have been pronounced in the Court of appeals. No statement of the case is given, but it may be gathered from the opinion that the validity
584 of a county levy *assessed by the County court of Fairfax, was drawn in question, because the power of levying taxes could be exercised only by representatives chosen by the people, and could not be delegated to the County court; yet Judge Pendleton was of opinion the levy was well laid. From the fact that the county courts have continued from that time to this to exercise the power of laying levies, we may infer that the question was regarded as settled either by this case or otherwise.

In Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh 120, this court decided that the general assembly acted within its constitutional power, in conferring on the common council of the city of Richmond authority to levy taxes within the city to pay a subscription to the James river and Kanawha company.

In Harrison justices v. Holland, 3 Gratt. 247, it was decided that an act of assembly requiring a county court to lay a levy upon the tithables of the county, for the purpose of improving the navigation of a stream lying within it, though passed without the assent of the people, was constitutional.

In the case of Bull, &c., v. Accomack school commissioners, recently decided by this court, supra 78, it was held that a statute was constitutional, which conferred on certain commissioners for certain districts in Accomack the power of taxation for the purpose of establishing free schools.

I am of opinion that the power of local taxation for local purposes is in nowise varied or changed by the constitution of 1851; but that it remains the same as under the first and second constitutions: and that the objection on the first ground is not well taken.

It remains to consider the second error alleged as cause for reversing the judgment.

The plaintiff being the incumbent in office at the time the levy was assessed, 585 and continually thereafter *until the time when the levy become payable, and even up to the time the judgment was rendered, it could make no difference to him whether the assessment was on him as sheriff, or on the office of sheriff; the result would be the same.

In ascertaining the comparative weight of the burden imposed by the court with that which the law authorized, two elements must be taken into the estimate, to wit, the amount of money, and the time of payment. It is perfectly obvious that a smaller sum to be paid promptly may be a more onerous charge, than a larger sum the payment of which is postponed to a remote time. If we may adopt this mode of making the estimate, it will be found that four hundred dollars assessed at October court, payable the first of February then next, is far less burdensome than eleven hundred dollars, payable at the end of the six months prescribed by the general law of county levies, Code of Virginia, ch. 54, § 15, 16, or payable semiannually, as might have been directed under the statute of June 7, 1852.

If, however, it be conceded that the time fixed by the court for payment was less than that allowed by law, still the levy would not be thereby vitiated; but so much of it as was rightly done would be sustained, and so much of it as was wrongly done would be corrected, and made to conform to the general law contained in § 15, 16, above cited. In this view of the case the levy assessed at the October term 1852, on the fourth day of the month, was payable the 4th of April 1853. Nothing whatever was done to enforce payment until the 4th of April 1853, when an order was made requiring the sheriff to settle his account of the levies. At the May term it was ascertained that the sheriff refused to account for the levy assessed at the October term; and thereupon the court ordered that the commonwealth's attorney should take 586 such *steps as might be necessary to enforce payment thereof. At the June term the judgment now before us was rendered on motion made after due notice under § 16, chap. 54, of the Code. Thus it appears that if the court erred in fixing the time of payment at the first of February 1853, yet it was corrected by the law and proceedings had under it, and that no injury has been done to the plaintiff.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

Judgment affirmed.

587 *Carrington v. Goddin.

January Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Ejectment—What Interest Will Support.—A party having an interest in or claim to land held adversely by another, may under the Code, ch. 116, § 5, p. 500, sell and convey the same; and his grantee may maintain ejectment for it.†

2. Wills—Construction of—Case at Bar.—Testator empowers his executors to set apart so much of his estate, not specifically bequeathed, as they may think sufficient to produce a clear annual income, by rent or interest, of two thousand dollars; which is directed to be distributed among certain legatees for life. And after some other unimportant provisions, he gives the balance of his estate among his nephews and nieces. And then he says, "And for the purpose of making such division with greater facility, I hereby give to my executors, or such of them as may choose to act, full power to sell or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of said property, in such time and manner and on such credit as to them may seem most beneficial for the whole."

1. QUÆRE: If the legal title to the real estate vested in the executor.

2. Same—Executors Given Power to Sell Real Estate—Purchaser Need Not Show Necessity for Sale.—The executors had full power and authority to sell all or any part of the real estate; and a bona fide purchaser from them is not bound to show that such sale was necessary for the purpose of making division among the devisees.

3. Same—Same—Liability of Purchaser—Case at Bar.—A bona fide purchaser will not be affected by the failure of the executors to account for the purchase money; and therefore evidence to prove such failure is properly excluded in an action at law between a claimant under such purchaser and the devisees.

4. Same—Same—Deed.—The executors by a deed reciting that it is made in execution of the powers vested in them, in consideration of an exchange of land made with A (one of the executors) and for the further consideration of one dollar paid by the purchaser, convey a lot belonging to 588 their testator's estate. *Such a deed on its face is not invalid; but passes the title to the purchaser.

5. Ejectment—Evidence to Vary Deed—Inadmissible.—In an action of ejectment by a party claiming under the purchaser against the devisees evidence to prove that the consideration of the deed was different from that expressed in it, is inadmissible.

3. Deeds of Trust—Case at Bar.—A deed of trust conveys two small lots in Adams' Valley, with other property; and upon its face shows that it was intended to convey all the property of the grantor. In fact three lots had been conveyed to the grantor, though two of them fronted on the same street and adjoined each other, and both together fronted but sixty-two feet on the street, and they were uninclosed.

*Ejectment—Action of—What Title Will Support.—In the principal case it is held that, a party having an interest in or claim to land held adversely by another, may, under the Code of 1849, ch. 116, sec. 5, sell and convey the same, and his grantee may maintain ejectment (or unlawful detainer) for it.

For the above, the principal case is cited and followed in Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Gratt. 363.

In Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. 339, the principal case is quoted from, but the case at bar is distinguished.

1. Same—Proof of Intention of Grantor by His Own Testimony.—It is not competent to prove by the grantor that he intended to include both parcels of the lots in his deed, though there is no objection to his competency as a witness.
2. Same—Construction of.—If it is doubtful on the face of the deed whether one or both of the parcels were intended to be conveyed, the deed will be construed most strongly against the grantor, and so as to give it effect, rather than that it should be void for uncertainty.
3. Same—Proof of Intention by Grantor as Witness—Identity of Lots.—Though it is not competent to prove by the grantor his intention to convey by his deed the land in controversy, yet he may identify the lot, and may show that it answers to the description embraced in the deed.
4. Ejectment—Possession of Part—Verdict for All.†—In an action of ejectment, the tenant, without disclaiming title to any part of the land in the declaration mentioned, proves upon the trial that he is only in possession and claiming title to a part of it. A verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for all claimed in the declaration, is not erroneous; or if it is, it is not an error by which the tenant is injured, or of which he can complain in an appellate court.
5. Appellate Practice—New Trial—Verdict Contrary to Evidence.‡—On a bill of exceptions to the refusal of the court to grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, the evidence, and not the facts proved, is stated. The court will reject all the parol evidence of the exceptor, and give full force and credit to all the evidence of his adversary; and will not reverse the judgment unless it then appears to be wrong.

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, brought by Isaac A. Goddin against George M. Carrington, to recover possession of a lot in Adams' Valley, fronting on Fifteenth street. The lot belonged to Richard 589 Adams *in his lifetime. He died in 1816, possessed of a very large real estate in the city of Richmond, having first made his will, which was duly admitted to record in the Hustings court of the city. By the first clause of his will he says, "It is my will and desire that my executors hereinafter to be appointed, will set apart so much of my property, not herein specifically bequeathed, as they may think sufficient to produce a clear annual income, by rent of interest, of two thousand dollars. Which amount I wish them to pay, and I hereby give in manner following, viz: The sum of five hundred dollars annually to my sisters Tabitha, Elizabeth Griffin and Anna Carrington, and to my niece Sally Bland Adams, to be paid to each of them for and during her life."

The testator then gives the burying ground including an acre, to his family, and one thousand dollars to his nephew Richard Lee Smith, which he says is all that this nephew is to receive from his estate; and then comes the residuary clause, as follows: "The balance of my property of every sort, kind or denomination, whether real or personal, in possession, expectancy or reversion, I give and bequeath to all my nieces and nephews, (except the two already herein provided for,) to them and their heirs forever. And for the purpose of making such division with greater facility, I hereby give to my executors, or such of them as may choose to act, full power to sell or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of said property, in such time and manner and on such credit as to them may seem most beneficial for the whole; provided that the old mansion-house, the two lots immediately attached thereto, and the four lots now used and enclosed as my garden, be assigned, at a valuation of twenty thousand dollars, to Richard Adams, the son of my brother Samuel G. Adams; and in case of his death under the age of twenty-one years, 590 then *the property last mentioned shall be signed as aforesaid to Richard Henry Adams, the son of my brother John Adams, as so much of the legacy of the whole estate.

The testator appointed his brothers John and Samuel G. Adams and his brother in law William Marshall, his executors, and directed that they should not be required to give security, except that so many of them as qualified should become jointly bound. Marshall died in the lifetime of the testator; the other two qualified and executed bonds in the penalty of one million of dollars.

By deed bearing date the 20th day of January 1819, John and Samuel G. Adams, as executors of Richard Adams, by virtue of the power vested in them, "and for and in consideration of an exchange of land made with John Adams, and for the further consideration of one dollar paid by Thomas H. Drew," conveyed to said Drew a lot in the city of Richmond, fronting on Fifteenth street, about thirty-three feet six inches, and running back of irregular width one hundred feet. This was the lot in controversy. And on the same day John Adams and wife conveyed to Drew another lot adjoining the first, and fronting about twenty-nine feet on the same street. It appears also that about the same time John Adams and wife conveyed to Drew another lot fronting forty-four feet on Fifteenth street, but not adjoining the other lots.

By deed bearing date the 6th day of August 1819, the firm of Drew, Blair & Carroll, of which Thomas H. Drew was a member, conveyed to Andrew Stevenson and two others, all their property, social and individual, including their household furniture, in trust to secure certain debts due to the Farmers Bank and the Bank of the United States. In this deed is conveyed two small lots in Adams' Valley, the property of Thomas H. Drew. In 1853 Stevenson 591 the surviving *trustee sold, and by deed bearing date the 14th day of April of that year, conveyed to Isaac A. Goddin a lot fronting sixty-two feet on Fifteenth street, embracing both the lots conveyed to Drew by the two deeds of the 20th of January 1819, hereinbefore mentioned. And on the same day he conveyed to George W. Ruffin the other lot conveyed to Drew by John Adams and wife.

On the trial of the cause the plaintiff introduced in evidence the will of Richard Adams, the deeds of the 20th January 1819, the deed from Drew, &c., to Stevenson, &c., and the deed from Stevenson to him. The defendant then introduced in evidence the deed from Stevenson to Ruffin and the deed from John Adams and wife to Drew for the same lot. He also introduced evidence to prove that he only claimed the lot conveyed by the executors to Drew, and that at the time of the conveyance by Stevenson to the plaintiff, he was in possession of that lot, claiming it as the property of Richard Adams' estate, of which he was the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, and was beside interested by devise, by purchase and as guardian of his infant children to the extent of one-third thereof. He proved that he entered it upon the assessor's books in 1842 as the property of Richard Adams' estate, and had paid the taxes on it ever since; and that in 1849 he had filled up the lot. And to show that the executors of Richard Adams had not duly executed the powers vested in them by his will, in executing the deed to Drew, but that said deed was a breach of their trust, offered to produce in evidence the settlements of the accounts of the executors, to show that they had never credited Richard Adams' estate with anything as the consideration of said deed for said lot, and that moreover the executors, both of whom died insolvent, were largely in arrear to the parties interested in said estate.
592 But the plaintiff *objected to the introduction of the accounts, and the court sustained the objection: Whereupon the defendant excepted.

The plaintiff introduced a witness to prove that the lot in controversy had not been enclosed by the defendant until a few days before the sale by Stevenson; and that it had previously been vacant for upwards of twenty-seven years. The plaintiff also introduced Thomas H. Drew as a witness. He said that when he made the deed to Stevenson he meant to include in it all the property he had in Adams' Valley. That he considered there were but two lots. That he never saw the deeds by which they were conveyed to him until long after the deed to Stevenson was executed, and did not know that there were three deeds, or that either of them was by the executors. That John Adams being indebted to him, and greatly embarrassed, proposed to let him have the lots for the debt, and promised to have them conveyed, and afterwards told him it was done. He had no treaty about them with the executors, but the consideration for them was the debt of John Adams: There was no exchange of land between him and John Adams. He said further that he never took actual possession of the lot in controversy: It remained vacant. That he had never paid taxes for it; though he supposed he had until within the previous eighteen months, when upon examination he found he had paid taxes on the other two lots, but not on that conveyed by the executors.

The evidence having been introduced, the defendant moved the court to give the following instructions:

1. If from the evidence the jury believe, that at the time of the purchase by the plaintiff of the property in dispute from Stevenson as trustee, the defendant held adverse possession, claiming to be entitled thereto, and had previously openly 593 exercised acts of *ownership over it, and for not less than ten years had paid the taxes upon the property, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action.

2. That the aforesaid deed from John and Samuel G. Adams to said Drew was on its face not a due execution of the power and authority conferred by the will of Richard Adams, but a violation thereof and a breach of trust, which did not give the said Drew a legal title to the premises conveyed in the said deed; and that the said conveyance of Drew to Stevenson did not give him a legal title to the lot in dispute.

3. That if from the evidence the jury believe, that the lot in possession of the defendant and claimed by him is entirely a distinct lot from the two lots in the aforesaid two deeds from John Adams and wife to Drew; and that Stevenson under the trust deed from Drew and others, has sold those other two lots, and his right to do so as to them has not been disputed or questioned, then the jury are not authorized to consider the lot in the possession of the defendant as conveyed in the said trust deed to Stevenson, or that he had as trustee a right to sell and convey the same.

4. That the parol testimony hereinbefore set forth as given in by the witness Drew, that in his trust deed to Stevenson he meant to include the lot in controversy, was legally inadmissible, and they ought to disregard it in making up their verdict.

But the court refused to give the said instructions; being of opinion, that a bargainee under a deed from a bargainor who was out of possession, and against whom adverse possession was held, may, under the Code of Virginia maintain ejectment in his own name; and also being of opinion that the deed from John and Samuel G. Adams as executors of Richard Adams, was at law on its face a sufficient execution of the power of sale and conveyance con-
594 ferred upon them *by the will of Richard Adams: And likewise being of opinion that the matter embraced in the third instruction asked for was a matter entirely for the jury; and as to which no instruction should be given by the court.

The court also refused to give the fourth instruction; and in lieu thereof, the competency of Drew not being objected to, instructed the jury to disregard so much of his testimony as relates to what lots he meant to embrace in his deed of trust to Stevenson and others; and that they were to consider only that portion of his testimony which tends to identify the lot in controversy, and to show that it answers to the description embraced in said deed. Whereupon the defendant excepted to the opinion and decision of the court.

The plaintiff also asked the court to instruct the jury, that the evidence of Thomas H. Drew, in so far as it affects or discloses the consideration upon which the deed from the executors of Richard Adams to him was founded, was not to be regarded by the jury. This instruction the court gave; and the defendant again excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for all the land claimed in the declaration. And thereupon the defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence: But the court overruled the motion; and the defendant again excepted, referring in the exception to the evidence stated in the previous exceptions; which it was admitted was all the evidence in the cause. From the judgment of the court below the defendant applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

Morson, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That the court erred in instruct-
595 ing the jury *that the bargainee in a deed from a bargainor out of possession, and against whom adverse possession is held, may, under the Code of 1849, maintain ejectment in his own name. He referred to Tabb v. Baird, 3 Call 475, Hopkins v. Ward, 6 Munf. 38, See v. Greenlee, Id. 303, to show that previous to the Code of 1849, such a party could not maintain ejectment; and he insisted that the purpose and effect of the act, Code, ch. 116, § 5, p. 500, was to do away with the illegality of making such deeds; but not to enable the bargainee to sue in his own name. And he further said that although in Taylor's devisees v. Rightmire, 8 Leigh 468, it was held that devisees who had not had possession might maintain the action, yet that the language of the statute of wills of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, p. 375, upon which that case was decided, was very different from the act relied on to sustain this action; and that there was wanting in the latter act the words upon which the judges rested their opinion in that case.

2d. That the court erred in instructing the jury that the deed from John and Samuel G. Adams as executors of Richard Adams, was at law on its face a sufficient execution of the powers of sale and conveyance vested in them. That the will of Richard Adams gave to his devisees the legal title to his residuary real estate, of which this lot was a part; and the executors had but a naked power, which must be strictly pursued to enable them to pass the title to a purchaser. 3 Lom. Dig. p. 272, 273; Sugd. on Powers 132, 133, 264; Banister & wife v. McKenzie, 6 Munf. 447; Nalle v. Fenwick, 4 Rand. 585; Allen v. Smith, 1 Leigh 231; Chapman v. Bennett, 2 Leigh 329; Stainback v. Read & Co., 11 Gratt. 281; Stainback v. Bank of Virginia, Id. 269; Bank of U. S. v. Beirne, 1 Gratt. 234; Jesse v. Preston, 5 Gratt. 120; Gibson v. Jones, 5 Leigh 370.

That the deed showed on its face that 596 the power was *not properly exercised, as the consideration is stated to be an exchange of land, which the power does not authorize them to make, and which could not have been necessary for the purposes of the power. He referred to Spence v. Bagwell, 6 Gratt. 444; Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Gratt. 518, 550. He distinguished this case from Mosby v. Mosby, 9 Gratt. 584; and insisted that even if these executors had a trust coupled with their power, they did not therefore have the legal estate. Hill on Trustees, p. 238, marg. 334 top.

3d. That the court erred in refusing to give the third instruction asked for by the defendant, and in referring the question to the jury. The question was upon the construction of the deed from Drew to Stevenson; and whether it passed the lot in controversy. To pass property the deed must describe it so as to identify it, otherwise it is void. 2 Lom. Dig. 191, § 5, 210, § 9.

4th. That the court should have given the fourth instruction as asked: the rule that parol evidence is inadmissible in such a question being well settled; 2 Lom. Dig. 192, § 8; and should not have given that asked by the plaintiff; as evidence of Drew thereby excluded went not to add to or alter the deed; but to fortify it as it appeared on its face; and proved that the deed from the executors was a fraud upon the power, and therefore utterly null and void.

5th. That there should have been a new trial. If any of the rulings of the court upon the trial were erroneous, it was good cause for a new trial. 2 Tuck. Com. 305; Guerrant v. Tinder, Gilm. 36. But in fact the plaintiff made out no case which entitled him to recover.

6th. That there was error in the verdict in finding that the defendant withheld the whole premises claimed in the declaration, when the evidence showed that he was only in possession of a part, and set 597 up *no claim to the rest. He referred to 2 Starkie's Evi. 432, marg. pl. 5; Code of 1849, p. 560, § 16.

Sands and Crump, for the appellee, insisted:

1st. That though it is true that the old rule as to the right of a bargainee taking a deed for land in the adverse possession of another, was as stated by the counsel for the appellant, yet that the rule had been changed by the Code of 1849, ch. 116, § 5, p. 500. This statute was intended to put grantees in deeds in the same condition as devisees in the wills; and although the verbiage of the statute of wills of 1819 is pruned down, yet the word "interest" is retained, which is certainly of as extensive meaning as any of the words that are omitted. Under that statute it was held that devisees never in possession might maintain the action. Taylor's devisees v. Rightmire, 8 Leigh 468. They referred to the Code, ch. 135, § 4, p. 558, which provides that no person shall bring the action unless he has at the time of commencing it a subsisting interest in the premises and a right to recover it; and by § 6, the name of the real claimant must be inserted as plaintiff: And thus if the action may not be brought in the name of the bargainee the remedy is lost, as the bargainor has no subsisting interest in the premises.

2d. That the deed from the executors to Drew was a valid deed, and within the scope of their powers. That from the terms of the will, and especially from the provision as to the annuity of two thousand dollars, the legal title vested in the executors; and that their deed passed it to Drew. 2 Lom. Dig. 382, top; 1 Id. 427; Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 358; Mosby v. Mosby, 9 Gratt. 584. And they referred to the opinion of Judge Moncure in this latter case, as equally applicable to the present, and as showing that the executors were clothed with the title and a trust. That there was no fraud upon the face of the deed.
598 *The exchange spoken of was not an exchange between the executors and Drew, but between John Adams in his own right and the executors; and even if it was with Drew it cannot be said that it is impossible an exchange could have been expedient for the purpose of a division of the estate. They also referred to 1 Sugd. on Powers 265, 331; Steele v. Levisay, 11 Gratt. 454.

3d. That the deed from Drew to Stevenson passed the lots in controversy. Although the two lots adjoining were conveyed to him by two deeds, yet they adjoined, and in fact constituted one lot; and by howsoever many deeds Drew received them, there was no necessity on him to describe them as other than they were. But if there was any ambiguity in the deed produced by extraneous proof, then it may be explained. 3 Lom. Dig. 139, marg.: Morrell v. Cook, 35 Maine R. 207.

4th. That as to the third and fourth points made by the counsel on the other side, the court excluded the evidence of Drew except as to the identity of the lot, and referred that to the jury. That there was no ambiguity in the deed without his evidence, and it was therefore of no importance; but if it was, he might remove an ambiguity which he produced, by his evidence. As to the consideration of the deed, that was expressed on its face; and though you may prove other considerations of the same nature as those expressed, it is not competent to prove that the consideration expressed was not a consideration of the deed. As to fraud upon the face of the deed, that of course must be found in the deed itself; and as to the mode of proving fraud in a deed, that is stated in 2 Lom. Dig. 294, marg.; and in the Code, ch. 172, § 5, p. 654.

5th. That the bill of exceptions to the refusal of the court to grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, is improperly taken,
599 *the evidence being given and not the facts. Vaiden's Case, 12 Gratt. 717, is the last case on the subject. As to erroneous rulings of the court, they have already been considered.

6th. That the verdict for the whole land claimed is correct. Code, ch. 135, § 25, 27. The defendant did not disclaim title to any part on the record. But if it was error, it is one which cannot injure the appellant; and from which therefore he had no right to appeal.

MONCURE, J. The first question arising in this case is, Did the Circuit court err in instructing the jury that a bargainee, under a deed from a bargainor who was out of possession, and against whom adverse possession was held, may, under the new Code, maintain ejectment in his own name?

It is very clear that before the Code took effect, a bargainee of a party not in possession, actual or constructive, at the time of the execution of the deed, could not maintain ejectment in his own name, at least against the party at that time in the adverse possession of the land. His disability to maintain the action proceeded, not from the act against conveying or taking pretensed titles, 1 Rev. Code 375, but from the common law, whose maxim it was that nothing in action or entry could be granted over. A feoffment was void without livery of seisin; and without possession there could be no livery of seisin. 4 Kent Com. 448; 2 Lom. Dig. 8, 9. The statute of uses, 1 Rev. Code 370, § 29, did not remove the disability, because it only operated on a possession existing in the bargainor at the time of the execution of the deed, and transferred that possession to the use created or declared in favor of the bargainee. If no possession existed in the bargainor, of course none could be transferred to the bargainee. But the Code has changed the common law rule by 600 *declaring that "any interest in or claim to real estate may be disposed of by deed or will." Ch. 116, § 5, p. 500. That such a change was contemplated by the revisors, is manifest from their report, p. 602, § 5, and note‡. They recommended the adoption of a section similar to 8 and 9 Vict. ch. 106, § 6; in which "a right of entry" is expressly named. Instead of adopting that section, which is complicated in its details, the legislature enacted the provision before quoted. Their object was to use brief and plain terms, which would be at least as extensive in their meaning as the terms used in the statute of Victoria. They could not have used more comprehensive terms than they did. A right of entry is certainly "an interest in or claim to real estate," and may therefore "be disposed of by deed or will." If it may be so disposed of, the grantee or devisee may bring the action in his own name. The right of action is incident to the right of entry, and comes along with it to the grantee or devisee: otherwise it would exist nowhere; for it cannot remain in the grantor or devisor, who has disposed of the right of entry, and has no longer any interest in or claim to the land which can give him any right of action. There can be no right without a remedy, nor a remedy without a right. These views are strongly sustained by the case of Taylor's devisees v. Rightmire, 8 Leigh 468, and the opinion of Carr, J., and Tucker, P., therein. It was held in that case that a writ of right may be maintained by devisee upon the seisin of his testator, under the statute of wills, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 1, p. 375. The terms of that statute are certainly not stronger in favor of the right of action in the devisee, than the terms of the provision of the new Code, before referred to. I am therefore of opinion that the court did not err in giving the instruction in question. The second question is, Did the court err in in-

601 structing *the jury that the deed from John and S. G. Adams, as executors of Richard Adams, was at law, on its face, a sufficient execution of the powers of sale and conveyance conferred upon them by the will of their testators?

The question was much discussed in the argument of this case, Whether the power conferred on the executors by the will was a naked power, or a power coupled with an interest? In other words, Whether or not the executors were invested with a legal title to the estate? But in my view of the case, it is unnecessary to decide that question. It is true, that if trustees invested with the legal title to an estate conveyed it to another in plain violation of the trust, and even by a deed which on its face shows such violation, the title of the grantee is good at law, and resort must be had to a court of equity to set aside the deed. But it is also, I apprehend, equally true, that if the donee of a power make a sale and conveyance in pursuance of the power, the title of his grantee will be as good at law as if he had been invested with the legal title. The donor of the power being clothed with the legal title, and having empowered another to pass it from him in a certain way, the execution of the power in that way, as effectually invest the appointee with the title, as if it had been directly conveyed to him by the donor. The appointee takes the estate under the donor, and not under the appointor, who is a mere ministerial agent in passing the title. Thus we see the difference, and so far as concerns the present question the only difference, between the two cases of conveyance by a trustee invested with a legal title, and a conveyance by a donee of a power conferred on him by the owner of the estate conveyed. In the former case, the trustee may pass the legal title as any other owner may. In the latter, the donee of the power can pass it only 602 in the prescribed *mode. But having passed it in that mode, he places the grantee on the same impregnable ground at law, which is occupied by a grantee in the former case. In either case, the title, though impregnable at law, is assailable in equity; and on the same or similar grounds: As where the trustee or appointor has committed a breach of trust or fraud in the execution of the trust or power, in which the grantee participated; or of which he had notice; or for which he may be otherwise responsible. An illusory appointment, if made in pursuance of the power, is good at law, and is assailable alone in equity on the ground of fraud. The obligation of a purchaser in certain cases to see to the application of the purchase money, is an obligation which does not affect his legal title, and can be enforced only in equity; whether the purchase be made from a trustee invested with the legal title or in pursuance of a mere power of sale. A bona fide purchaser without notice from one clothed with a mere power of sale, but who, in making the sale and conveyance, has pursued the terms of the power, is entitled to the same advantage and protection with such a purchaser from a trustee invested with the legal title.

Having stated the principles of law which bear upon the question under consideration, in my view of it, let us now see how they apply to this case. The will certainly confers very extensive power and discretion upon the executors in regard to the whole estate, real and personal. By its first clause it empowers them to set apart so much of the testator's property, not specifically bequeathed, as they may think sufficient to produce a clear annual income, by rent or interest, of two thousand dollars; which is directed to be distributed among certain legatees for life. And after giving the family burying ground to certain of his relations, and one thousand dollars to 603 one of his *nephews, it gives the balance of his estate to his nephews and nieces, (except the two thereinbefore provided for). It then proceeds in these words: "And for the purpose of making such divisions with greater facility, I hereby give to my executors, or such of them as may choose to act, full power to sell or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of said property, in such time and manner and on such credit as to them may seem most beneficial for the whole." And then follows a proviso in regard to the old mansion-house lots and thereto appurtenant.

The executors are required to set apart a very large amount of property or money, sufficient to produce a clear annual income, by rent or interest, of two thousand dollars. To do this, it might have been, and probably was, necessary to sell a portion of the estate, real or personal; and whether necessary to do so or not, a purchaser from them would not be presumed to know, and if he acted bona fide, would be protected in his purchase. In the residuary clause full power is given to the executors to sell or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of the residuum, in such time and manner, and on such credit as to them may seem most beneficial for the whole. It is scarcely possible to conceive broader terms in which a power of sale or disposition could be given. It is true this broad power is given "for the purpose of making such divisions with greater facility." But surely this sentence was not inserted in the will to make the necessity of a sale for the purpose of a division, a condition precedent to the exercise of the power. If it had been, then, undoubtedly, no title could have been acquired under the power unless the condition precedent existed; and the burden of proving its existence would devolve on the purchaser in order to maintain his title. This might be very inconvenient, if not impossible. But he who owns an estate may prescribe the 604 terms *on which alone it shall cease to be his; and they who deal for its acquisition must take care that all the prescribed terms and conditions are strictly complied with. Upon this principle it has been held, that if a mere power be given to sell real estate for the payment of debts in case the personal estate should be deficient, the power does not arise unless the personal estate be actually deficient; and that a purchaser must, at his peril, ascertain the fact, notwithstanding that the purpose provided for be the payment of debts generally. Whereas a mere power to sell for payment of debts generally, without such a condition precedent, would not impose upon the purchaser the obligation of seeing to the application of the purchase money, much less invalidate his title at law in case the purchase money should be misapplied. 1 Lom. Dig. 246, Marg.; Sug. Law Ven. 847. But a reasonable construction must be put upon the will to ascertain whether the testator intended to make the necessity of a sale for the purpose of division, a condition precedent to the exercise of the power. We must not construe the will in reference to what has since transpired, but must go back to its date, put ourselves in the place of the testator, in the midst of all the circumstances which then surrounded him, and thus ascertain the meaning of his language. He must have intended to have his estate disposed of to the best advantage for the benefit of his residuary devisees. To have imposed upon every purchaser the burden of ascertaining the actual necessity for a sale, would have defeated the purpose of the power, or greatly impaired the capacity of his executors for its beneficial execution. An intention to create such a clog, ought to be shown by plain words, and not left to be inferred from doubtful ones. As to the nature of these conditional powers, and their impolicy and inconvenience, see Hill on Trustees 478; 2 Sug. Pow. 503.

605 The preliminary *words in the clause conferring the power in this case were used merely to show the purpose for which it was conferred, and not to create a condition precedent to its exercise. A power of sale coupled with a trust is always conferred for some purpose; which is generally expressed on the face of the power: but such expression of purpose rarely creates a condition precedent to the exercise of the power. The power does not depend in this case on the necessity of a sale for the purpose of division—such a necessity is not mentioned in the will, and was not contemplated by the testator. The power was conferred "for the purpose of making such division with greater facility." But whether, and to what extent, and in what manner, it would be proper to exercise it, was left to the sound discretion of the executors, subject alone to the control of the courts. The testator selected for the execution of the power and trust, his brothers and brother in law, in whom he reposed great confidence, and of whom he required no security as executors, except each for the other. They were the fathers of some, if not most, of the residuary devisees, and were doubtless men of high character and great responsibility. The estate entrusted to their care by the testator was of immense value; the penalty of each of the two executorial bonds which were given, being a million of dollars. He gave them full power to sell or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of the property in such time and manner and on such credit as to them might seem most beneficial for the whole. Whether most beneficial for the whole or not, was referred alone to their discretion. The necessity, or even expediency, for a sale of the whole for the purpose of making a division with greater facility, was hardly possible. And yet, full power is given to sell the whole or any part: as if to remove all restraint, and give assurance to purchasers that they might deal 606 *with the executors without doubt as to their capacity to confer a good title. The trust was to be one of long duration, and to be executed at different times. The beneficiaries were numerous, and many if not most of them were probably infants. The large subject directed to be set apart to produce the annual rent or interest of two thousand dollars, could only be divided among the residuary devisees, as or after those to whom that income was given, died. The old mansion-house, with certain lots thereto appurtenant, was directed to be assigned, at a valuation of twenty thousand dollars, to one nephew, and in case of his death under the age of twenty-one years, to another nephew, as so much of his share of the whole estate. The testator seems not to have contemplated that a final division would be made among his residuary divisees until after they all arrived at the age of twenty-one years: though he no doubt intended that in the meantime partial divisions might be made among them and advancements made to them, in property or money, as occasion might require; to be accounted for in the final division.

In view of all these circumstances I am of opinion that the power of sale, though conferred on the executors for a special purpose, was yet to be exercised at their discretion; that for the proper exercise of that discretion a bona fide purchaser from them for .valuable consideration was not responsible; and that a deed purporting to be a conveyance by them to such a purchaser in pursuance of the power, would at law, on its face, be a sufficient execution of the power. But the question is, Whether the deed under which the defendant in error claims in this case, has that effect? There can be nothing on the face of that deed which can affect its validity, unless it be the words "and for and in consideration of an exchange of land made with John Adams, "inserted therein.

607 *It was argued by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, that the deed shows on its face that it was executed in consideration of an exchange of land made with John Adams, one of the executors, individually, by the grantee Drew, and not for the purpose of making a division among the residuary legatees. It was argued on the other hand by the counsel for the defendant in error, that these words, taken in connection with the context, show that the exchange of land referred to was made with John Adams by the executors of Richard Adams, and not by Drew. I think the latter is the true construction. The deed refers to the will of Richard Adams, recites the power of sale therein contained, purports to be executed by the executors by virtue of the power vested in them, and contains covenants exclusively relating to the said testator's estate; thus indicating that the exchange which was the consideration of the deed had been made by the executors in the execution, or supposed execution of their trust. The words before quoted consist with this view; and rather with it than the opposite. The executors, "by virtue of the power vested in them, and for and in consideration of an exchange of land made with John Adams, and for the further consideration of one dollar by the said Drew to them in hand paid," have granted, &c. That is, "the executors, in consideration of an exchange of land made by them with John Adams," &c. The substantial consideration, to wit, the exchange, passed between John Adams and the executors. The nominal consideration, to wit, one dollar, was paid by Drew to the executors. Regarding this as the true construction of the words in question, Do they invalidate the deed at law? I think not. The only ground on which it can be contended that they do, is that the executors had no power to make an exchange of land, especially with one of themselves.

608 They had "full *power to sell or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part, &c. as to them might seem most beneficial for the whole," &c. It might have seemed to them most beneficial for the whole to make an exchange of land with John Adams, "for the purpose of making the division with greater facility." We may well suppose that the estate consisting perhaps of many parcels of land in different parts of the city, it might have been highly beneficial to the parties concerned, and much facilitated a division among them, to have made an exchange of some of the land for other land which was more salable, or which, by being attached to some other land belonging to the estate, rendered it more desirable, and more susceptible of easy division. In such a case, did not the testator intend to empower his executors to make the exchange? If not, what did he mean by giving them power, not only to sell, but otherwise to dispose of the whole or any part? Might not an exchange be a convenient and beneficial mode of executing even the power of sale? An owner of a large estate in detached parcels, in selling at different times to different persons, often finds it convenient and prudent to sell portions of it for other property more easily or advantageously convertible into money. An exchange, it is true, is not a usual mode of making partition or making a sale; but it might be proper; and it would be too much to say that the executors, in this case, had no power under any circumstances or to any extent, however small, to make one. It does not appear to what extent the exchange was made. The record only shows that John Adams thereby acquired a small lot of little value in Adams' Valley; for which he may have given in exchange another lot of much greater value to the testator's estate. Then, does the circumstance of its being made with one of themselves ipso facto render it void? I think not. A trustee cannot be a purchaser

609 *at his own sale. But then the purchase is only voidable, not void. It may be for the interest of the beneficiaries; who may therefore choose to let it stand. They have an easy mode of avoiding it, if they elect to do so. But that is by a suit in equity, brought in proper time; and not by an objection to the title of the purchaser in a suit at law, especially after a great lapse of time, and after the title has passed to bona fide purchasers without notice of any such objection. 1 Sugd. Law Vend. ed. of 1851, p. 62, marg.; 2 Id. 887, and notes. An exchange stands on the same footing with a sale in this respect. I am therefore of opinion that the court did not err in refusing to give the second instruction asked for by the plaintiff in error, nor in giving the instruction which it did in lieu thereof.

Thirdly. Did the court err in refusing to give the third instruction asked for by the plaintiff in error, and saying that it was a matter entirely for the jury?

The deed from Drew to Stevenson conveys "two small lots in Adams' valley." There is no patent ambiguity. A deed conveying all the land of the grantor in a certain county, is not void for uncertainty. Vanmeters' ex'ors v. Vanmeters, 3 Gratt. 148. Nor is a deed conveying all the estate both real and personal, to which the grantor is entitled. Mundy v. Vawter, Id. 518. Though notice of such a deed as the latter would not affect a subsequent purchaser from the grantor unless he had notice that the land purchased by him was embraced by the deed. Id. If Drew had only two small lots in Adams' Valley, then there was no latent ambiguity, and these two lots passed by the deed. But it is contended that if he owned the lot in controversy, he had three small lots in Adams' Valley, and that the deed is therefore void for uncertainty; or, at least, did not pass the lot in controversy. It is true that one of the lots owned by 610 Drew in *Adams' Valley was composed of two small lots, one of which had belonged to Richard Adams, and the other to John Adams. But John Adams had acquired the former from the executors of Richard Adams, no doubt with the view of adding it to the latter, which was too small to be of much value; and afterwards sold the lot, composed of the two small parcels, to Drew. The two parcels were conveyed to Drew by different deeds, because Richard Adams' executors had made no deed to John Adams, (who was one of them;) and therefore Richard Adams' executors made a deed directly to Drew for one parcel, while John Adams made a deed to him for the other. But the two deeds bear date on the same day, and are parts of the same transaction. The two parcels, when they became the property of one owner, became but one lot; which well answers the description of a small lot, fronting but sixty-two feet on Fifteenth street, and running back about one hundred feet in the form of a wedge. Drew owning this lot and another in Adams' Valley, (which other had also at the same time been derived from John Adams,) shortly thereafter executed the deed to Stevenson, conveying "two small lots in Adams' Valley." That that deed embraced the parcel of land which had belonged to Richard Adams as aforesaid (and which is the land in controversy) is evident, not only from what has been already said, but from the intention plainly apparent on the face of the deed to convey all the property of the grantors. But even if it were doubtful whether one or both of the parcels aforesaid were intended to be conveyed, I would construe the deed most strongly against the grantor, and so as to give it effect, rather than that it should be void for uncertainty.

Fourthly. I think the Circuit court did not err in refusing to give the fourth instruction asked for by the plaintiff in error, and giving the instruction which it did in lieu thereof.

611 *Fifthly. I think the court did not err in sustaining the objection of the defendant in error to the admissibility of the recorded settlements of the accounts of Richard Adams' executors, which the plaintiff in error offered to produce in evidence. The deed being made by the executors to Drew in consideration of an exchange of land between the executors and John Adams, and not of money paid to them by Drew; of course the executorial accounts would show no credit to the estate for the price of the land conveyed. But the deed being at law upon its face, as I have already endeavored to show, a sufficient execution of the power of sale and conveyance conferred by the will of Richard Adams upon his executors; it follows, as I have also endeavored to show, that the title of Drew under that deed was good at law, and cannot there be impeached by any evidence of a breach of trust by the executors in not accounting for the price of the land conveyed. Therefore the settlements which were offered for that purpose were irrelevant and inadmissible evidence.

Sixthly. For the same reason, I think the court did not err in giving the instruction asked for by the defendant in error, that the evidence of Drew, in so far as it affected or disclosed the consideration upon which the deed to him from Adams' executors was founded, was not to be regarded by the jury. That evidence was introduced to show a breach of trust by the executors; for which purpose, according to what has been said, it was inadmissible. But it tends to confirm the construction I have put upon the deed and to repel that construction, which would make the deed a breach of trust on its face. In any view of the evidence, it was properly excluded.

Seventhly and lastly. Did the court err in overruling the motion of the plaintiff in error for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against law and evidence?

612 *The objections taken to the rulings and opinions of the court during the trial, which are also relied on as grounds for a new trial, having already been considered and disposed of, it is unnecessary to notice them any further. The remaining ground relied on is that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. The bill of exceptions states the evidence of the witnesses examined on the trial, instead of the facts appearing to the court to have been proved by such evidence. This court cannot therefore, according to our well settled practice, take cognizance of the case and reverse the judgment, unless by rejecting all the parol evidence for the exceptor, and giving full force and credit to that of the adverse party, the decision of the court below still appears to be wrong. The application of that test puts an end to the case. But looking at the whole evidence, I do not think that the judgment ought to be reversed on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence. The only objection taken to the verdict under this head is, that it is for the whole lot claimed in the declaration, while the evidence shows that the plaintiff in error was in possession of, and claimed title to, only a part of the lot, viz: the part conveyed to Drew by the executors of Richard Adams. The plea of not guilty put in issue the title to the whole lot, and gave no notice of an intention to claim only a part. The evidence showed that the defendant in error was entitled to the whole, and that the plaintiff in error was in possession of, and claimed title to a part. On this evidence the jury properly rendered a verdict for the premises in the declaration mentioned. Code, ch. 135, § 25, p. 561. At all events, if there be any error in this respect, it is not an error to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error, and therefore the judgment should not be reversed on that ground.

I am of opinon that there is no error in the judgment, and that it ought to be affirmed.

613 *SAMUELS, J. In my opinion the will of Richard Adams conferred on his executors a mere power over his real estate; that it gave them (amongst other things) power to set apart so much of the real estate as they might think sufficient to produce a clear annual rent of two thousand dollars, for payment of annuities for the lives of the annuitants; that if the executors thought proper to exercise this power, by setting apart real estate for this purpose, then the direction to the executors to pay the rent for the lives of the annuitants, must be held, by implication of law, to confer an estate of equal duration upon the executors; that as the interest of the annuitants respectively expired, the residuary devisees would succeed to their portions. That in this mode, to this extent and for this purpose only would the executors acquire any interest in the testator's real estate; not by devise directly from him, but by virtue of the power conferred on them.

I am further of opinion that the consideration mentioned in the deed of bargain and sale from Adams' executors to Drew, must be held to move from the bargainee. This consideration is of two parts, to wit: "an exchange of land with John Adams," "and for the further consideration of one dollar by the said Drew to them in hand paid," &c. The parts of this consideration seem to have taken different directions; one having gone to John Adams alone in his own right; the other to the executors as such. If the executors, as such, had made an exchange with John Adams acting in his own right, it is difficult to perceive why the fact should be mentioned in their deed to Drew, or how it could be regarded as a consideration paid by him; yet without doubt the substantial consideration was the exchange, and not the nominal sum of one dollar.

Holding then that the deed was 614 intended to perfect *an exchange between John Adams and Drew, I cannot find any authority to make it in the power conferred by the will, large as it is. I am of opinion, therefore, that the judgment should be reversed, for the reason that the Circuit court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that the deed was invalid.

I concur in the opinion of Judge Moncure on the other questions presented by the record.

ALLEN, P., and LEE, J., concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

DANIEL, J., concurred generally in the opinion of Moncure, J.; but was inclined to think that the power to provide for the annuities vested the executors with the legal title; and therefore if the ground taken by him was not sound, still their conveyance would be valid.

Judgment affirmed.

Same v. Coke's Ex'or & als.

January Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Conveyance of Property in Consideration of Covenant to Pay Annuity—Case at Bar.—A conveys real and personal property on a consideration of a sum of money and of an annuity for the life of the grantor, if she survives the grantee, from the death of the grantee; and in the deed the grantee covenants that his estate shall pay to the grantor if she survives him, the annuity. HELD:

1. Same—Does Not Create Charge upon Property in Preference to Creditors.—This does not create a charge upon the property conveyed, so as to entitle the grantor to subject the same to the payment of the annuity after the death of the grantee, in preference to other creditors of the grantee.

2. Same—Vendor's Lien.—The conveyance is in consideration of the covenant of the grantee that his estate shall pay the annuity, and the vendor's lien does not attach upon the property.

*Conveyance of Property in Consideration of Covenant to Pay Annuity—Vendor's Lien.—In Whiteley v. Central Trust Co., 76 Fed. Rep. 79-80, it is said: "What the circumstances are which will determine the existence or nonexistence of the lien is often a question of difficult determination, and has given rise to certain nice distinctions which have crystallized into rules of decision, somewhat arbitrary in their consequence. Thus it seems to be settled that, if the consideration be that the vendee will enter into certain covenants, as for the payment of an annuity to A. and a certain sum to another in the event of the death of the vendor, the consideration on the one side is the conveyance of the estate, and upon the other side the entering into the covenants; in which case, if no lien be reserved, none will be implied for the performance of the covenants. 13 Sim. 406; Sugd. Vend. 65, 66; McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. 615-626 et seq. The principle upon which Clarke v. Royle, and the other case cited above may be said to rest is that, where the consideration for the conveyance is the entering into an agreement to do or not to do certain things, and the remedy for a breach of such agreement consists in an action for unliquidated damages, the parties will be presumed not to have intended that the land should remain charged with a vendor's lien to secure such unliquidated damages,—damages which may never accrue, and are unascertainable by third persons dealing with the land. The consideration for the deed is deemed to be the entering into the covenants. When this is done, the covenants are deemed a substitute for the price. Indeed, the rule has been very broadly stated by most American courts to be that a vendor's lien will not arise where the consideration is unliquidated, and ascertainable only by an action sounding in damages. The existence of such a lien for the security of a covenant, accepted as the consideration for a conveyance of land, has most often arisen where the deed was in consideration that the vendee would maintain or support the vendor. Where there has been a breach of such a covenant, the great weight of opinion is that no lien exists to secure the performance thereof, unless expressly contracted for. The subject received elaborate consideration from the supreme court of Virginia in the cases of Brawley v. Catron, 8 Leigh 522, and McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. 615, and the doctrine of those cases has been generally accepted as a sound statement of the equitable doctrine touching the nonexistence of a lien where the consideration consists in the entering into covenants to do or perform acts for the breach of which the remedy at law was an action sounding in damages. Hiscock v. Norton, 42 Mich. 320-325, 3 N. W. 868; Campbell v. Campbell, 21 Mich. 438; Payne v. Avery, Id. 524-551; Arlin v. Brown, 44 N. H. 102; Harris v. Hanie, 37 Ark. 348; Bell v. In Crim v. Holsberry, 42 W. Va. 667, 26 S. E. Rep. 314, it is said: "The law is well settled that an implied equitable lien does not exist in favor of a vendor of real estate to secure the consideration therefor when such consideration is the maintenance and support of the grantors during life. McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. 615; Brawley v. Catron, 8 Leigh 522; Arlin v. Brown, 44 N. H. 102; Hiscock v. Norton, 42 Mich. 320, 3 N. W. 868; McKillup v. McKillup, 8 Bard. 552; Chase v. Peck, 21 N. Y. 581; Meigs v. Dimock, 6 Conn. 458; Hobson v. Edwards, 57 Miss. 128; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 235; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law 165."

As authority for the proposition that there is no implied equitable liens in favor of the vendor of personal property for the purchase money, the principal case is cited in the following: Cole v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 290; Williams v. Gillespie, 30 W. Va. 590, 5 S. E. Rep. 212; Hobbs v. Interchange, 1 W. Va. 67.

The principal case is cited in Renick v. Ludddington, 16 W. Va. 894, that case holding that an attorney has a lien on the judgment or decree obtained by him for his client, for services and disbursements in the case.

†Deeds—Recordation.—In Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. Rep. 876, it was said: "The recordation of a deed does not impart any force or validity to it. On the contrary, it presupposes an already perfect deed. Its only effect is, not to operate as between the parties (as a deed not recorded is just as binding on them as if recorded), but it is to give notice to those who may afterwards, for value, and without notice of the deed, purchase the land of the grantor, and to creditors. 2 Minor Inst. 871; McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. 632." The principal case is distinguished in Rorer v. Roanoke Bk., 83 Va. 610, 4 S. E. Rep. 820.

debts, his general creditors must take the real estate under the charge in the will; and must take it in the plight and condition in which he held it; and it is equitable assets, though the statute would have subjected it to the payment of his debts if there had been no such charge in the will.

5. Statute—Protection of Creditors against Unrecorded Deeds—To What Creditors Applicable.—The act, Code, ch. 118, § 11, p. 509, in relation to the creditors and purchasers who shall be protected against unrecorded deeds, does not include creditors claiming under a devise for the payment of debts, or under the statute subjecting real estate to their payment. But the creditor who may avoid such a deed must have some lien by judgment or otherwise, which entitles him to charge the subject conveyed specifically.

By deed bearing date the 29th of June 1828, Mrs. Susan Byrd, in consideration of five thousand three hundred and sixty-five dollars, conveyed to Richard Coke, jr., all her right to a tract of land in the county of Gloucester called Abingdon, supposed to contain about seven hundred acres, together with the stocks of horses, mules, sheep, hogs and cattle, and the farming implements; one four wheel carriage and harness; the household and kitchen furniture at Abingdon as it then stood; the crops growing thereon, and those then on hand; also her interest as widow and distributee of William P. Byrd in thirty-seven slaves; and also her interest as heir and distributee of three of her children who had died 617 since their father, in the *real and personal estate of the said William P. Byrd; and also fourteen slaves, which were hers in her own right; subject to a lien upon the land for five hundred pounds in favor of Rebecca Innis, the interest upon which the said Susan was entitled to for her life, and was by the deed released to the said Coke. The deed then proceeded to state that in addition to the consideration before mentioned, of five thousand three hundred and sixty-five dollars, the said Richard Coke, jr., bound himself and his heirs to maintain the said Susan Byrd during her life, in a comfortable and respectable manner, suited in all respects to a well bred lady. And in the event of Coke's death in the lifetime of Mrs. Byrd, it was covenanted and agreed that Coke's estate should pay to her three hundred dollars a year during her life, for her board, clothing and support, and let her have a maid servant; that is if she should for any cause choose to board out of the family of the said Coke. And if she should live in his family after his death, then it was covenanted that she should have her choice of the maid servants of his estate to wait on her, one room in the house at Abingdon and its furniture, to be enjoyed by her during her life, and then to be returned to his estate; and that she should receive from said Coke's estate one hundred and fifty dollars a year during her life, to purchase clothing, &c.

This deed was executed by Mrs. Byrd alone; but on it was endorsed the following memorandum, which was to be taken as a part of the deed: "I agree that in the event of my death, living Mrs. Byrd, she shall have a maid servant and the furniture for a room, to carry with her where she pleases, to be enjoyed by her during her life, and at her death to return to my estate. This my signature is to relate as well to the foregoing deed as to this memorandum. Witness my hand and seal." And it was signed and sealed by both Coke and Mrs. Byrd. The deed was admitted to 618 *record on the certificate of Mrs. Byrd's acknowledgment before two justices; and the memorandum was recorded on the acknowledgment by Coke in court.

At the time this deed was executed Coke was married to the daughter of Mrs. Byrd; and the reversion in the land and slaves mentioned therein as held by Mrs. Byrd as widow and distributee of her husband, seems to have been vested in his wife, and her two brothers and sister; and Coke purchased the interest of the brothers and sister in the property within two or three years after Mrs. Byrd's deed was executed.

On the 21st of June 1848 Coke borrowed from the Exchange Bank of Virginia at Norfolk ten thousand dollars, upon his note made to Robert McCandlish and George W. Southall, and endorsed by them; and by deed bearing date the same day, he conveyed to two trustees the tract of land called Abingdon and an adjoining tract called Woodville, in trust to secure the bank and his endorsers; and this deed provided for the renewal of the note. The deed was acknowledged by him on the same day before two justices, and certified by them for record; but it was not recorded until the 3d day of May 1851, after the death of Coke.

The note was renewed from time to time, the last having been made on the 9th of November 1850, for eight thousand eight hundred and sixty dollars, payable at four months; and Coke having died before it fell due, it was protested for nonpayment. And George W. Southall having died in November 1851, McCandlish on the 11th of February 1852 paid one-half the note, principal, interest and charges of protest, amounting at that time to four thousand six hundred and seventy-nine dollars and twenty-five cents.

It appears that Richard Coke died in possession of a large estate, but indebted to a large amount, probably more than enough

Va. 608, 29 S. E. Rep. 324, it is said: "It is the established doctrine in this state that the rights of the general creditors of a decedent's estate are subject to all the equities attaching thereto at the time of his death; that they take the estate in the same plight and condition in which the debtor left it, and their rights cannot be enlarged and improved beyond those of the debtor, to the prejudice of a creditor who has taken a lien, though he may have failed to record it. The creditor who seeks to assail it must come with a lien by judgment or otherwise giving him a right to charge the property specifically. McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. 615."

to absorb the whole. By his will, which was dated on the 30th of December 619 1849, *and admitted to probat on the 16th of April 1851, he subjected his whole estate, real and personal, to the payment of his debts, with power to his executors to sell the whole or any portion of it, to make speedy payment thereof.

McCandlish having paid one-half of the note on which he was endorser, as before stated, filed his bill in the Circuit court of Gloucester county, against Coke's executor, Southall's administrator, Mrs. Byrd and others, setting out the foregoing facts, and claiming a lien under the deed of trust executed by Coke to secure the debt to the bank; stating that he understood Mrs. Byrd claimed to have a lien upon the tract of land called Abingdon, and asking that if necessary for the payment of the debt to the bank the land conveyed by the deed might be sold; and for general relief.

About the same time Keen & Co. filed their bill in behalf of themselves and the other creditors of Richard Coke, against his executors and others, in which they sought to subject his property to the payment of his creditors. These plaintiffs were creditors at large; and it does not appear that there were any creditors who had recovered judgments against Coke in his lifetime.

The two cases were heard together, and the two questions of controversy were, 1st. Whether Mrs. Byrd, either by virtue of the provisions of her deed to Coke, or as vendor, had a lien for her annuity upon the land called Abingdon? 2d. Whether the deed of trust, not having been recorded until after the death of Coke, was a valid lien to secure the debt due to the bank, or whether all the creditors were to share ratably in all the property? The court below held on the first question, that Mrs. Byrd had a lien on the land she had conveyed to Coke for her annuity; and on the second, that the deed of trust was not valid as 620 *against the other creditors of Coke. And from this decree McCandlish applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

The case was elaborately argued by Wellford and Morson, orally, and by Scarburgh and Peachy, in a printed note, for the appellant, and by J. Alfred Jones and Robinson for Mrs. Byrd and the general creditors.

LEE, J. Two questions occur in this case first, whether Mrs. Byrd under the deed and contract of the 29th of June 1828 has any lien express or implied, upon the estate of Coke, or any portion of it, for the amount of the annuity secured to her by that contract; second, as to the effect of the failure to record the deed of trust of the 21st of June 1848 until after the death of Coke, the grantor, upon the lien thereby created as against the general creditors of Coke. Of these in the order stated.

There is no just foundation for any claim to an express charge. There is a reservation of what is termed "a mortgage or lien" upon the land conveyed in favor of Rebecca Innis for five hundred pounds, but nothing said of a lien for the annuity. The only terms in the deed which can furnish any semblance of a charge are those in which it is covenanted that in the event of Coke's death, his estate should pay Mrs. Byrd three hundred dollars during her life for her board, &c. Such terms or terms of similar import, mutatis mutandis, might in a will in favor of securing payment of just debts, perhaps, be held to constitute a charge, but in a contract of this character they cannot have this effect. They are but the words of a party intending to create a debt to be paid after his death in the form of annuity for life to the other in the event she survived him. It was of course to be paid out of his estate as any other mere personal liability;
621 but it will *not constitute nor was it intended to constitute any charge in the nature of a specific lien. Considering that if a lien upon any thing it would be a lien upon the whole estate of the grantor real and personal, involving embarrassment and inconvenience in disposing of even the most inconsiderable article amounting to almost a disability to enjoy his property, an intention so to bind it should not be imputed unless plainly expressed. The terms used should be construed as a covenant for his representatives,—one on his own behalf being inappropriate,—and as binding his estate only in the sense in which any personal covenant binds that of the covenantor. If there is any lien under this contract, it can only be that implied charge, the creature of the court of equity, familiarly known as "the vendor's lien."

The doctrine in regard to this lien although of comparatively modern origin, may now be regarded as well established in the English chancery; and although it has been adopted in several of the states in this country, as also in the circuit courts and Supreme court of the United States, yet in others of the states it has been questioned and unsettled or wholly repudiated. In Pennsylvania it has no existence; Kauffelt v. Bower, 7 Serg. & Rawle 64, 74: So in North Carolina; Womble v. Battle, 3 Ired. Eq. R. 182: So in South Carolina; Wragg's representatives v. The Comptroller General and others, 2 Dessaus. R. 509: so in Maine; Philbrook v. Delano, 29 Maine R. 410; and in Massachusetts, per Story, J., in Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason's R. 191. In Delaware and Connecticut, the doctrine is questioned and unsettled. Budd v. Busti, &c., 1 Harring. R. 69; Atwood v. Vincent, 17 Conn. R. 575. In Virginia the doctrine has been admitted and such a lien asserted against the vendee or purchaser with notice from him. Cole v. Scot, 2 Wash. 141; Graves v. McCall, 1 Call 414; Duval v. Bibb, 622 4 Hen. & Munf. *113; Hatcher's adm'rs v. Hatcher's ex'ors, 1 Rand. 53; Tompkins v. Mitchell, 2 Rand. 428.

But although thus recognized in Virginia the doctrine has not been favored. On the contrary it has been denounced as violative of the policy of our law which seeks as far as possible to discourage secret liens and require all to be made matters of record; and a settled disposition has been manifested to extend the doctrine no farther than it has already been carried. See the remarks of Judge Carr in Moore v. Holcombe, 3 Leigh 597, 600, 601; quoting with approbation those of Chief Justice Marshall in Bayley v. Greenleaf, 7 Wheat. R. 46, 51; and those of Judge Tucker in Brawley v. Catron, 8 Leigh 522, 527. That such a doctrine is inappropriate in a state in which every debt may be at once made a lien by a judgment and in which the real estate of a decedent is made assets for the payment of his debts cannot well be denied; and the legislature of this state very clearly evinced the opinion which is entertained upon this point when at the recent revisal it adopted the policy of those states in which this lien had been repudiated by abolishing it formally by statutory enactment. Code of Virginia, ch. 119, § 1, p. 510.

From the English cases it would seem to be deduced that in general this lien is presumed to exist and that it will follow the subject into the hands of a purchaser with notice from the vendee. Hughes v. Kearney, 1 Sch. & Lef. 132; Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. R. 329, and the cases cited and reviewed by Lord Eldon; Saunders v. Leslie, 2 Ball & Beat. 509; Winter v. Anson, 3 Russ. 488, (3 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 495); Grant v. Mills, 2 Ves. & Beame 306. Nor will the mere taking of a note or covenant for the payment of the purchase money suffice to extinguish the lien. Gibbons v. Baddall, 2 Equ. Cas. Abr. 682, n. (b.); ex parte Peake, 1 Madd. R. 344;
623 Cary's Ch. R. 25, cited *3 Sug. Vend. [192], [193]; Winter v. Anson, ubi sup.; Hughes v. Kearney, ubi sup.; Teed v. Carruthers, 2 Younge & Coll. 31, 21 Eng. Ch. R. 31. Nor will it make any difference that the purchase money claimed is in the form of an annuity and not a gross sum. Blackburn v. Gregson, 1 Bro. C. C. 420; Tardiffe v. Scrugan, cited 1 Bro. C. C. 423. So in case of a covenant for payment of purchase money in weekly sums, the vendor was held entitled to the lien, by Wigram, V. C., in Matthew v. Bowler, 6 Hare's R. 110, (31 Eng. Ch. R. 110). It is true that Lord Camden's decision in Tardiffe v. Scrugan would appear to have been criticised and questioned by Lord Eldon in Mackreth v. Symmons; and in Clarke v. Royle, 3 Simons' R. 499, 502, the vice chancellor (Sir Lancelot Shadwell) is reported to have said that it appeared to him that Lord Eldon had in Mackreth v. Symmons expressly overruled Lord Camden's decision in Tardiffe v. Scrugan; and Tucker, P., in Brawley v. Catron, 8 Leigh 522, 530, speaks of the latter case as overruled. He says "it certainly was." However in Buckland v. Pocknell, 13 Simons' R. 406, 412, (36 Eng. Ch. R. 406,) Sir L. Shadwell alluding to what he had been reported as having said in Clarke v. Royle, observed that if that had been said in those very terms, it was said too strongly; because although Lord Eldon was not satisfied with the decision in Tardiffe v. Scrugan in all its parts, yet it could not be said that he had overruled it. The decision too is supported by that of Matthew v. Bowler above cited and the case of Winter v. Lord Anson; and is fully sustained by the opinion of Sir Edward Sugden who thinks that it is still an authority and that in such a case the lien will be raised. 3 Sug. Vend. ch. 18, § 32, 38, p. 127, 131, (ed. of 1843).

But in every case whether of an entire gross sum or a sum payable in in-624 stallments or in the form of an *annuity for lives, the question of lien depends on the particular circumstances; and although generally speaking the lien exists, yet it may be waived or repelled by the character of the case. "The rule" says Judge Story "is manifestly founded on a supposed conformity with the intention of the parties upon which the law raises an implied contract; and therefore it is not inflexible but ceases to act where the circumstances of the case do not justify such a conclusion." Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason's R. 191. What are the circumstances which shall decide whether lien or no lien is a matter of some difficulty and obscurity, and many doubts and nice distinctions will be found in the authorities. As the lien is generally presumed, it would seem that the burden is upon the purchaser to show that it was waived. Hughes v. Kearney, above cited; Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. R. 329; Garson v. Green, 1 John. Ch. R. 308. But this the purchaser may do not only by showing an express agreement to that effect, but also by the reasonable inference and implication from the circumstances. Now it would seem settled that the mere taking a bond, promissory note, bill of exchange or a simple covenant of the vendee himself will not repel the lien because as said by Lord Eldon it may have been given not to supersede the lien but for the purpose of ascertaining the debt and countervailing the receipt endorsed upon the conveyance. But it is equally clear that where a distinct and independent security is taken either of other property or the responsibility of a third person the party having carved out his own security the law will not come to his aid by creating another and the equitable lien will be gone. Bond v. Kent, 2 Verm. R. 281; Fawell v. Heelis, Amb. R. 724; Nairn v. Prowse, 6 Ves. R. 752; Cole v. Scot, 2 Wash. 141; Fish v. Howland, 1 Paige's R. 20; Wilson v. Graham's ex'or, 5
Munf. 297; Gilman v. Brown, 1 Ma-
625 son's R. 191; *S. C. 4 Wheat. R. 255.

In such cases the waiver of the lien is placed upon the ground of intention deduced from the party's taking a special security. See 3 Sugd. Vend. 191; 4 Kent's Comm. 153. So where although the responsibility of a third person be not taken, if it appear that the note bond or covenant was substituted for the consideration money and was in fact the thing bargained for, the lien will not exist. There it may be inferred that credit was given exclusively to the person on whom the security was taken. Thus in Clarke v. Royle, 3 Sim. R. 499, (5 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 218,) the conveyance was in consideration of the vendee entering into covenants therein contained for an annuity to the vendor and three thousand pounds to certain persons in the event of the vendee's marrying. The vice chancellor distinguished the case from Tardiffe v. Scrugan. He considered that the deed plainly marked out that the consideration on the one side was the conveyance of the estate and on the other the entering into the covenants. He said that to declare a lien in such a case would be to go further than any of the cases that had been previously decided upon the subject of lien on purchased estates and to do that which appeared to be contrary to the intention of the parties. He accordingly pronounced against the lien.

This case is cited as authority and with apparent approbation by Tucker, P., in Brawley v. Catron, 8 Leigh 522, 530; and although the vice chancellor said that he considered it decided by the case of Winter v. Lord Anson, 1 Sim. & Stu. 434, (1 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 221,) in apparent ignorance of the fact that the opinion of Sir J. Leach in that case had been overruled by Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst (3 Russ. R. 488, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 495), yet its weight as authority is not on that account lessened: because the difference between Sir J. Leach and Lord Lyndhurst was not in 626 the principle *applicable to the case but as to the exact state of the case. The former when he decided against the lien (for he had at first decided in favor of it) thought that the case was in principle the same as if the conveyance had stated the real contract of the parties; and that by the effect of that contract, the vendor agreed to part with his estate on consideration of the bond for the future payment of the price and that upon the execution of such bond the estate passed to the vendee in equity as well as at law. Lord Lyndhurst however held that the lien was not affected by the circumstance that the period of payment was dependent on the life of the vendor. He did not think it afforded such evidence of intention to rely on the personal credit of the vendee as would waive the lien. The fault in the reasoning of Sir John Leach, as stated by Sugden (3 Sug. Vend. 187, § 6) was that he placed the case on grounds that did not exist. He assumed that it was a case in which in effect the conveyance was in consideration of a covenant in a deed to pay the price at the future period. But though the conveyance was in pursuance of the agreement (which however was to take a bond and not a covenant) it did not otherwise refer to it and was expressed to be made not in consideration of the agreement but in consideration of the purchase money. In Clarke v. Royle however the very case was presented which was erroneously assumed to exist in Winter v. Lord Anson. The conveyance was in fact in consideration of covenants entered into by the same deed for payment of the price. "There is a marked difference," says Sir Edward Sugden, "between a conveyance as for money paid with a separate security for the price whether by covenant bond or note, and a conveyance expressed to be in consideration of covenants which the purchaser enters into by the deed itself." "It may be considered against the bearing of such a secu-627 rity for the purchase *money to raise another upon the estate itself by implication from the very transaction." He concludes therefore that Clarke v. Royle is not shaken by Lord Lyndhurst's decision in Winter v. Lord Anson.

The principle of the case of Clarke v. Royle was applied in the case of Parrot v. Sweetland, 3 Mylne & Keene 655, (10 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 348). There a receipt was endorsed on the conveyance for the bond of the vendee conditioned for the payment of three thousand pounds to one Orlebar with whom the vendor was about to be united in marriage, and expressed to be the full consideration to be given by the vendee. Sir John Leach, master of the rolls, held that it was a case of substitution for the price and not security, and pronounced against the heir. The cause was reheard before the V. C., Sir L. Shadwell and Mr. Justice Bosanquet, sitting as lords commissioners, and the decree of the master of the rolls was affirmed. So in Buckland v. Pocknell, 13 Sim. R. 406, (36 Eng. Ch. R. 406,) which was the case of a conveyance in consideration of certain annuities granted by the vendee and which he covenanted to pay, the vendee also being bound to pay off a mortgage debt to which the estate was subject: held by Sir L. Shadwell, V. C., referring to Parrott v. Sweetland, that there was no lien for the annuity. And the same principle may be traced in other cases.

Now the case before us seems plainly to fall within the class of which Clarke v. Royle is the leading case. It differs from that case in no material particular. Here the consideration of the conveyance is the sum of five thousand three hundred and sixty-five dollars, and the covenants of Coke to maintain Mrs. Byrd during her life, for the payment of the annuity, in case she should survive him, of three hundred dollars if she chose to board out of his family, or if she should continue in his family after his death, of one hundred 628 and *fifty dollars; and in the latter case, that she was to have a room and furniture, &c., and in either case a maid servant to wait upon her. These covenants of the vendee, and the conveyance to him were by the same deed, and upon the principle of the above cases, the covenants were the thing contracted for, and no lien can be held to exist.

If we look still further and more closely into the instruments executed by these parties to deduce from them what their meaning must have been, according to the principle laid down by Lord Lyndhurst in Winter v. Lord Anson and to the view of Judge Story in Gilman v. Brown, we must be brought to the same conclusion. Here is a conveyance by the grantor of her whole interest in a large plantation with all the live stock of every kind upon it, and all the farming implements used in its cultivation, the crops on hand and those then growing, the household and kitchen furniture at the mansion-house, just as it stood and a carriage and harness: also all the grantor's interest in the slaves of her husband, and her interest in the estate real and personal, as heir and distributee of three of her daughters who had died after their father: also fourteen slaves which were the separate property of the grantor. All this property is conveyed to the grantee forever free and quit of any claim of the grantor and with covenants to assure full and perfect title, unencumbered, against the grantor and her heirs forever subject only to a mortgage on the land in favor of one Rebecca Innis for the sum of five hundred pounds, to the interest upon which during her lifetime the grantor was entitled under the will of R. Innis, but her claim to which she renounced in favor of the grantee, by a covenant in the deed. The considerations of this conveyance have been already stated.

Such a contract would seem to repel
629 the idea of *lien. If one were intended, why not alluded to when the lien in favor of R. Innis is specially reserved? The consideration is in gross for both real and personal property and no discrimination is made between the proportions due for each severally. Now there is no implied equitable lien for the purchase money of personal property sold in favor of the vendor. James v. Bird's adm'r, 8 Leigh 510; McNeil v. Bird's adm'r, not reported but cited in the foregoing case: and I am aware of no case in which such a lien has been declared on a sale of both real and personal property for a gross sum. That the court of chancery will enforce specific performance of such a contract or that rent may be reserved issuing out of both on a demise of real and personal property will not help the argument. The question is what may reasonably be supposed to have been the intention of the parties, and those principles do not serve to illustrate it. The great inconvenience and embarrassments that would follow if a lien should exist in this case tend strongly to show it could not have been intended. If a lien upon any thing, it would be a lien upon all the property sold, thus disabling the vendee from disposing of a slave or any other article except subject to this doubtful uncertain contingent lien in favor of Mrs. Byrd. For there is a contingency as to the amount depending on her continuing to reside in the family or choosing to reside elsewhere. And as to part, the use of a room and furniture and the services of a maid servant, if the covenant be broken as to these, the compensation is not in a specific sum due but in damages to be assessed by a jury. To maintain the lien here would be to encounter all the objections stated by Tucker, P., in Brawley v. Catron, 8 Leigh 522, if indeed they be not stronger in this case than in that. It is no answer to say that the lien declared is for the arrears of the annuity. It cannot thus be separated
630 *from the rest of the subject but must share the fate of the whole; and if no lien for the whole consideration there is none for the annuity.

Upon the whole, I feel no doubt that Mrs. Byrd was content with the personal security of Coke and that at the time of executing the instrument, neither party contemplated or thought of a lien. And to set it up here would be to carry the doctrine further than it has ever yet gone, which in view of the expressions of eminent judges against the policy of such a lien and the marked sense of the legislature in its total abolition by statutory enactment, I certainly am not prepared to do.

We come next to the effect of the failure to record the deed of trust until after the death of Coke.

That such a deed though unrecorded is yet good and valid as between the parties is clear from the terms of the law which have no application to such a case and was decided at an early day under a former registry law. Turner v. Stip, 1 Wash. 319; Currie v. Donald, 2 Wash. 58. A general creditor therefore coming in the lifetime of the mortgagor can assert no claim to satisfaction of his debt out of the mortgaged subject to the prejudice of the mortgagee. But it is argued that upon the death of the mortgagor in this case, the general creditors acquired such rights under the provisions of the statute making the real estate of a decedent liable to his debts or under the charge in the will of Coke for payment of his debts, as entitles them to displace the mortgagee and deprive him of the benefit of the lien for which he had contracted.

The first enquiry then is what is the interest which is thus made liable by the statute to the debts of a decedent?

The act provides that all real estate of any person who might thereafter die as to which he might die intestate or which though he die testate shall not 631 *have been by his will charged with or devised subject to the payment of debts or which might remain after satisfying the debts so charged or subject to which it was so devised, shall be assets for the payment of the decedent's debts in the order in which the personal estate is to be applied. Code Va. ch. 131, § 3, p. 545. The estate then thus made subject is the estate of the debtor not that which he may have previously conveyed to another, nor (except subject to the charge) that on which he has created a lien for the payment of a particular debt. In the latter case creditors coming in under the statute must take the subject in the same plight and condition in which the debtor left it. Their rights in the subject cannot be enlarged and improved beyond those of the debtor to the prejudice of the creditor who has taken the lien though he may have failed to record it. The creditor who seeks to assail it must come with some lien by judgment or otherwise giving him a right to charge the property specifically. That the right given by the statute constitutes no such lien, I think, is clear. The law makes real estate assets, merely, to be disposed of as personal assets; and a creditor has no lien upon the assets. He has a right to have the whole applied in a due course of administration, but nothing in the nature of a specific lien. Nugent v. Gifford, 1 Atk. R. 462; Mead v. Lord Orrery, 3 Atk. R. 235; per Lord Eldon, McLeod v. Drummond, 17 Ves. R. 153. See remarks of Sir Wm. Grant in Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. R. 87, 100; Clason v. Morris, 10 John. R. 525, 540. See also Black v. Scott, 2 Brock. R. 325.

That the general creditors take only the estate of the debtor and in the plight and condition in which he left it, is deducible from the general tenor of the act and also from the terms of the seventh section which expressly declares that the provisions of that chapter should not affect any 632 lien by judgment or *otherwise acquired in the lifetime of the decedent. And there is no sufficient reason for excluding an unrecorded mortgage from the protection afforded by this section. It is still a lien on the mortgaged subject which a court of equity will respect and enforce, assuming the debt to be fair and honest, and there can be no reason why the general creditors having no claim to charge the subject specifically, but only the estate left by the debtor, generally, should be entitled to claim any thing more than the debtor himself had, to wit, the equity of redemption after satisfying the mortgage debt. To permit them to deprive a creditor having an equity at least equal to theirs and certainly prior in point of time of the benefit of the lien for which he had contracted would be required neither by any principle of justice nor by the policy on which the law is founded.

If therefore Coke had died intestate, it is difficult to perceive on what grounds the general creditors coming in after his death under the statute could be entitled to displace the creditors claiming under the deed of trust of the 21st of June 1848 or to subject to their debts anything beyond the equity of redemption. The mortgage being good against the grantor and his heirs, nothing could descend to the heir but the equity of redemption; and if he and the mortgagee were to unite in a sale of the mortgaged premises, the creditors could not make him liable at law beyond the value of such equitable interest. The act makes him answerable for the value of the assets descended, but no more, and all that descended was the mere equity of redemption. And equity certainly would not carry the liability further. The case of a fraudulent conveyance will not illustrate the question here. It may be true that in that case, the descent would not be broken and the whole property would be liable. For when the deed is adjudged void for 633 *fraud the party has nothing to fall back upon. Very different is the case of a deed defective merely for want of having been duly recorded. Though the transfer of the legal title be arrested, the creditor has the equity of a just debt and of the stipulation with the debtor for the security of the trust deed to rely upon; and this a court of equity administering equities according to its own principles will duly respect and enforce against general creditors having no specific lien by judgment or otherwise. The parties come into the court of equity asking its aid to subject the property and they must abide by the rules and principles of that court. And although a fraudulent alienee would be treated as a mere trustee for the benefit of the creditors entitled, a creditor holding under an unrecorded mortgage to secure a bona fide debt would stand on a different footing. His equity would be at least equal to that of the creditors competing with him and he moreover stipulated for a security which they did not.

But the claim of the creditors in this case does not rest upon the right given by statute to subject the real estate of a decedent to the payment of his debts. Coke by his will which was made on the 30th of December 1849 charged his whole estate with the payment of all his debts; and it was not therefore within the terms of the third section of chapter 131, subjecting real estate to the payment of the decedent's debts. For that section is expressly confined to the real estate as to which the party died intestate or which though he may have left a will, shall not have been charged by the will or devised subject to the payment of debts, or if so charged or devised, to what might remain after satisfaction of the debts so provided for. The devise then being for payment of debts was clearly good under the act in force 634 at the date of the will; *and although generally wherever real estate is by statute made liable for payment of debts it would appear to constitute legal assets as held in Goodchild v. Ferrett, 5 Beavan's R. 398; 2 Spence Equ. Jur. 319; yet where a testator by his will charges his real estate with his debts, the real estate so charged will be equitable assets notwithstanding the statute would have rendered it liable if there had been no such charge. Charlton v. Wright, 12 Simon's R. 274; 2 Spence Equ. Jur. 312. But in the administration of assets of a decedent whether legal or equitable, the courts of equity recognize and enforce all antecedent liens, claims and charges, in rem, resting upon the property according to their priorities whether they are legal or equitable. 2 Lom. Dig. 119; Fremoult v. Dedire, 1 P. Wms. 429; Finch v. Winchelsea, 1 P. Wms. 277; 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 553, and cases cited in the note. And as the mortgage though unrecorded is valid against the grantor and his heirs, it constitutes such a lien as will be respected by the court of equity in administering the assets of the decedent.

The statute of wills authorizes every person to dispose by will of any estate to which he shall be entitled at his death and which if not so disposed of would devolve upon his heir, &c. Code of Virginia, ch. 122, § 2, p. 516; and if there were no further provision on the subject, the effect of this would be to enable the devisee to take the land devised discharged from any liability to the general creditors of the testator. Hence the statute in England upon the subject of fraudulent devises and the similar provisions of our Code. But to what estate shall it be said a party was entitled at his death and what shall devolve upon his heir if not disposed of by will? Certainly not lands which the testator had conveyed to another by deed binding upon him and his heirs, in his lifetime;

635 *or if the conveyance were not absolute but in the nature of a mortgage to secure a debt, nothing more than the equity of redemption. In the former case, his title has passed from him absolutely; in the latter it is only to be reinstated by himself or those claiming under him by payment of the amount due. By the devise, the testator will only be understood to intend to charge what he lawfully might charge and it will not be construed so as to pass more than he himself was entitled to. Nor can the devisee take more. He is not a purchaser for value, and can stand on no better footing than a voluntary grantee. The devise is the voluntary act of the debtor implying no contract or stipulation with the creditors whose debts are thus provided for. And the maxim non det qui non habet must apply.

In this case, Coke's will was made before the present Code took effect, and the case therefore falls within the influence of that of 1819, Code of Va. ch. 122, § 22. By the Code of 1819 whilst it avoided fraudulent devises, devises for payment of debts were expressly saved: and the creditors here must claim as devisees whose rights are protected by the fourth section of the act of December 18, 1789 (1 R. C. 1819, p. 392). So claiming, they can only take what Coke could devise, and this is the equity of redemption in the subject covered by the deed of trust. What they must claim is an equitable interest only and the relief they must seek is through the administration of equitable assets. Black v. Scott, 2 Brock. R. 325; 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 550, 552, 553; Miller Eq. Mort. 126, (42 Law Lib. 126); Newton v. Bennett, 1 Bro. C. C. 135; Silk v. Prime, Ibid. 138, n; Baily v. Ekins, 7 Ves. R. 319; Rutger's ex'ors v. Leroy, 4 John. Ch. R. 651; Nimmo's ex'or v. Commonwealth, 4 Hen. & Munf. 57. And this being the footing on which they must 636 stand, *they cannot successfully ask the aid of a court of equity to take from a creditor having at least an equal equity with them and who has moreover stipulated for and obtained a specific lien upon the real estate of the common debtor, the preference thus intended to be secured to him.

From what has been said it may be deduced that after the death of a mortgagor it is not necessary to record the mortgage to protect the lien against general creditors. In this case in point of fact the deed of trust was recorded after the death of Coke, and there is nothing in the language of the act prohibiting the recording of a deed after the death of the grantor or restricting the right to record to the lifetime of the grantor. When the execution of the deed is authenticated in the manner required by the law it is the duty of the court or clerk to admit it to record without enquiry whether the grantor be in life or otherwise. Nor is any good reason perceived why such recording will not suffice to bring the case within the terms of the law, and render the deed good against creditors from that time. And it may be urged that as the creditors had acquired no specific lien by judgment or otherwise in the lifetime of the grantor and as they took none either under the devise in the will or the act rendering real estate assets for payment of debts, they could not successfully assail the lien secured by the deed of trust. I do not dwell upon this view however because as I think the creditors acquired nothing in the nature of a specific lien either under the will of Coke or the statute making real estate assets, and as after Coke's death they could acquire no lien upon his real estate, I conceive that recording the deed of trust after his death was wholly unnecessary as to them.

It remains to consider in this con-

637 nection, the effect *of the 11th section of chapter 118 of the Code. This section provides that the words "creditors" and "purchasers" where used in that chapter and in chapter 119, shall extend to and embrace all creditors and purchasers, who but for the deed or writing, would have had title to the property conveyed or a right to subject it to their debts. And it is insisted that creditors claiming under a devise for payment of debts or under the statute subjecting real estate, are within this description. I do not think this the correct construction of the section. It was not designed to make any change in the kind or character of the debts which would entitle creditors to assail an unrecorded deed, but to define the class of creditors as to whom if their debts were of the kind and character authorizing them to call it in question, an unrecorded deed would be void. This is apparent from the context, for the section declares that the words "creditors" and "purchasers" where they occur, are not to be restricted to the protection of creditors of and purchasers "from the grantor," but are to embrace all who but for the deed would have had title to the subject or a right to subject it to their debts. It was intended to settle by statutory provision the question so much controverted in the cases of Pierce v. Turner, 5 Cranch's R. 154;

Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 211; and Thomas v. Gaines, 1 Gratt. 347; and which was decided in the last named case in conformity to the decision in Anderson v. Anderson, 2 Call 198; and overruling Pierce v. Turner and the opinions of Judges Carr, Coalter and Brooke in Land v. Jeffries; but it made no change in the well settled rule which required a creditor who would assail an unrecorded deed to show that he had some lien by judgment or otherwise entitling him to charge the subject conveyed, specifically.

639 *Roberts v. Roberts.

January Term, 1857, Richmond.

(Absent, LEE, J.)

1. Judicial Sales—Inclement Weather—Few Bidders—Sale Set Aside.—A sale of a tract of land made by a commissioner under a decree of the Chancery court, on a day so inclement that persons intending to be present and to bid for a part of the land, are deterred from attending, and when there was but one bidder present, who lived at the place, will be set aside, without weighing the evidence, which is conflicting, as to the sufficiency of the price at which it was sold.
2. Same—Objections—Setting Aside Sale—Discretion of Court.—According to the practice in Virginia, upon objection to a sale of land made by a commissioner, it is not necessary to ask that the biddings may be opened by the offer of a substantial advance upon the price reported. But the court will consider the objections to the sale, and confirm or set it aside as the merits of the case may require.

This was a bill filed in the Circuit court of Nelson county by John T. Roberts in his own right and as executor of John M. Roberts, against the other heirs of John M. Roberts, for the sale of a tract of land which was undisposed of by the will of his testator. The court made a decree appointing the plaintiff a commissioner to sell the land, which consisted of a tract of mountain land of about one thousand acres. The commissioner subsequently reported that he had offered the land for sale on the 3d day of December 1852, when it was purchased by Ann T. Roberts at the price of two dollars and sixty-two and a half cents per acre, and that she had complied with the terms of sale.

On the return of the report of the commissioner some of the heirs excepted to it, and objected to the confirmation of the sale, on the ground that the day 640 *of sale was very inclement; it raining all day, so that there were no persons present except the family living on the place, and except the commissioner, the crier and one other person; and that consequently the price was far below its real value.

It appeared from the evidence that it rained all day; and that there were no persons present except the family living on the place, the crier and one man who had gone there the evening before; and there was no bidder but Ann T. Roberts, who was one of the heirs. Several witnesses said that the day was so bad as to deter persons from going to the sale; and one who was authorized to buy some thirty-five acres of the land at seven dollars, was prevented by the weather from attending.

As to the value of the land the witnesses differed very much in opinion. Some thought the land was worth from three to four dollars per acre; whilst a number thought that it was sold for its full value, and some for even more than it was worth.

When the case came on to be heard upon

Judicial Sales—Setting Aside Sale—Discretion of Court.—For the proposition that, setting aside a judicial sale is within the discretion of the court, the principal case is cited in Magann v. Segal, 92 Fed. Rep. 262, where it is held that where the failure to bid was due to accident such as, together with the inadequacy of price realized, justified the court, in refusing to confirm the sale and ordering a new one.

It is also held in Kabell v. Mitchell, 9 W. Va. 492, citing the principal case, that the court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, either affirm, or set aside, the sale, where from the facts, evidence, and circumstances before it, it appears clearly that the sale was made at a greatly inadequate price, or, it may set aside the sale upon any evidence or facts before it, which clearly show that the land sold at a greatly inadequate price.

Same—Cloud on Title.—For the proposition that a court of equity will refuse to make a sale of land where there is a cloud on title (until such cloud is removed), the principal case is cited in Parsons v. Snider, 42 W. Va. 521, 26 S. E. Rep. 287. See also, Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Gratt. 492; Curry v. Hill, 18 W. Va. 370; Lallance v. Fisher, 29 W. Va. 512, 2 S. E. Rep. 775.

The principal case is distinguished in Græme v. Cullen, 23 Gratt. 287.

Same—Objections in Lower Court.—In Teel v. Yancey, 23 Gratt. 698, it is said, that, it is nowhere proved, or even charged that the conduct of the commissioner was not perfectly fair and impartial nor was it asked in the court below that the commissioner be substituted by another, nor was the sale objected to on account of the commissioner being a party to the suit. The objection is made for the first time in the appellate court, and comes too late, even if it could have availed the party in the court below. See Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 102; Roberts v. Roberts, 13 Gratt. 639.

the exceptions to the report, they were sustained by the court; and the sale was set aside, and another sale by other commissioners was directed. And from this decree Ann T. Roberts applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Patton, for the appellant.
Robinson, for the appellee.

SAMUELS, J. It is the right of every party concerned in interest in property, when about to be sold at public auction, to have it offered for sale under such circumstances as afford an opportunity for fair competition amongst all who may be disposed to buy. Doubts about the identity or title of the subject to be sold may prevent prudent men from offering to 641 buy, *and are therefore enough to justify any one charged with the duty of making a sale, in postponing the sale until such doubts may be removed and the danger of sacrifice be avoided. See Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Gratt. 492; Goare v. Beuhring, 6 Leigh 585; 1 Lom. Dig. 425 top, 323 marg. Without going into an enumeration of the many causes for which public sales have been set aside, yet we see that many of them are founded on the principle that fair competition has been prevented, and sacrifice may have been incurred to the prejudice of those interested. This principle rules in cases of sales by auctioneers, executors, administrators, trustees, commissioners, and all others having authority to sell. 2 Rob. Prac. 65, old edition. Although the irregular action of the person making the sale may not always avoid it, still wherever the sale itself is allowed to stand, the delinquent in duty must make compensation to the party injured.

In the case before us a sale of land was made by a commissioner acting under a decree of the Circuit court of Nelson county. It was the right of the appellees as well as of the appellant, the parties interested, to have the benefit of fair competition. Yet the sale was made on the 3d of December 1853, a day which was so inclement because of rain, that several persons who wished to attend were prevented by the weather from doing so. There is a conflict of evidence on the question, Whether the inclemency of the day was such as ought to prevent any one who might wish to do so from attending? There is no conflict however as to the fact that some persons did stay away who had intended to be there, some of whom wished to buy the land or a part of it. There is moreover no conflict of evidence as to the fact that the appellant was the sole bidder; that the commissioner, the crier and one other, were the only persons drawn to the place in expectation 642 *of a sale; that the appellant who became the buyer, and her brother lived at the place. The case before us differs from Fairfax v. Muse's ex'ors, 4 Munf. 124, in this, that in that case there were five bidders present, including the plaintiff's agent and the defendant: in our case but one bidder was present. In our case, besides the commissioners and crier, there was but one other person in attendance, because of the expected sale, and that other had no intention to buy. In the case in 4th Munford, the report states that a "considerable number" were there. In our case persons who wished to attend were prevented by the weather from doing so. In the case in 4th Munford it is not shown that any one staid away because of the cloudy and rainy day, who desired to be at the place of sale. The marked difference in the facts of the cases in my judgment requires a difference in their decision. Seeing that the duty of the commissioner was plainly violated; that the sale reported in effect was one by private contract, the court should not go into an enquiry upon the conflicting evidence whether the price was a fair one.

It was said in the argument here that if the sale under consideration could be set aside at all, that it could only be done by opening the biddings by the offer of a substantial advance upon the price reported; that this practice of the English chancery courts should be followed here in cases like this; and that the exceptions to the commissioner's report in this case for this reason should be disregarded. This objection I think is not well taken. The commissioner is the officer of the court, and acts under its supervision. His errors, when brought to the notice of the court, or appearing on the face of his proceedings, may be corrected. Such has hitherto been the practice in Virginia without question as to its propriety; its convenience and 643 *justice are manifest, and it should not be disturbed. In Fairfax v. Muse's ex'ors, above cited, the Chancery court, in a summary way, revised the action of its commissioners, and confirmed it; and this court upon appeal affirmed the decision of the Chancery court.

I am of opinion to affirm the decree.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

Decree affirmed.

644 *Brown's Adm'r v. Johnson.

Isbell's Ex'or v. Johnson.

January Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Joint Bond—Surviving Obligor—Competency as Witness.—In an action on a joint bond against the personal representative of a deceased obligor, a surviving obligor is an incompetent witness for the defendant.

2. Same—Same—Interest of—Competency as Witness.—Where a witness is offered as competent on the ground that though interested in favor of the party offering him, his interest is equal or greater the other way, this last interest must be as direct and immediate as the former.

3. Same—Same—Same—Same.—In an action against one of two obligors in a bond, the interest of the other arising from his liability to the defendant for contribution is more direct and immediate than his liability as obligor in the bonds to the obligee; and he is therefore an incompetent witness for the defendant.

4. Same—Obligors—Competency as a Witness.—If the liability of one obligor in a bond is defeated on a ground not personal to himself, (as infancy, bankruptcy or death,) the liability of all the obligors is at an end; and therefore one obligor is an incompetent witness for his co-obligor in an action on the bond.

5. Same—Same—Action against Personal Representative of One—Statute.—The statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 98, § 3, p. 359, Code, ch. 144, § 13, p. 582, in relation to joint obligations, though it gives an action against the personal representative of a deceased joint obligor, does not affect the principle that the defeat of the remedy against one joint obligor upon a ground not personal to himself, defeats it as to all the obligors.†

6. Same—Same—Two Actions Pending—Deposition.—There are two actions pending by the same plaintiff against obligors in the same bond; a deposition taken by the defendant in one of the cases, can under no circumstances, be competent evi-645 dence for the defendant in the other.

*7. Same—Release of Obligor—Case at Bar.—A covenant by the obligee in a bond with one of three joint obligors, that if after judgment against all the parties the money is not paid by the other two, he will relieve him from the payment of it, is not a release, and will not bar an action on the bond against all the obligors.

These were two actions of debt in the Circuit court of Appomattox county, the first brought in August 1853 by John Johnson, assignee of John H. Johnson, against the administrator of James Brown deceased; and the second by the same plaintiff against the executor of William Isbell deceased. Both actions were founded on the same bond, which was executed to John H. Johnson by William Isbell as principal, and James Brown and William J. Dunn as his sureties. This bond bore date the 10th day of April 1844, and bound the obligors jointly, to pay to John H. Johnson the sum of eight hundred and eighty-seven dollars and fifty cents, with interest, on or before the 1st of April 1847. The defendants each pleaded usury; and a release by John H. Johnson, before the assignment, to their co-obligor William J. Dunn; whereby they insisted they were released.

Upon the trial of the first named case, after the plaintiff had introduced the bond declared on, the defendant offered to introduce in evidence the deposition of Dunn, who was proved to be dead. The plaintiff objected to the evidence on the ground that Dunn was interested; and to obviate that objection the defendant offered in evidence a writing under the hands and seals of Dunn and Johnson, whereby, upon a consideration therein stated, Johnson covenants with Dunn that in the event that the bond declared on shall not be paid by the said Isbell and Brown after judgment obtained against all parties, he, the said John H. Johnson, will relieve him from the payment of the same and every cent thereof. It was admitted that this paper was genuine 646 and in full force; and that Isbell *at the time of taking the deposition was dead leaving an estate ample to pay all his debts and liabilities, including this.

But the court sustained the objection and excluded the deposition, on the ground that the said Dunn by reason of his interest was incompetent to testify: And the defendant excepted.

On the trial of the second case the same deposition was offered in evidence under the same circumstances; the only difference in the case being that the deposition was regularly taken in the first case, when the plaintiff was present and cross-examined the witness; and it was offered as evidence in the second case though only taken in the first. It was again excluded by the court; and the defendant excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment in both cases for the plaintiff; and the defendants each applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed. They came on here to be heard together.

The Attorney General, for the appellants.
Garland, for the appellees.

LEE, J. The question in these cases is whether in an action under our statute against the representative of one who was jointly bound in an obligation with another who survives, and upon an issue to the merits going to the validity of the obligation and the right of the plaintiff to recover upon it, the surviving obligor is a competent witness for the defendant.

Isbell was the principal debtor and Brown, and Dunn whose testimony was offered, were jointly bound with him as sureties. In the case first named, then, that of Johnson v. Brown's adm'r, the witness Dunn has a direct and immediate interest to defeat the recovery against Brown's estate, because by so doing he prevents any demand against himself on the part 647 of Brown's estate *for contribution of his share of the amount recovered: and if this interest be not released or in some way overcome, he would upon general principles be clearly incompetent. Moreover, if he were in any way relieved from the debt and interest, still he would be liable to contribution for the costs, because the statute gives contribution for the party's share of the whole amount for which the judgment or decree is rendered, which of course includes the costs. Code of Va. ch. 146, § 8, p. 588. And such a liability would render the witness incompetent. Hall v. Cecil, 6 Bing. R. 181; Jones v. Raine, 4 Rand. 386. That the statute gives the remedy only in case the principal be insolvent will not vary the case. By procuring a verdict and judgment for the cosurety, the witness puts an end to all question upon this subject, and that verdict and judgment will be evidence for or against him in any proceeding of the cosurety for contribution.

*Bonds—Joint Obligors—Discharge of One—Effect.—For the proposition that, if the liability of one obligor in a bond is defeated on a ground not personal to himself (as infancy, bankruptcy or death), the liability of all the obligors is at an end, the principal case is cited and followed in Steptoe v. Read, 19 Gratt. 10, and foot-note, where there is a collection of cases and the above proposition is discussed at length.

See generally, monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801.

But it is said the interest of the witness is greater against the cosurety than in his favor because by procuring a verdict and judgment for him, he makes himself liable for the whole amount of the joint obligation, whilst the effect of a verdict and judgment against him would be to subject him to contribution for a moiety, only. This might be so, if the liability in the former case were as immediate and direct as that in the latter. But it is not so. The liability in the former case arises out of the party's executing the joint obligation and the relation in which he stands to the obligee, whereas in the latter case the liability to contribution grows out of the judgment or decree against the cosurety itself by the terms of the statute. And to counterbalance or outweigh an interest in the witness in one way by an equal or greater in the opposite, the latter must be also direct and immediate. For where the one is direct and the other contingent, the former must prevail. Goodacre v.
648 *Breame, Peake's N. P. Cases 232; Hall v. Cecil, 6 Bing. 181, (19 Eng. C. L. R. 47). Now the interest depending upon the liability of the witness to be sued for the whole, if the action failed as to his cosurety is an uncertain and contingent interest and not immediate and direct. As said by the judges in Slegg v. Phillips, 4 Adolph. & El. 852, (31 Eng. C. L. R. 203,) the recovery might depend on many contingencies; and the witness comes to prove the note a nullity, a defense which might be equally available for himself; and thus as said by Lord Denman, C. J., "it is not in the defendant's mouth to say" that the witness would be benefited by the recovery against the defendant.

Under the English practice for want of a statute making the representative of one who was jointly bound with another liable to an action at law, the precise question in these cases could not occur, as the remedy at law lies only against the survivor. But a very similar question has occurred in cases where the parties were bound jointly and severally, and also in cases of partners where one has been sued without the other being joined; and it has been held in such cases that a party thus bound jointly or jointly and severally, with the defendant, was not a competent witness in his behalf. Thus in Russell v. Blake, 2 Mann. & Grang. 374, (40 Eng. C. L. R. 418,) which was an action against one of the makers of a joint and several promissory note, another of the makers was offered as a witness for the defendant; and it was admitted both by the counsel and the court that he would be incompetent except for the act 3 & 4 W. 4, ch. 42, which however it was held did remove the objection to his competency. In a previous case against one of the makers of such note the same question had been made and had been decided against the competency of the witness who was another of the makers, without reference 649 *to the statute of W. 4, although it had passed in the year previous to the trial: but it seems not to have been adverted to either at the bar or by the court. Slegg v. Phillips, 4 Adolph. & Ellis 852, (31 Eng. C. L. R. 203). So in cases of partners, one who is proved or admitted to be a partner of the defendant but who has not been sued, cannot be examined as a witness on the part of the defendant. Goodacre v. Breame, Peake's N. P. Cases 232; Young v. Bairner, 1 Esp. R. 103; Cheyne v. Koops, 4 Esp. R. 110; Hall v. Cecil, 6 Bing. R. 181, (19 Eng. C. L. R. 47). So in an action against the acceptor of a bill drawn for the accommodation of the drawer, held the drawer was not a competent witness for the defendant. Jones v. Brooke, 4 Taunt. R. 464.

In these cases the witness was rejected because of the interest which he was supposed to have by reason of his liability over, and such liability for costs only was deemed sufficient to exclude him. And in Slegg v. Phillips, the same argument was pressed that was made here, that the witness had a greater interest to procure a verdict and judgment against the defendant than one in his favor; but that interest was held to be uncertain and contingent and not to counterbalance the direct interest to avoid contribution.

In this view, therefore, according to the authorities, I think Dunn was not a competent witness for the defendant in the case of Johnson v. Brown's adm'r: and as to the case of Johnson v. Isbell's ex'or, I think it was a sufficient reason for rejecting his deposition that it was not taken in that case but in the other; and that Johnson had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness when it was taken does not remove the objection. For it could not have been used by Johnson against Isbell's ex'or, and therefore for want of mutuality could not be used by the latter against the former: as a man who cannot be prejudiced by a 650 deposition, *or proceeding in a suit shall never receive any advantage from it. Gilb. Ev. 55; 1 Stark. (Phil. ed. 1830,) p. 264; Hard. 472; Paynes v. Coles, 1 Munf. 373, 394; Chapmans v. Chapman, Id. 393, 403. But there is another and broader ground, common to both cases, upon which the objection to the testimony may be rested: and this is that the witness Dunn by procuring a verdict and judgment for the defendant was in effect protecting himself against a suit for the same cause of action. For the obligation of these parties having been in its inception, joint, to enable the plaintiff to recover there must be a continuing subsisting liability on the part of the joint obligors and the representatives of those who were dead. For wherever several are bound jointly, if the right of action be gone or suspended as to any one for a cause not personal to him (as in case of his infancy, or bankruptcy or death,) the joint liability being at an end, the others may avail themselves of this suspension or discharge whether produced by the act of the party or by operation of law at the instance and by the act of the creditor. Thus in a case in which judgment had been recovered against two persons as partners, and suit was subsequently brought on the same cause against them and two others as after discovered partners, held that the joint contract of all was merged in the judgment. Robertson v. Smith, 18 John. R. 459. So a judgment on a promissory note against one, was held to bar a subsequent action against him and another alleged to be a dormant partner. Ward v. Johnson, 13 Mass. R. 148. And the same doctrine is asserted in the cases of Smith v. Black, 9 Serg. & Rawle 142, and Willings v. Consequa, 1 Pet. C. C. R. 301. The case of Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cranch's R. 253, which would seem to countenance a contrary doctrine has yet not been deemed an authority controlling these cases. See the remarks of Judge Stanard in Ward v.

651 Motter, 2 *Rob. R. 536, 566. So a judgment against one joint trespasser is a bar to an action against the others. Wiles v. Jackson, 2 Hen. & Munf. 355. So where the creditor takes the specialty of one partner for the debt, held that the action against an after discovered dormant partner was extinguished by the specialty. Ward v. Motter, 2 Rob. R. 536. To a similar effect is Pudsey's Case, cited 2 Leon. 110, and Tom v. Goodrich, 2 John. R. 213. And if a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff against one of several who are jointly bound may be admitted in evidence in an action against another as a bar, it would seem to be a necessary corollary (if the deduction be not a fortiori) that a verdict and judgment against the plaintiff in the former action upon an issue going to the merits and ascertaining that the plaintiff never had any cause of action against that defendant, would be admissible as a bar to a subsequent action against another so jointly bound. For the joint obligation would clearly be at an end as to the former, and therefore as we have seen, as to all the others. See opinion of Washington, J., in Willings v. Consequa, 1 Pet. C. C. R. 301.

That this would be so where all the parties jointly bound are in life will not perhaps be questioned, and I think our statute making the representative of a deceased party liable to an action at law will not change the rule. The act it is true provides that such representative may be charged in the same manner as if those jointly bound had been bound severally as well as jointly. This was however for the purpose of the remedy merely because the action against the representative must be a several action as the jugdment is de bonis, &c.; but it does not convert the obligation into a joint and several one for other purposes. If three or more be jointly bound and one die, the action against the survivors must be against all. If one only be sued he may plead 652 the nonjoinder of the other *survivors or take advantage of the variance; and the principle which holds all who were bound by joint obligation discharged when the joint contract is put an end to as to any one by some matter not personal to him still has its effect. The object of the statute is to save the necessity of a resort to a suit in equity, but not to take away from any party any legal defense which he might otherwise make to the action excepting from. the representative of the deceased party the legal discharge upon his death leaving others jointly bound still surviving.

As to the supposed release which is relied on, I think it only necessary to say, that if it was a good release, it would not meet the objection of the witness's liability to contribution: but in point of fact, it is no release nor could it be pleaded as such by Dunn himself in bar of an action against him. To be available as such, the release must be express and not merely a constructive release. 7 Bac. Abr. (Bouv. ed.) "Obligations" D, p. 254. This was a mere covenant on the part of Johnson, that at a future period after judgment should have been recovered against all the parties, he would relieve Dunn from the payment of the same, thus expressly negativing the idea of any bar to an action even against Dunn.

On the whole I think the court did not err in excluding the evidence in either case and am of opinion to affirm the judgments.

intended to be passed, the habendum in this deed is not void, but only a life estate passes by the deed.†

2. Chancery Practice—Bill for Partition—Prayer for General Relief.‡—On a bill claiming a share of a tract of land, and asking for a partition, and for general relief, the plaintiff's right to partition being established, under the prayer for general relief there may be a decree for an account of rents and profits.

3. Appellate Practice—Errors in Decree for Account—How Corrected.§—Errors in the details of a decree for an account are not a proper subject for appeal and correction in the appellate court; but they may be corrected by exceptions to the commissioner's report.

By deed bearing date the 23d of June 1820, Edmund Humphrey, in consideration of natural love and affection, and for divers other good causes and considerations, granted to his wife Elizabeth Humphrey forever, the tract of land on which he lived, and apparently all his personal property. To have and to hold and enjoy all and singular the said lands, goods and chattels for life. Mrs. Humphrey survived her husband and lived until 1843 or 1844. She held the land, &c. in possession; and in July 1842 she executed a deed, by which she, for natural love and affection and one dollar, conveyed the land to her grandson William H. Humphrey, reserving to herself the possession during her life.

After the death of Mrs. Humphrey Thomas Foster and his wife, who was a daughter of Edmund Humphrey, 654 *filed their bill in the circuit court of Louisa county, against William H. Humphrey and the other heirs of Edmund Humphrey, in which they set out the deed to Mrs. Humphrey, which they charged gave her but an estate for life, her death, and that the land had been since that time in the possession of the defendant William H. Humphrey, who had taken the rents and profits to his own use. And the prayer of the bill was for a partition of the land; and for general relief.

William H. Humphrey demurred to the bill, and also answered, insisting that Mrs. Humphrey took a fee in the land; and that she had conveyed the same to him.

Upon the hearing in September 1853, the court overruled the demurrer, and held that Mrs. Humphrey took but a life estate in the land; and made a decree directing a commissioner of the court to take an account of the rents and profits from the end of the year in which Mrs. Humphrey died to the end of the year 1854. From this decree William H. Humphrey obtained an appeal to this court.

John G. Williams, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That the conveyance being to Elizabeth Humphrey forever, she, by the operation of the act of 1785 dispensing with words of limitation, took a fee: And therefore the habendum for life being repugnant to the grant, is void. Baldwin's Case, 2 Coke's R. 18 and 23. That this was the doctrine of all the old authorities; and it has not been denied by the modern cases; but a distinction has been taken. Thus where a conveyance is to A and his heirs, habendum to A and the heirs of his body, the habendum is held to be valid as not being inconsistent with the grant. Goodtitle ex dem. Dodwell v. 2d. He submitted the question as to the propriety of the decree for an account, under the pleadings in the cause.

Holladay, for the appellee, upon the last point said there was a prayer for general relief, and that would authorize the decree for account.

Upon the first point made by the counsel for the appellant, he admitted that the old rule was as it had been stated. That rule is that where the conveyance clearly in technical language conveys a fee, the habendum for life is repugnant and void. But according to the rules of the common law the word "heirs" is necessary to convey a fee; and the rule was founded on the idea that there were two intents clearly expressed, and that the latter was therefore void. In Blair v. Muse, 83 Va. 240, 2 S. E. Rep. 31, it is said, that Humphrey v. Foster, 13 Gratt. 652, is not in conflict with the case under consideration, in which case there were two clauses, irreconcilable and repugnant, and it is held that the last was invalid and the first would prevail.

premises did not convey a fee by clear technical language, the habendum was not void.

In this case the deed would not pass the fee at common law; and we must therefore look to the whole instrument to ascertain the intent of the grantor. Our statute which dispenses with words of limitation, leaves the intent to be ascertained from the whole deed. And the authorities cited on the other side show that where the premises and the habendum can stand together they will be so construed. 2 Lom. Dig. 217. Here the deed on its face shows that the grantor only intended to give an estate for life.

ALLEN, P. At the common law, the words "heirs" was necessary to create a fee simple in all feoffments and grants to natural persons, and conveyances to natural persons taking effect as transfers of the 656 legal estates by the operation of the statute of uses. *Littleton, § 1; Lom. Dig. 218, m; 4 Kent's Com. 5. And as deeds are to be taken most strongly against the grantor, when by the premises an estate is conveyed to one and his heirs habendum to him for life, the habendum is repugnant and void, as it cannot perform the office of devesting an estate already vested by the premises. 2 Lom. Dig. 216; 4 Kent's Com. 468.

These familiar doctrines have not been controverted in argument; but their application to the present case is denied. E. Humphrey by his deed of the 23d of June 1820 conveyed to his wife forever certain "lands and other property, to have and to hold and enjoy all and singular the said lands, goods and chattels for life." Elizabeth Humphrey, by deed of the 19th of July 1842, conveyed the land in controversy to the appellant in fee; and afterwards departed this life. And the question in the case is, Whether by the deed from her husband she took an estate for life or in fee simple? At the common law the estate would have been for life, as the word heirs was wanting; for says Littleton, § 1, If a man purchase lands by the words "to have and to hold to him forever," he hath but an estate for term of life, for that there lack these words (heirs) which words only make an estate of inheritance in all feoffments and grants. By our statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 27, p. 369, in force at the date of this deed, it is enacted, "that every estate in lands, which shall hereafter be granted, conveyed or devised to one, although other words heretofore necessary to transfer an estate of inheritance be not added, shall be deemed a fee simple, if a less estate be not limited by express words, or do not appear to have been granted, conveyed or devised by construction or operation of law." In virtue of this clause the grantee in the deed under consideration would have taken a fee simple if the words in the premises stood alone. But it could be treated as a fee simple in virtue of the statute only, 657 and by *the statute the whole deed must be looked to for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is any qualification or limitation upon the generality of the first provision; for such a deed can only operate to convey the fee simple if a less estate be not limited by express words, &c. In the present case we perceive by the habendum that an estate for life was expressly limited; and as the object under the statute is to ascertain what estate was intended to be granted by the deed, if a less estate than a fee is limited by express words in any part of the deed, it must control and qualify the general words used in the premises. I think, therefore, the deed from E. Humphrey conveyed but a life estate to his wife.

As to the second error assigned, that no account for rents and profits having been specifically asked in the bill none should have been ordered, it is sufficient to say that the bill contained the usual prayer for general relief, and a recovery of rents and profits would in general be incident to the recovery of the land. As to the details of the order of accounts, the decree is interlocutory, and all objections as to the time of commencing the said account or terminating it may be raised upon exceptions to the report. The appellant will not be precluded by the order directing the account from presenting such objections by exceptions to the commissioner's report.

I think the decree should be affirmed.

costs, upon a bill of exchange, &c. This notice was served on Hale on the 7th of January, and was filed in the clerk's office of the Circuit court on the 16th.

On the 23d of March the cause was taken up, when the defendant moved the court to remove the same from the docket, on the ground that it was founded on a notice bearing date on a day subsequent to the commencement of the then term of the court, and that it was filed in the office during said term. But the court overruled the motion, and proceeded to hear the cause; and there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs. Thereupon Hale applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

ALLEN, P. Prior to the Code of 1849, summary remedies were given by various statutes for the recovery
659 *of claims due to the commonwealth, and for many claims due to individuals by motion on ten days' notice. The revisors seeing that these proceedings had worked well, proposed to extend the remedy by motion on notice to all cases in which a person was entitled to recover money by action on contract. The motive for such extension was to simplify and shorten pleadings and other proceedings. To obviate the objection that judgments for debts generally, should not be rendered so promptly, as in those cases wherein by the existing laws judgments were allowed by motion, they suggested that the notice of a motion for a judgment for such debts should be longer, and that as it required two or three months to get an action on the docket, two or three months' notice of such a motion could be required. In accordance with these views they reported a section allowing such motions. The plan recommended underwent some modifications in the legislature, and as modified is found in the Code, ch. 167, § 5, p. 640, to be taken in connection with some other provisions of the Code bearing upon the subject and necessary to be looked to for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the legislature. The section referred to allows "any person entitled to recover money by action on any contract, by motion before any court which would have jurisdiction in an action otherwise than under the 2d section of the 169th chapter, p. 641 of the Code, to obtain judgment for such money after sixty days' notice, which notice shall be returned to the clerk's office of such court forty days before the motion is heard. A motion under this section which is docketed under the 1st section of chapter 177, p. 670, shall not be discontinued by reason of no order of continuance being entered in it from one day to another, or from term to term." The 1st section of chapter 177 directs that before every term of the General court or a 660 Circuit court and every *quarterly term of a County and Corporation court, the clerk shall make out a docket of the following cases pending, to wit: First, cases of the commonwealth; and secondly, motions and actions in the order in which the notices of the motions were filed, or in which the proceedings at rules in the actions were terminated, docketing together as new cases, those not on the docket at the previous term. He shall under the control of the court set the cases to certain days, and the docket shall be called, and the cases on it tried or disposed of for the term in that order. The provision as to making out the docket is substantially the same as that contained in the 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 507, § 76, varied so far as was necessary to provide for motions. The law then as now provided that the docket was to be made out before the term, and it followed that no cause could be put on the docket in which there was an office judgment, unless such office judgment had been obtained before the term; and where the office judgment was obtained on the same day the term commenced, the cause could not be put upon the docket at that term. White v. Archer, 2 Va. Cas. 201; Green v. Skipwith, 1 Rand. 460.

In regard to cases of that description, where there is an office judgment, it was not pretended in argument that the case could be placed on the docket unless the office judgment was obtained before the term. This results as well from the provision requiring the docket to be made out before the term as from the law giving the defendant until the next term after the office judgment was confirmed, to set it aside. The provision requiring the docket to be made out before the term applies as well to motions as to actions: the phraseology used is the same as to both; they are treated as cases pending, because they have been matured for their position on the trial docket before the term, by the 661 service and filing of *the notice in the time prescribed, where the proceeding is by motion; by the confirmation of the conditional judgment at rules where the proceeding is by action at the common law. The object had in view was, as suggested by the revisors, to simplify and shorten pleadings and other proceedings; and this was to be effected by substituting the notice for the writ and pleading in the common law action. It was not the intention of the legislature, as it is disclosed by the various provisions recited above, to empower parties to mature cases during the continuance of the term. The revisors had adverted to the time required, two or three months, to get an action on the docket; and referred it to the legislature to determine how long the defendant should have notice of a motion, as I understand their suggestion, to accomplish the same object, of getting the motion on the docket. The legislature, from analogy to the time usually required to get an action on the docket, fixed the time of the notice at sixty days, to be filed forty days before the motion is heard.

By this construction the symmetry of the system is preserved. The law is general; applicable to all the circuit courts and the quarterly terms of the county and corporation courts. The circuit courts are held semiannually, and where the proceeding is by action, it must be matured for a place on the docket before the term; and it is apparent the legislature did not contemplate that when the proceeding was by notice, it could be commenced and matured during the term. The circumstance could occur only in regard to the courts of the city of Richmond; and there is nothing indicating an intention to afford suitors in that court an advantage over those in the other circuit courts. That it was not intended to place notices of this kind on the footing of the usual ten days' notice, is manifest from the fact that the notice was to be given 662 sixty *days and filed forty days; that it was to be docketed before the term, and that in the county and corporation courts, the notices provided for by § 5 of ch. 167, and actions, are made cognizable only at the quarterly terms. Code, ch. 157, § 4, p. 610. In the last particular the section reported by the revisors gave jurisdiction to the county and corporation courts at the monthly terms. It was changed in the legislature; and from the terms used in the law referring to this new proceeding for the recovery of debts generally, then first provided for, and making it and actions at law cognizable only at a quarterly term, the intention is manifested to maintain the agreement between these two modes of proceeding as to the time of docketing and trial. Great inconvenience would follow from any other construction. The clerk before the term is to make out the docket of the cases pending, and set them to certain days, and the cases are to be tried or disposed of for the term in that order, unless for good cause the court should take up any out of term.

A certain time is allowed before the term to get the case on the docket that the defendant may prepare for a trial; and it is set to a certain day on the docket, that he may know when to summon his witnesses. But if a case may be matured during the term, there is no provision for placing it on the docket; and there would be no propriety in hearing it on the day named, so as to interrupt the regular calling of the docket, and so to give a preference over cases entitled from their place on the docket to a priority. The case would have to be called on the day named, and continued to some day at the end of the days set, or the defendant would be required with his witnesses to be constantly in court to be ready whenever at some leisure interval the case should be called up for trial.

The legislature, I think, never contemplated such a proceeding; and an examination of the various provisions 663 *contained in the Code has satisfied me that the only object was to simplify the pleadings; but that a proceeding of the kind authorized by § 5 of ch. 167, must be in a condition to be docketed before the term to authorize the court at that term to give judgment. When so docketed it is a case in court; and by the last clause of the section shall not be discontinued by reason of no order of continuance being entered in it from one day to another or from term to term. The object of this clause, like the other provisions of these laws, is to keep up the analogy between the two modes of proceeding. The docketing supersedes the necessity of calling and continuing the motion, and it remains like actions at law, a case in court to be called, and disposed of in the regular calling of the docket.

I think the court erred in overruling the motion of the defendant to remove the motion from the docket, as set forth in the first bill of exceptions taken by the defendant, and in proceeding to hear and render judgment on said motion, being founded on a notice bearing date on a day after the commencement of the term at which the motion was heard and judgment was rendered. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for the notice to be docketed and cause proceeded in.

for probat as the will of Thomas Ramsey, and the probat thereof was opposed by several of his children. The only question in the cause was, Whether the name of the testator at the commencement of the will, which was wholly written by the testator, was a sufficient signing under the act, Code, ch. 122, § 4, p. 516? The paper commenced as follows: "I, Thomas Ramsey of Charlotte, do hereby make my last will and testament in manner and form following." He then directs the payment of his debts; disposes of his whole estate, and concludes as follows: "Lastly. I do constitute and appoint my friend Col. Thomas Pugh the executor of this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all other and former wills or testaments by me heretofore made, this sixteenth of July 1855."

This paper was found in the pocket book of the deceased which was locked up in his drawer, and when found it was folded up in the form of a letter, and sealed with a wafer, without endorsement of any kind.

The testator left a widow and several children by a former, and one by the present, wife. Having received all his estate with his last wife, by his will he 665 *left it to her for her life, and at her death, with the exception of some merely nominal legacies to his other children, he gave it to his son by her.

The court below admitted the paper to probat; and the contestants applied to this court for an appeal which was allowed.

Bouldin, for the appellants.
R. T. Daniel, for the appellee.

DANIEL, J. The fourth section of the chapter on wills, in the Code of 1849, p. 516, declares that "no will shall be valid unless it be in writing and signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction, in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature; and moreover unless [it] be wholly written by the testator, the signature shall be made or [the will] acknowledged by him in the presence of at least two [competent] witnesses present at the same time; and such witnesses shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, but no form of attestation shall be necessary."

On comparing this section as it now stands in the Code, with the corresponding section reported by the revisors, (see Report of Revisors, p. 624,) it will be seen that the legislature have adopted the precise language of the revisors in all that relates to the manner in which the signature of the testator is to be made—the only departures, in the section as enacted, from the same as reported, being, that in the second clause the revisors refer to the will by the terms "the instrument," whilst the legislature use for the same purpose the demonstrative pronoun "it;" that whilst the revisors required that "the signature" should "be made or acknowledged," the section as adopted declares that "the signature shall be made or the will acknowledged"
666 *in the presence, &c.; that the legislature have inserted the word "competent" before the word "witnesses," and have substituted the words "attest and subscribe" by the word "subscribe" alone; and have also dropped from the section the last clause or sentence found in that reported by the revisors, declaring that "a will so executed shall be valid without any other publication thereof."

It will be further seen on looking to the report of the revisors, p. 624, that in a note to the first clause of the section, they say, "This conforms to the decision in Waller v. Waller, 1 Gratt. 454, and is thought to be better than an arbitrary rule requiring the signature at the foot or end of the paper."

In Waller v. Waller the will was wholly in the testator's handwriting, and commenced, "In the name of God, amen. I, John Waller," &c. It disposed of all the testator's property, and was in all respects formal and complete, with the exception that it concluded, "In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this day of 1841." "Signed and acknowledged in the presence of:" and that it was never attested by witnesses nor further signed by the testator. This court reversed the sentence of the Superior court of Henry admitting the will to probat. The substance of the opinions of the several members of this court, and of the decision, is succinctly and correctly stated by Judge Lomax in the 3d volume of his Digest, (new ed.) at p. 39, 40. He says, "In the opinion delivered by Allen, judge, with the concurrence of Baldwin, J., the principle of Lemayne v. Stanley, in relation to olograph wills in Virginia, was much discussed. According to that opinion the finality of the testamentary intent must be ascertained from the face of the paper, and extrinsic evidence is not admissible either to prove or disprove it. The signing of a will, to be a sufficient signing under the statute.
667 *must be such as upon the face and from the frame of the instrument appears to have been intended to give it authenticity. It must appear that the name was regarded as a signature, and that the instrument was complete without further signature; and the paper itself must show this. Stanard, J., expressed no opinion but concurred with the other judges in favor of reversing the judgment of the court below which had admitted the instrument to probat as a will. Brooke, J., dissented. Cabell, P., said that the paper propounded as the will of John Waller bore upon the face of it internal evidence that he did not regard it as a final and concluded act. It was manifest from the paper itself, that he intended something further to be done; that it should be signed and acknowledged in the presence of witnesses. He did not therefore intend that paper, which was not signed (by subscription) and acknowledged, to be his will. To that extent we may suppose there was an agreement of all the judges, who concurred in the judgment of reversal, which was rendered."

The difference between the opinions of Judges Allen and Cabell would thus seem to be that the former held no signing of an olograph will to be sufficient except when it appeared affirmatively upon the face or from the frame of the instrument that the signing was intended to be a signing to give authenticity to the paper; whilst the latter, without indicating whether he could or could not go to that extent, was of opinion that when it appeared from the face of the paper that the testator intended something farther to be done, (which intention he held was made apparent in that case by the presence of the "In testimonium" clause and the absence of any attestation by witnesses and of any subscription or further signature of his name by the testator,) the paper ought not to be regarded as a final and concluded act. In the opinion
668 *of the former the signing in the body of the instrument was from its nature an equivocal act, which required to be explained by some further evidence, apparent on the face of the paper, of the testator's intention thereby to authenticate it, before it could have that effect, whilst the opinion of the latter went only to the extent of holding that when, in such case, the finality of the act was negatived by other internal evidence that the testator did not regard the instrument as a concluded act the signature in the body of the will was not sufficient. And as Baldwin, J., alone concurred in the opinion of Allen, J., and Stanard, J., gave no reason for concurring in the judgment reversing the sentence admitting the will to probat, whilst Brooke, J., dissented, the decision, it must be conceded, cannot be held as declaring any principle broader than that announced in the opinion of Judge Cabell. Still, when it is considered that the decision in Lemayne v. Stanley, though generally followed in England and in most of the states of the Union, where the act of 29 Charles 2 has been adopted, has been regarded by some of the most learned and eminent elementary writers and judges in both countries, as at war with the plain and obvious meaning of the statute, letting in many of the most serious evils which it was the design of the statute to avoid; that, in order to cure these evils and to shut out all doubt as to the meaning, office and force of the signature, it became necessary in England so to change the law by legislative enactment as to require that the "will shall be signed at the foot or end thereof;" that like enactments with the like end in view, had been passed in New York and Pennsylvania; that the law upon the subject in this state, (at least in respect to olograph wills,) had been left, by the cases of Selden v. Coalter, in the General court, 2 Va. Cas. 553, and Waller v. Waller, in this court, in a most unsettled condition;
669 *that Judge Allen, in the course of his opinion in Waller v. Waller, adverted to the recent statutory changes just mentioned; that he declared himself in favor of a rule requiring that the signature should be so made as that upon the face and from the frame of the instrument it should appear to have been intended to give authenticity to the paper, and argued to show that such a rule was preferable to a statute requiring the paper to be signed at the foot or end; assigning as a reason that the statute would be inflexible, whilst cases might arise of a signing at some other place, under such circumstances apparent on the face of the instrument, as would be equally entitled to produce the belief that the signing was intended to authenticate the will; that the revisors, in their note already cited, whilst referring to the case of Waller v. Waller, also made evident allusion to the provision of the 9th section of ch. 26, 1 Vict. requiring the will to be signed at the foot or end, and recommended the scheme which they reported as better calculated to attain the end in view—When due weight is given to these considerations, there arises, I think, a fair inference that the legislature, in requiring that the will shall be signed "in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature," designed not merely to enact what had been decided in Waller v. Waller, but to furnish a rule in respect to the signature, which, whilst it would have all the certainty of the British statute, would yet let in wills, which, though not signed at the foot or end, might be signed in such manner as to afford internal evidence of authenticity equally convincing.

This view is sustained by Judge Lomax in the recent edition of his Digest. In commenting on the section of the Code now under consideration, he says, "It now requires, in addition to what was expressed under the former law, that it shall be 670 signed in such *manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature." "This expression was probably inserted in approbation of the principle that was decided (but in which decision it may seem there was not an unanimity of the judges) in the case before referred to of Waller v. Waller, and to settle as far as general expressions can settle the law of particular cases, the doubts and difficulties in Selden v. Coalter, and which may often occur in cases of olograph wills. The design is probably the same in effect as that which the English statute requires when it says that 'it shall be signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator.' The manifest intention of the signature wherever placed being the rule of the Virginia statute; the signing at the foot or end being alone the index of the intention as the rule of the English statute of Victoria." 3 Lom. Dig. 2d ed. § 35, p. 70. Whether in the effort to construe the words in question we look alone to their ordinary import and the context, or seek their interpretation in the state of the law existing at the time when the act was passed, and shown to have been brought to the notice of the legislature, and in the design which we thence deduce to have been contemplated by them, I think there is no serious difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the act recognizes no will as sufficiently signed unless it appears affirmatively from the position of the signature, as at the foot or end, or from some other internal evidence equally convincing, that the testator designed by the use of the signature to authenticate the instrument.

And as in the case under consideration the signing at the top alone, which from its nature is an equivocal act, is aided by no other evidence or explanation, on the face of the paper, showing that such signing was used for the purpose of ratifying and authenticating the contents of the instrument, I am of the opinion that the requirements of the act have not been com-671 plied *with, and that the Circuit court erred in admitting the paper to probat.

I think that the sentence of the Circuit court should be reversed, and probat of the paper refused.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

Judgment reversed.

672 *Ballow & als. v. Hudson & als.

January Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Wills—Probate Proceedings—Conclusiveness of—Case at Bar.—A paper is propounded for probat to the County court of C, as the will of B, and is rejected on the ground that B was incompetent to make a will. Afterwards the paper is propounded for probat to the Circuit court of C, and that court, with knowledge that it had been rejected in the County court, admits it to probat. The sentence of the County court is conclusive against the will, and the sentence of the Circuit court is a nullity.

2. Same—Bill to Set Aside—Case at Bar.†—Bill to set aside a will states the facts showing the probat is a nullity, but asks for an issue devisavit vel non, and for general relief. The court may disregard the prayer for an issue, and give the proper relief under the prayer for general relief.

In December 1846 Hyram Hudson and others, claiming to be next of kin to Jesse Ballow deceased, filed their bill in the Circuit court of Halifax county, in which they state, that after the death of Jesse Ballow a certain paper writing purporting to be his last will was offered for probat in the County court of Cumberland, and probat thereof was refused by the court; whereupon the parties offering said will applied for probat of the same to the Circuit court of Cumberland, when the said paper was admitted to probat. They charge that the probat was procured by fraud, the parties who had opposed the probat in the County court having been bought out; and the plaintiffs, one of them residing out of the state, and the others having been infants at the time. That Jesse Ballow was incompetent to make a will, and had been so all his life; one of the persons named as executor in the will having been his committee for many years. They make the executors and other parties in interest 673 defendants, *and ask for an issue of devisavit vel non; and for general relief.

The executors and legatees in the will answered the bill denying the fraud; insisting that Jesse Ballow was competent to make a will; and relying upon the judgment of the Circuit court admitting the paper to probat as conclusive upon the parties; that proceeding having been had under the act of March 24th, 1838, Sess. Acts of 1837-38, p. 71; and all the parties having been proceeded against, either by regular service of process or order of publication.

In June 1852 the plaintiffs were permitted to amend their bill. In their amended bill they set out more distinctly the facts stated in their original bill; and they especially set out the fact that the paper had been offered for probat in the County court of Cumberland by the executors therein named, and that the court after hearing the evidence was of opinion that Jesse Ballow was not of sound and disposing mind and memory, and refused to admit the paper to probat. And they state that some time afterwards two of the legatees in the will offered the paper for probat in the Circuit court of Cumberland, and that it was there admitted to probat. The other facts and charges set out in the original, are repeated in this amended bill; and the prayer is that the judgment of the Circuit court may be declared null and void; that the judgment of the County court may be held as conclusive; that all proper accounts may be taken; and for general relief.

Wills—Probate Proceedings—Conclusiveness of.—Upon the question of the conclusiveness of probate proceedings, the principal case is cited and followed in Connolly v. Connolly, 32 Gratt. 664, and note.

†Chancery Practice—Bill to Set Aside Will—Prayer for General Relief.—In Van Winkle v. Blackford, 33 W. Va. 573, 11 S. E. Rep. 31, it is said: "It only remains, now, to consider whether the bill in this case is sufficient to warrant the granting of the relief to which the plaintiff therein is entitled. The relief herein indicated as proper and equitable is not embraced in the special prayer, but the bill contains a prayer for general relief, and, inasmuch as every fact necessary to establish the relief to which the plaintiff is entitled is set out fully in the bill, there would be no difficulty in administering it under the prayer for general relief, by referring the cause to a commissioner, with such orders and instructions as should be equitable (Woods v. Fisher, 3 W. Va. 536; Ballow v. Hudson, 13 Gratt. 672); but for the fact that the necessary parties are not before the court."

The executors and legatees again answered, referring generally to their former answers. The records of the proceedings in the County and Circuit courts were filed in the cause. The first shows the judgment of the County court, rejecting the paper propounded by the executors named 674 therein, on the *ground that the testator was not of sound and disposing mind and memory.

The record of the proceedings in the Circuit court commences with an order in which reciting that "it appearing to the satisfaction of the court that the clerk of the County court of Cumberland has in his possession as clerk the will of Jesse Ballow deceased, bearing date on the 3d of December 1839, which said will was offered for probat in said County court at September court 1844, and rejected by the court," the clerk is directed to bring up the paper. And he having produced the paper, it was propounded for probat by two of the persons named in it as devisees and legatees.

The only parol testimony filed in the cause was to show that the plaintiffs were of the next of kin of Jesse Ballow, and that some of them were infants when the paper was admitted to probat in the Circuit court.

The cause came on to be heard in May 1854, when the Circuit court held that the judgment of the County court of Cumberland refusing to admit the will of Jesse Ballow to probat, was conclusive to establish that the will then offered was not the will of said Jesse Ballow. That the proceedings in the Circuit court were not of an appellate character, but original; and that the judgment of said court did not affect the judgment of the County court. And the court proceeded to order accounts preparatory to a final decree. From this decree the executors and legatees applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Hughes, for the appellants.
P. Roberts, for the appellees.

SAMUELS, J. This case grows
675 out of a contest *about the succession to the estate of Jesse Ballow deceased; the appellees, who were complainants and are of the next of kin, allege an intestacy; the appellants, defendants below, claim under an alleged will.

It is averred in the original bill, that the paper called the will of Jesse Ballow, had been propounded for probat, in the County court of Cumberland county, by William T. Ballow and Jane Booker, two of the legatees named therein, and that probat thereof was refused by that court: That the will was at a subsequent day again offered for probat in the Circuit superior court of law and chancery for Cumberland county, by which court the paper was admitted to probat; and that the property of the decedent had been sold by the persons named as executors in the will. This bill prays for an issue devisavit vel non, and for general relief. The amended bill avers substantially the same facts with more minuteness of detail, and prays for an account of the estate, and for general relief; waiving every thing in the original bill inconsistent with the amended bill.

It may be conceded that a bill praying an issue devisavit vel non ought properly to ask for nothing else; yet if it should go into a statement of facts which show that the issue is not necessary, but that other relief would be appropriate, I am of opinion the court should not dismiss the bill for multifariousness, but should retain it for a hearing upon the merits. In this case, upon the facts stated in the original bill, and repeated in the amended bill, under the prayer for general relief in each, the Circuit court was warranted in hearing the case on its merits.

It appears in the record of the proceedings of the County court in the matter of Jesse Ballow's will, which is made part of this record, that the will was propounded for probat by parties claiming interest under it; that a contest was had about 676 its validity; *and that the court rejected it because of Jesse Ballow's incompetency to make a will. From this sentence and judgment no appeal was taken, nor any writ of error or supersedeas sued out. At a later day the same paper was propounded for probat by the parties claiming interest under it in the Circuit superior court of law and chancery for Cumberland county, by which court the paper was admitted to probat. The record of the Circuit court, (made part of this record) shows that the proceeding was had therein in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, as distinct from its appellate jurisdiction. It moreover appears that the Circuit court acted with full knowledge of the previous sentence and judgment of the County court.

Thus the question is presented, whether the sentence of a court of competent jurisdiction rejecting a will, is conclusive upon all courts of concurrent original jurisdiction; and whether a court of concurrent original jurisdiction, which has also appellate jurisdiction, may, in the exercise of original as distinct from appellate jurisdiction, annul such sentence, not by reversing it, but by pronouncing an inconsistent sentence?

In considering these questions, I shall regard the will as disposing of both real and personal estate; not deeming it material to enquire whether the decedent owned any real estate, and if he did, whether the paper propounded, if good as a will, disposed of such estate.

At an early period of the law there was a wide difference in the mode of proving a will of real estate and one of personal estate. Whenever the existence of the former was drawn in question, it was necessary to prove it. There was no tribunal with authority to stamp it in advance with verity; and it was therefore necessary to prove it according to the law of evi-677 dence *as often as occasion required;

nor did such proof have any effect beyond the particular case in which it was heard. The law in regard to a will of personal estate was widely different. Such will was governed by the ecclesiastical law; and that law provided tribunals which had exclusive cognizance of all questions touching the factum of such will. A sentence of one of these tribunals admitting it to probat, was conclusive on all parties and others, and upon all courts, until revoked or reversed according to the practice of those courts. So a sentence declaring the nullity of an alleged will was in like manner conclusive until revoked or reversed according to the same practice. See 4 Burns' Ecclesiastical Law 176, title Probat.

It would be difficult if not impracticable to ascertain when and by what authority jurisdiction in the matter of probat of wills of either kind was first conferred on the temporal courts in Virginia. We may suppose, however, that it was first done by the colonial council acting under authority of royal charters and instructions from the crown. Whether jurisdiction over both classes of wills was conferred at the same time or at different times, it would be useless to enquire, even if enquiry would be likely to lead to any result.

At an early day we find that the General court at James City had jurisdiction over the probat of wills of both classes; and soon thereafter, we find this jurisdiction conferred also upon the county courts. See Hen. Stat. at Large 302, act 9; 2 Id. p. 359, act 11; p. 391, act 8; 4 Id. p. 12, chap. 2; 5 Id. p. 231, chap. 6; p. 454, chap. 5.

As the effect of a sentence rendered by a court of probat of wills of personalty, was well defined and well known, it is but reasonable to infer that when wills of realty were required to undergo the same 678 *ordeal, they should in all things stand upon the same footing as wills of personalty, except in so far as otherwise provided. That this result would have followed, the general assembly obviously thought, and therefore provided the means of securing to the heir at law a more deliberate and careful trial before his inheritance should be taken from him by a will. See statutes above cited.

There is, however, nowhere to be found in the early legislation on the subject, any provision whereby a devisee or legatee might again propound a will which had been once rejected by a court of probat. Possibly the general assembly may have supposed that the powers of a court of probat as originally constituted, would extend over the new subject brought under its jurisdiction, and that a sentence of nullity might be revoked by the court which pronounced it. Or they may have intended to give the heir at law and next of kin the benefit of a sentence against the propounders, who, in their own time, after such preparation as they thought proper to make, offered a will for probat which they could not sustain. It is useless in this case to consider whether a repropounding might have been had before the County court of Cumberland, as it was not attempted.

This court has decided, very frequently, that if a court of competent jurisdiction shall admit a will to probat as a will of lands, which appears upon its face, or upon the record of the probat, not to have been duly executed as a will of lands, still the sentence is binding upon all concerned in interest, and upon all courts as long as the sentence remains in force. That such is the law is regarded as well settled. See Bagwell v. Elliott & wife, 2 Rand. 190, Judge Green's opinion; West v. West's ex'ors, 3 Rand. 373, 386; Nalle v. Fenwick, 4 Rand. 585; Vaughan v. Green's lessee, 1 Leigh 287; Street's heirs v. Street, 11
679 Leigh 498; Parker's *ex'ors v. Brown's ex'ors et als., 6 Gratt. 554; Robinsons v. Allen and others, 11 Gratt. 785.

It seems to be equally true that the sentence of such court rejecting a will, even if duly executed, must be conclusive until reversed. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the conclusiveness of a judgment is not to be determined by looking to the jurisdiction of the court in which it was rendered, but by looking to the fact whether the sentence is for or against the will; if for the will, it is binding; if against it, then it is open for inquiry. This, however, is not admissible in regard to any judgment, and least of all in regard to judgments in matters of probat.

We have the authority of most respectable legal opinions, in addition to the judicial sanction of this court, for maintaining that the conclusiveness of a sentence in a matter of probat, is not limited to a case in which the will is admitted to probat, but that it extends also to cases in which wills have been rejected. See 3 Lom. Dig. p. 86, new ed. In Bagwell v. Elliott, 2 Rand. 190, 200, Judge Green says, "if a will offered for probat was contested and rejected, this might be used thereafter as the decision of a competent judicial tribunal, and would condemn it forever." In Coalter v. Bryan, 1 Gratt. 18, 76, 77, 78, Judge Baldwin expresses the opinion that the sentence of a probat court whilst in force is binding upon all persons and courts, whether the will be of realty, or personalty, or both, and this whether the will be admitted or rejected. The case of Wills v. Spraggins, 3 Gratt. 555, cannot be regarded as having the authority of a binding precedent. There were four judges upon the bench, one of whom dissented. Another put his concurrence in the judgment upon the ground that looking into the record of the first judgment he was of opinion it was rightly rendered, and therefore the judgment overruling 680 *the attempt to obtain a different decision should be affirmed. Another concurred in the results of the opinion delivered. Thus, the reasons for the opinion can be regarded as those of only the judge who delivered it. Yet we must give to those reasons, so far as applicable to the facts of this case, their just weight, and, in my judgment, they show conclusively that the sentence of the probat court rejecting the will before us, being not reversed, is binding upon all persons and upon all courts in which the question comes up collaterally.

The case of Schultz v. Schultz, 10 Gratt. 358, decides that the sentence of a probat court, when acting within its jurisdiction, rejecting a will when offered for probat, is conclusive against the exercise of original probat jurisdiction in the same court, and it would seem a fortiori against such jurisdiction in another court.

It was said in the argument here, that this court must have regarded the second sentence in Schultz v. Schultz as having some effect, otherwise it would not have reversed it; that it would have been absurd to reverse a mere nullity. The answer to this argument is obvious; the proper parties were before the court; the subject within its jurisdiction: the court could therefore do nothing but affirm or reverse. The court below decided that the unreversed sentence rejecting the will of 1828 was not binding, and overruled the defense founded thereon; it further decided to take cognizance under its original jurisdiction of the matter passed on by the first sentence, and rendered a different sentence, the first not having been reversed. It was the duty of this court to correct all errors in the record, and to pronounce such sentence as the court below should have pronounced. In the judgment of this court it was error to disregard the sentence of rejection then in full force; to overrule the 681 *defense of the contestant founded on that sentence; to take cognizance of the case as it stood; to pronounce an original sentence in a matter over which no probat court could any longer exercise original jurisdiction. To correct these errors it was necessary to reverse the sentence; for if the appeal had been merely dismissed as improvidently allowed as the counsel suggest, the judgment of the court below would have remained untouched. The contestant had shown a valid defense against the last sentence, yet the defense was erroneously overruled, and judgment rendered. It was the right of the appellant to have it removed out of her way at once, and not to have it left as the means of getting up further litigation involving a question as to the comparative force of the conflicting sentences.

This case, in my judgment, is a conclusive authority to show that the sentence of a court of probat of competent jurisdiction rejecting a will when propounded for probat is conclusive whilst it remains in force. The two judges who dissented in the case did not differ from the majority in regard to the general principle; but upon the ground that in the particular case the reasons of the judge below—placing his judgment upon the want of jurisdiction and not upon the merits, should be looked to; and that therefore the rejection was not final and peremptory.

The cases in this court in regard to grants of administration, although not bearing directly upon the question here, yet seem to illustrate the general principle that the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction over the subject is conclusive until it is avoided, or expires by its own limitation; and this although the facts of the particular case were not such as to give the court jurisdiction over that case. Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119; Burnley's rep. v. Duke, 2 Rob. R. 102.

682 *Considerations of public policy require that all questions of succession to property should be authoritatively settled. Courts of probat are therefore organized to pass on such questions when arising under wills; and a judgment by such court is conclusive whilst it remains in force, and the succession is governed accordingly. A judgment of this nature is classed amongst those which in legal nomenclature are called "judgments in rem." Until reversed, it binds not only the immediate parties to the proceeding in which it is had, but all other persons, and all courts. 3 Lom. Dig. 86, new ed.; 1 Starkie on Evi. 228; Coalter's ex'or v. Bryan, 1 Gratt. 18; Wills v. Spraggins, 3 Gratt. 555; Schultz v. Schultz, 10 Gratt. 358.

In my opinion, the Circuit court correctly decided that Jesse Ballow was dead intestate, and that his next of kin were entitled to an account of his estate at the hands of parties claiming under color of a will, who had taken possession of the estate.

I am of opinion to affirm the decree.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

‡Chancery Jurisdiction—Complete Relief.—In Miller v. Wills, 95 Va. 340, 28 S. E. Rep. 337, it is said: "And, where a court of equity has properly acquired jurisdiction, it will, in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits, go on to do complete justice, though in doing so it has to try title, or settle boundaries and administer remedies which rightly pertain to courts of law. 1 Pom. Eq. J., sec. 181; Anderson v. Harvey, 10 Gratt. 386; McArthur v. Chase, 13 Gratt. 683; Bettman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 433, 26 S. E. Rep. 271; Miller v. L. & N. R. Co., 83 Ala. 274, and DeVeney v. Gallagher, 20 N. J. Eq. 33." The principal case is also cited and followed in Walters v. Farmers' Bank, 76 Va. 19.

In Rothchild v. Hoge, 43 Fed. Rep. 102, it is said that the principles laid down in McArthur v. Chase, 13 Gratt. 683, are approved so far as applicable to the case at bar.

In May 1848 John E. Penman and Daniel Penman purchased of James Bean two tracts of land in the county of Frederick, for which they were to pay him ten thousand dollars; four thousand dollars to be paid on the 1st of December following, and the balance of six thousand dollars was to be paid in four equal annual payments, with interest from the last date. The object of this purchase was to establish a furnace for the making of iron. On the first day of June in the same year a partnership was entered into between the two Penmans and Richard Thompson, under the name and style of Penman, Thompson & Penman, for the purpose of carrying on the business of making iron, and of conducting a mercantile establishment in connection therewith; in which it was agreed that John E. Penman, being without means, should give his attention to the preparing the buildings and other works connected with the business, and should superintend the making of iron, and the other two should each put in the sum of fifteen hundred dollars as capital, and all were to be equally interested; and they also agreed to advance to the firm as a loan a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, if necessary to put the works into efficient operation, and also whatever sum might be necessary to enable the firm to pay to Bean the sum of four thousand dollars, which would be due to him on the 1st of December of that year. All these parties were from the 685 city of New York, and *Daniel Penman and Thompson were residing in that city at the time the partnership was formed, and so continued until some time in the year 1849.

By deed bearing date the 13th of January 1849, John E. and Daniel Penman conveyed to Thompson and Marion Penman, each one-fourth of the land and other property of the partnership. In this deed it was recited that the furnace had been erected. And it was further recited that Marion Penman had advanced the sum of four thousand dollars to pay to Bean the amount due to him on the 1st of December 1848, and it was agreed that she should be a dormant partner of the concern, and each should be interested one-fourth in the property and business of the partnership. This deed was not executed by Marion Penman, and she denied that she had ever assented to it, or agreed to become a partner. And so the court held.

Some time in the spring of 1849 Daniel Penman and Thompson removed from New York to the iron works in Frederick county, and Thompson became the financial agent of the partnership, and the manager of the store. He seems to have been acquainted in New York with the firm of McArthur & Co.; and before the 2d of August of that year he contracted a debt with them for goods purchased, exceeding the sum of two thousand dollars. On that day articles of partnership were entered into between the two Penmans and Thompson and William McArthur, of the firm of McArthur

& Co. whereby it was agreed that he should become a special partner, and should put into the partnership the sum of five thousand dollars: the business to be conducted under the old name of Penman, Thompson & Penman, and each of the partners to be interested one-fourth, both in the property and business. The steps prescribed by the act of March 29th, 1837, in forming a 686 special partnership, seem to *have been pursued; and McArthur advanced his five thousand dollars, a part of which was applied by the direction of Thompson, to the payment of the debt due to McArthur & Co. and the balance was paid up in money.

The original parties having commenced their business with very inadequate capital, the partnership was in difficulties from the commencement of their operations; and previous to McArthur's becoming a partner, in order to obtain accommodations at the Farmers Bank of Virginia at Winchester, the partners, on the 19th of April 1849, conveyed their partnership property to trustees to secure several notes or drafts which had been discounted for them at bank, and also to secure future accommodations. After McArthur became a partner he was compelled to make advances for them to enable them to meet their engagements. These advances were made by his firm; and by the 6th of April 1850, Penman, Thompson & Penman were indebted to McArthur & Co. about twelve thousand dollars. This included the debt of four thousand dollars due to Marion Penman, and also a debt of one thousand dollars lent to the partnership by James Penman of New York, both of which had been transferred to McArthur & Co. At that day the debts of the partnership amounted to between thirty-five and forty thousand dollars, and their own estimate of the value of their property was about forty-five thousand dollars. It was sold, however, during the summer of that year, and the whole partnership property produced the sum of twenty-two thousand and fifty-one dollars and sixty-seven cents; and this seems to have been considered by all the witnesses examined on the subject, except some of the partners, to have been its full value.

In this condition of the partnership the two Penmans and Thompson, being 687 the general partners, conveyed *the whole partnership property real and personal to trustees in trust to secure the debt due to McArthur & Co. And there was no doubt that this deed was executed at the instance of William McArthur. The deed recited that it was the purpose to provide for the payment of the debt due to McArthur & Co. and also for any further advances or acceptances which McArthur & Co. might make for the partnership. But it provided for a sale whenever Penman, Thompson and Penman should fail to pay any of the debts secured, when due, or if then due, when McArthur & Co. should require the trustees to sell. When this deed was executed there seems to have been some expectation by the general partners that McArthur & Co. would make further advances for them so as to enable them to go on with the business. McArthur in his answer in this case says that Thompson proposed to him that his firm should make further advances, and informed him that their prospects of getting along and making money were better than before. That the respondent who conducted the correspondence, informed Thompson that before he could submit the proposition to his partner the firm of Penman, Thompson & Penman ought to secure the firm of McArthur & Co. To this they agreed, and the deed of trust was executed. That after the execution of the deed, McArthur & Co. required an exhibit of the indebtedness of the firm and of the expenses monthly in working the furnace, and the quantity of iron made, &c., before they would decide upon making further advances to them; and upon receiving this exhibit McArthur & Co. not perceiving that money could be made at the business, declined to advance any thing more for the partnership. And it appears from the evidence that the deed was executed by Penman, Thompson & Penman with some expectation that they would 688 be further *aided by McArthur & Co. and also with the knowledge that without that aid they must fail in business.

Soon after the deed in favor of McArthur & Co. was put upon record, a large number of the creditors of Penman, Thompson & Penman procured judgments by confession against them, under an agreement between the creditors and the firm that the creditors were to be preferred in a certain order agreed upon. Among these preferred creditors, were the plaintiffs in this suit. These creditors having their judgments, filed their bill in behalf of themselves and the other creditors of Penman, Thompson & Penman, against the partners of said firm. William McArthur, William McArthur & Co. and Marion Penman, in which they insisted that under the act of March 29, 1837, in relation to limited partnerships, the deed of trust to secure McArthur & Co. was void, and that McArthur, by taking said deed, had rendered himself liable as a general partner, to the creditors of Penman, Thompson & Penman; and they insisted that Marion Penman was also a partner; and they prayed that the deed might be declared void; that McArthur and Marion Penman might be held liable to the creditors as general partners; that the property of the partnership might be subjected to the payment of the debts of the concern; and for general relief.

Marion Penman answered, denying that she was or had been a partner. McArthur insisted in his answer upon the validity of the deed to secure to the debt due to McArthur & Co. and denying his liability as a general partner. He said that the property of the partnership had been sold by the trustee in the deed to secure the Farmers Bank, and was sold for much less than its cost; and that if it had been sold at its cost or its estimated value when he became a special partner, it would have amounted to 689 largely more than *all the debts of Penman, Thompson & Penman, including that due to McArthur & Co. That so far as he knew, the deed to secure McArthur & Co. was not made in contemplation of insolvency; that if the firm was then insolvent it was not known to him, and he is satisfied that the members of the firm all believed that it was not insolvent, and that it was worth more than its indebtedness; and that was certainly the representation made to him by Penman, Thompson & Penman. Two of the partners, Thompson and Daniel Penman, expressed in their answer the same opinion as to the value of the property, and the great sacrifice made by the sale of it. They say that the improvements put upon the lands cost largely more than the whole lands, including improvements, sold for.

The cause came on to be heard in June 1852, when the court below dismissed the bill as to Marion Penman; declared the deed in favor of McArthur & Co. to be null and void; and also that the judgments confessed by Penman, Thompson & Penman subsequent to the deed, were also void; and that all the creditors, including McArthur & Co. were entitled to share ratably in the assets of the partnership, including in the assets the proceeds of the sale of a part of the personal property sold by the sheriff under executions issued on the judgments of the plaintiffs. The court held further, that McArthur was to be treated as a general partner, and as such was liable personally to all the creditors of the firm for any portions of their claims not satisfied out of the partnership assets; and that the creditors were entitled as against McArthur to have his interest in the share of the assets applicable to the debt due to McArthur & Co. retained and applied to the satisfaction of their debts; and to have the amount of his interest ascertained by a commissioner. And it was decreed that a commissioner should take an account of the debts of 690 Penman, *Thompson & Penman, and for this purpose summon the creditors before him in the manner prescribed in the Code of Virginia; that he also take an account of the assets of the partnership, treating the money made upon the plaintiffs' executions as a part thereof; and that he also report a ratable distribution of the assets among the creditors, showing the balance which will remain unpaid of each creditor's debt. And the commissioner was further directed to ascertain and report to the court whether the firm of McArthur & Co. are solvent and have sufficient assets (exclusive of the debt claimed in this cause) to satisfy their creditors, and what interest and share in the said firm William McArthur has as partner. In considering the two last questions the commissioner was to hear any evidence which might be offered by either party; but if no evidence was offered, he should presume the solvency of the firm, and that McArthur had an equal interest as partner.

On the 20th of November 1852 the cause came on to be finally heard upon the report of the commissioner, to which there was no exception, when the court made a decree in favor of each of the creditors for his ratable proportion of the assets of the firm of Penman, Thompson & Penman, and a personal decree against McArthur for the balance of the debts due each of the creditors as reported by the commissioner. From this decree McArthur obtained an appeal to this court

The case was argued orally by Patton, for the appellant, and in a printed note, by Conrad & Tucker, for the appellees.

DANIEL, J. The first assignment of error raises the question as to the validity of the deed of trust of April 6th, 1850, made for the benefit of William McArthur & Co.

691 *The 20th section of the act of 29th March 1837, concerning limited partnerships, declares that every sale, assignment or transfer of any property or effects of such partnership made by such partnership, when insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, or after or in contemplation of the insolvency of any partner, with the intent of giving a preference to any creditor of such partnership or insolvent partner, over other creditors of such partnership, and every judgment confessed, lien created, or security given by such partnership, under the like circumstances, and with the like intent, shall be void as against the creditors of such partnership. Sess. Acts 1836-7, p. 41. And the questions which we have to consider under this section are, Was the firm of Penman, Thompson & Penman insolvent at the date of the execution of the deed? Or did they make the deed in contemplation of insolvency? And in either event, was the deed made with an intent to give to McArthur & Co. a preference over other creditors of the partnership?

As preliminary, however, to the examination of the first of these questions, we have to ascertain the sense in which the term "insolvent" has been here used by the legislature.

On the part of the appellants it is contended that the legislature were looking to insolvency in the technical sense of the term, or open and notorious inability to pay; and in support of this view we have been referred to the cases of United States v. Hooe, 1 Cranch's R. 73, and Prince v. Bartlett, 8 Id. 431, in which the Supreme court of the United States have so defined the term in construing certain acts of congress fixing the priority of the United States over other creditors, of its debtors, claiming under conveyances, assignments, &c. made by the latter.

On the other hand, the counsel for the appellee contends that the statute is 692 analogous to a bankrupt law; *and that in construing it we should rather be guided by decisions ascertaining the meaning of the words as employed in such laws; and refers to the case of Bayly v. Schofield, 1 Maule & Selw. 338, and to an anonymous case reported in a note to Moss v. Smith, 1 Camp. Cas. 352. In the former of which the term "insolvency" as used in the bankrupt law of England in respect to a trader, was held to mean that he was not in a situation to make his payments as usual; and it was said that it would not follow that he was not insolvent because he might ultimately have a surplus upon the winding up of his affairs. And in the latter of which Lord Ellenborough held that the "insolvency" mentioned in the statute must mean a general inability in the bankrupt to meet his engagements.

I have examined these cases, but I have been unable to perceive that any of them furnish a rule to guide us in the decision of this. No such resemblance is shown between the statute under consideration and the law of congress on the one hand, or the English bankrupt law on the other, on which the decisions referred to were founded, as to justify the supposition that the legislature, in using the term in question, had a reference to the sense given to it in any one of said decisions. Showing however as they do that the word has received various and widely different interpretations, dependent on the character and object of the laws in which it is found, these decisions do serve the purpose of negativing or of tending to negative the conclusion that there is any well ascertained, generally received technical meaning so attached to the word as to require the courts to adopt it rather than its primary meaning, or some other sense to be gathered from the circumstances and connection in which the word is used.

In England limited partnerships of the kind sanctioned by our act of 1837, 693 (unless they have been *very recently introduced,) are unknown. Hence in the examination of such questions we are without the aid usually derived from a reference to the English reporters. Our act is, I believe, taken from that of New York, which was passed in 1822, and which, it is stated in a recent work on the subject, (Troubat on Limited Partnerships, p. 48,) was borrowed from the Commercial Code of France. Such partnerships are now authorized by statutes similar to our own, in most of the states of the Union. But the counsel have not cited, and I have been unable to find, any case in which the precise question before us has been decided. In the Code of 1849, p. 583, the legislature have used the term in its ordinary or primary sense, or have rather put such sense in the place of the term itself, by declaring, in the 10th section of the chapter on partnerships, &c. (which comprises substantially the provisions of the 20th and 21st sections of the act of 1837,) that "no sale, &c. of the property of any such partnership shall be valid if made at a time when it has not sufficient property or effects to pay all its debts, for the purpose of giving a preference to one or more of its creditors over any other creditor."

One of the objects and designs of such provision is to secure in case of the failure of the partnership a pro rata distribution of its property among all its creditors. To declare that open and notorious bankruptcy is the true and only test of insolvency, would, as was argued by the counsel for the appellees, defeat in most cases the design of the law, inasmuch as the desire of a firm in failing circumstances to sustain itself as also to prefer its special friends, would generally result in sales and assignments of most of its property, made to insure those ends, before such bankruptcy would occur. To say on the other hand that the firm shall be held to be insolvent whenever from any cause it may fail to meet its engage-694 ments in the *usual course of business, would seem to be harsh, and might tend greatly to discourage the formation of such partnerships. In a country like ours, where so much of its commercial business and trading enterprise are based on borrowed capital, and where sudden and unexpected expansions and contractions of the currency are matters of frequent occurrence, it may often happen that the most prudent firm, by the unexpected failure of some of its debtors to meet their payments, or other like causes, may find itself unprovided with available means to meet its own bills and notes as they mature, though possessed of assets amply sufficient to satisfy, ultimately, all its debts and liabilities. A law declaring it incompetent in a partnership so situated, to discharge its more pressing engagements by sales or assignments of portions of its property and credits to certain creditors, to pay or secure their demands, might, and most probably would, often occasion the stoppage and winding up of such concerns at times when the safety of the creditors would demand no such sacrifice.

The leading design and policy of the acts of 1837 and 1849 would seem to be essentially the same; and I have been unable to discover any good reason for supposing that the legislature, in declaring in the former, certain assignments made by such partnerships "when insolvent," to be void, intended any thing more or less than that which they have plainly manifested in the latter, by the declaration that such assignment shall not be valid "if made by the partnership at a time when it has not sufficient property or effects to pay all its debts."

Taking the insufficiency of its property to pay its debts to be the true test of the insolvency of the partnership, I do not think that any serious doubt can be entertained as to the insolvency of the firm in this case at the date of the deed.
695 The commissioner's *report (from the consideration doubtless that it was not excepted to) has not been made a part of the transcript of the record, and I have not thought it necessary to compile from the pleadings, exhibits and depositions a statement of the precise amount of the indebtedness of the concern. It is sufficient for the purpose in view to observe that the record shows the amount of the debts at the date of the deed to have been little, if any, less than the sum of forty thousand dollars. The sale of the property conveyed was made so soon after the execution of the deed, as when taken in connection with other circumstances and proofs, to negative the conclusion that there was any very material depreciation in the value of the property between the two events. The sale is shown to have been well attended and fairly conducted. And we have the opinions of witnesses whose capacity, business experience and knowledge of the value of such property, entitle their judgments to the greatest weight, that the property was well sold, and brought its full value. The entire proceeds of the sales are shown to be some twenty-two thousand dollars—a little more than half the aggregate of all the debts.

The deed was made at a time when the concern was confessedly greatly embarrassed. It contains a sweeping conveyance of the whole of the partnership property. It is made to secure the large debt of twelve thousand dollars—a debt nearly large enough (as the result has shown) to absorb the entire residue of the proceeds of the property, after discharging prior liens. Most if not all of the items of which the debt was composed, were then due. By the terms of the deed a sale is to be made whenever there shall be a failure to pay any part of the debt due or to become due, and McArthur & Co. shall require a sale to be made. It is said, it is true, that there was an expectation that McArthur & Co. would make further advances, by the 696 aid of *which and other means the firm could hope to relieve itself ultimately from its embarrassments, and proceed successfully with its enterprise; and the deed recites the desire and intention of the grantors to provide not only for the payment of the existing debt, but also for any further advances or acceptances which McArthur & Co. might make; and, on providing for the application of the proceeds in the event of a sale, directs the payment to McArthur & Co. of all debts due to them, or for which they are bound, or may be bound when the sale is made.

There is, however, I think, no proof of any assurance or promise by McArthur & Co. upon which a prudent firm could have reasonably built the expectation of further acceptances or advances by them. In this state of things, it is difficult to suppose that the parties did not contemplate as a probable result the events which speedily ensued the execution of the deed, viz: the stoppage and failure of the concern. I am satisfied that the deed was not only made at a time when there was an insufficiency of property to pay the debts of the firm, but was also made with the expectation of a winding up of the concern, at no remote period, with a deficiency of assets to pay its engagements; and so in contemplation of insolvency.

The deed, as has been already stated, conveys all the property of the partnership; and it provides for the payment of the debt of McArthur & Co. and for the payment of that debt alone. From these facts, and what has been already established in respect to the character and design of the deed, the further conclusion follows naturally, that the deed was made with the intent to give to McArthur & Co. a preference over other creditors; and that the judge of the Circuit court properly decreed the deed to be void as to them. That the Circuit court also decided correctly in declaring that the judgments confessed by the firm in favor 697 of *certain of their creditors subsequently to the execution of the deed of the 6th April 1850, were also void as to the other creditors, is, I think, equally clear. The twentieth section of the act, as we have seen, embraces in terms "every judgment confessed" "under the like circumstances, and with the like intent;" and the judgments in question were not only confessed after the execution of the deed and when the firm was notoriously insolvent, but were confessed under an agreement ascertaining the order in which they should rank in the distribution of the assets.

The twenty-second section of the act declares that every special partner who shall violate any provision of the twentieth and twenty-first sections, or who shall concur in or assent to any such violation by the partnership, or by any individual partner, shall be liable as a general partner. The execution of the deed was suggested by McArthur, and he is a party to it. That he was at one time liable as a general partner is therefore obvious.

The twenty-third section provides that in case of the insolvency or bankruptcy of the partnership, no special partner shall under any circumstances be allowed to claim as a creditor until the claims of all the other creditors of the firm shall be satisfied; and it was contended in the court below that inasmuch as the debt of twelve thousand dollars was due to a firm of which McArthur was a partner, such debt could not participate in the distribution of the assets of the concern of Penman, Thompson & Penman. The Circuit court very properly held, I think, that the section did not intend to exclude from such participation debts due to concerns of which the special partner might be a member. A debt due to McArthur & Co. is not a debt due to McArthur individually. The rights of McCrery, the other partner of the concern of McArthur & Co. stand obviously out 698 of and beyond the reach of *the terms and spirit of the section. Whilst McArthur's interest as a member of the concern of McArthur & Co. in the ratable proportion of the assets assignable to the debt due that concern, might, when ascertained, be reached by the creditors of the concern of Penman, Thompson & Penman, McCrery's interest therein, upon every principle of equity, occupied the same common ground with debts due to any other creditors having no connection with McArthur.

Upon the general principles governing the jurisdiction of courts of equity, and upon the reasoning of the chancellor in Innes v. Lansing, 7 Paige's R. 583, I think the jurisdiction taken by the Circuit court in this case is clear. We have had no controversy here, and the record discloses no evidence of any in the court below, between those judgment creditors, if any, who may have obtained their judgments in invitum, and those who obtained theirs by confession. There being thus no question in the case in respect to legal priorities, except such as have been shown to be void as to creditors, I do not perceive that there was any difficulty in the way of the court's proceeding, as it has done, to decree a ratable distribution of the assets of the firm among all the creditors.

And as the court had jurisdiction of the case for the purpose of protecting and distributing the assets, it had, in my opinion, a right to go on and give complete relief, and, to that end, to render such personal decrees as the rights and liabilities of the parties required. And if McArthur still remained liable as a general partner, I can see no objection to a decree against him to enforce that liability. The case of Haggerty v. Taylor, 10 Paige's R. 261, cited by the counsel of the appellant, in his written note, does not seem to me to conflict with this view; as, in that case, it was held that the complainants had shown no right to any share of the assets which they 699 were seeking to subject. *In that case the complainants were seeking to participate in the funds of a limited partnership which was to terminate at a particular period, on account of a debt contracted after such period with the general partners, who, without complying with the requisites of the act in respect to notice of a renewal or continuance of the partnership, had undertaken to continue the business.

The court held that the creditors of the firm, previous to the period fixed for the expiration of the partnership, were entitled to a preference, and should be paid ratably out of the property which then belonged to the limited partnership, and refused to appoint a receiver at the instance to the complainants. And as to any personal responsibility which the complainants had a right to assert against the defendants on account of transactions subsequent to the termination of the original partnership, they were remitted to their remedy at law. The distinction between the two cases is obvious. In Haggerty v. Taylor, the only relief to which the plaintiffs were entitled, if any, was one of a legal nature; whilst in the one before us the plaintiffs succeeded in establishing a right to the jurisdiction of the court on equitable grounds: And having done so the question for the court was whether it should go on and end the controversy, or put the parties to the expense and delay of numerous suits at law to fix a personal responsibility growing out of the same transaction, and to be established by the very proofs on which was founded the equitable relief sought by the plaintiffs and given by the court.

A doubt, however, has been suggested whether the judgment creditors, by proceeding at law against the other partners alone, have not thereby lost the right which they at one time had (as has been shown) to hold McArthur liable as a general partner. In order to solve this doubt, a further reference to the provisions 700 *of the act is necessary. The second section declares that such [limited] partnerships may consist of one or more persons who shall be called the general partners, and who shall be jointly and severally bound as partners now are by law, and of one or more persons who shall contribute in actual cash payments a specific sum or capital to the common stock, who shall be called special partners, and who shall not be liable for the debts of the partnership beyond the fund so contributed by them. By the third section the general partners only are authorized to transact business and sign for the partnership, and to bind the same.

In the fourteenth section it is declared that suits in relation to the business of the partnership may be brought and conducted by and against the general partners in the same manner as if there were no special partners; and the special partners shall be liable to and suable by the firm for debts contracted with it in the same manner as if they were not partners. The eighth section, however, it will be seen, after providing that no such partnership shall be deemed to have been formed until the certificate and affidavit in respect to the nature of the business of the firm, &c. required in previous sections, shall have been made and recorded, declares that if any false statement be made in such certificate or affidavit, all the persons interested in such partnership shall be liable for all the engagements thereof as general partners. And we have already seen in case of a concurrence by the special partner in the violation of the twentieth and twenty-first sections by the execution of the assignments, &c. therein prohibited, he is made liable as a general partner by the twenty-third section.

Without stopping to note the many points in which the relation borne by the members of such an association towards their associates and the public varies from that which exists in an ordinary partner-701 ship, it is sufficient *for our purpose to observe some of the more important differences which distinguish the two kinds of partnership in respect to the remedies given to creditors.

In the case of an ordinary partnership, a creditor is required to sue all the members of the firm in respect to any claim against the concern. And if he omits any one of the members, he may be met and defeated of his action by a plea in abatement. In the case of a limited partnership, he is expressly authorized to proceed against the general partners alone, in relation to any business of the partnership, in the same manner as if there was no special partner. And it is only when it is sought to make the latter liable personally on account of some violation of the statute which renders him liable as a general partner, that the creditor has any right to proceed against him.

In all cases where the creditor takes a judgment against one or more of the members of a general partnership, omitting others, he loses thereby all recourse at law against the latter, even though they be dormant partners, and unknown at the time to the creditor. The joint contract is held to be merged in the judgment as to the members against whom it is obtained; and being so merged, is equally barred as to the others, since no joint suit can be maintained upon it. Collyer on Part. 659, and cases cited in notes; Ward v. Motter, 2 Rob. R. 536.

On the other hand, it is obvious that there may be cases growing out of limited partnerships, in which it would be absurd to hold that a judgment against the general partners could be pleaded as a merger of the liability of the special partner. For it may often happen that the general partners may violate the provisions of the twentieth section by the execution of conveyances and assignments therein prohibited after judgments obtained against them. In a 702 suit brought *to make the special partner liable for his concurrence in such violation, the repugnancy to all legal reasoning, in allowing a previous judgment against the general partners to merge and bar the liability of the special partner, is too manifest to require comment.

So again, a falsehood in the certificate of partnership in respect to the capital contributed by the special partner, may never come to light till after a creditor proceeding under the fourteenth section has obtained his judgment against the general partners.

To declare that the judgment should bar a suit against the special partner, would not only be obviously unjust but in conflict with the terms of the eighth section, declaring all the persons interested in the partnership liable in such case as general partners. Yet in the case of a general partnership, (as has been already stated,) consisting of ostensible and dormant partners, a judgment against the ostensible partners completely bars all recovery at law against the dormant partners, though unknown to the plaintiff until after his judgment was obtained.

I deem it unnecessary to pursue the contrast further, as the points of variance already exhibited are sufficient to show that the technical rules, which so often embarrass and sometimes defeat the creditor in prosecuting at law his demands against the members of general partnerships, especially in cases where there are dormant partners, can have little application in regulating the remedies given by the statute against the members of a limited partnership.

In a case like the one before us, where the act, by the assent to which by the special partner, his liability as a general partner was incurred before the creditors had obtained their judgments, I do not doubt that the creditors might have united all of the partners in their several suits. The general partners were bound as such as well by their contracts as by their violation 703 of the *statute; and as the special partner by his concurrence in the execution of the prohibited conveyance, had also made himself liable as a general partner, no objection could have been made to joint actions against all the partners. But it by no means follows that the creditors were compelled to bring such actions. In a suit by a creditor against the general partners alone on the contract, it would have been an anomalous plea in abatement by them, wherein they should have alleged that since the execution of the contract they had united in an illegal effort with another, who was not made a party to the suit, to deprive the creditor of the benefit of his contract by the assignment of their effects to pay exclusively the debt due to another creditor.

It is obvious that the remedy upon the contract cannot be merged in the cause of action arising out of the wrongful act of the partners. And it seems to me that the question, whether in such case the creditor, by instituting his action against the general partners alone, and upon the contract, had elected to waive his remedy against the special partner for the violation of the act, would turn not upon the doctrine of technical merger, but upon the proofs in respect to his real intentions. The only case in which the analogy to be drawn from the law in respect to the remedies against general partnerships would seem to apply, would be when the creditor should, by the frame of his pleadings, show that he was proceeding on a cause of action arising out of the violation of the statute, and for which all the partners were liable; and should yet take a judgment against the general partners alone.

If, however, there be doubt as to whether if sued at law McArthur might not have pleaded the judgments against the general partners as a merger of the demand against him, it requires, I think, no extension of the principles recognized by this court 704 in the cases of *Sale v. Dishman's ex'or, 3 Leigh 548; Galt's ex'or v. Calland's ex'or, 7 Leigh 594; Weaver v. Tapscott, 9 Leigh 424, and Niday v. Harvey & Co., 9 Gratt. 454, to hold that such plea cannot avail in a court of equity. And the consideration that the creditors might possibly have encountered embarrassment and difficulty in the pursuit of the demand at law, serves but to furnish an additional argument why the Circuit court, instead of exposing them to such hazards, should have proceeded, as it has done, to give complete relief.

Having disposed of those questions, which from their novelty and difficulty seemed to me to call for more especial notice and remark by the court, the length to which I found it necessary to extend my opinion in doing so, induces me to forbear any further observation in respect to the other questions raised in the pleadings, than that, after having given to the whole record a careful examination, I have been unable to discover any error in the decrees of the court.

I think the decree should be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

Decree affirmed.

705 *Towner v. Lucas' Ex'or.

January Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Evidence—Valid Written Instrument—Parol Evidence to Vary.—Parol evidence will not be received to engraft upon or incorporate with a valid written contract an incident occurring cotemporaneously therewith, and inconsistent with its terms.
2. Same—Same—Same—Proof of Fraud.—The fraud which will let in such evidence must be fraud in the procurement of the instrument which goes to its validity, or some breach of confidence in using a paper delivered for one purpose and fraudulently perverting it to another.
3. Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Parol evidence is not admissible to prove, in behalf of one of three sureties in a bond, that he was induced to sign the bond upon the express promise of the obligee that he should not be required to pay any part of it, and that said obligee would give the said surety a written indemnity to save him harmless.
4. Chancery Practice—Bill by Surety for Relief against Judgment—Case at Bar.—A bill is filed by the surety for relief against a judgment recovered on the bond, which sets out such a parol promise as the ground of relief: As proof to sustain the case made by the bill would be inadmissible, the bill is demurrable.
5. Evidence—Written Instruments—Admission of Parol Evidence Discussed.—The principles upon which parol evidence to affect a written contract is admitted or excluded, investigated and stated by ALLEN, P.

This was a bill filed in the Circuit court of Jefferson county, by Edward Lucas, and afterwards on his death revived by his executors, against Benjamin T. Towner. The bill states that Towner had recovered three judgments against Lucas on three single bills executed by George Reynolds, Jacob W. Reynolds, Joseph McMurran, Conrad Billmyer and himself. That these single bills were given for a previous debt of George and Jacob W. Reynolds, the principals, and that before they were signed it was agreed between them and their three friends, McMurran, Billmyer and Lucas, that all were to sign or none were to be bound. That they were prepared and signed by the 706 Reynoldses *and the other two sureties, and before they were delivered to Towner they where presented to Lucas for his signature, who refused to sign them; he having in the meantime consulted with his friends, and having learned the extent of his previous liabilities for said Reynolds, which greatly exceeded those of the other parties, he changed his mind and refused to sign them. That nevertheless Towner got possession of the said bonds, and applied to Lucas for his signature, who again and repeatedly refused to sign them, until some eight months after they had been in the possession of Towner, when being in Towner's store, he was again urged by Towner to sign them, he alleging that Conrad Billmyer was talking disrespectfully of Captain Reynolds, and injuring Towner's credit; and that he wished to stop Billmyer's mouth, and pledged his honor that if Lucas would sign said bonds he should never be required to pay any part of the debt, and that he would give Lucas his written indemnity so as to save him harmless.

That Lucas being no lawyer and entirely ignorant of the legal consequences to the others of the delivery without his signature, and totally unapprised that by signing said bonds he might possibly jeopardize his friends, but ignorantly supposing that Towner having gotten possession of the bonds with the signatures of the others, they were already bound, and that therefore the addition of his name would not affect them, he permitted himself to be overcome by the importunities and representations of Towner as to his credit, and signed the bonds upon his promise of indemnity.

That as the said single bills fell due Towner instituted suit on them, and Lucas relying on Towner's promise put in no plea, and consequently Towner obtained judgment against him by default. The Reynoldses having taken the benefit of the bankrupt law, were exempted; and McMurran and Billmyer put in the plea of non est factum, and they were discharged.

*Evidence—Valid Written Instrument—Parol Evidence to Vary.—In a foot-note to Woodward v. Foster, 18 Gratt. 200, it is said: "There is no principle of law better settled than the broad general rule that parol evidence is not admissible to contradict, vary, add to, or alter the terms of a valid written instrument."

Then follows the long list of cases and references to other foot-notes in support of the rule laid down above.

In addition to the cases there cited the principal case is cited and followed in Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 316, 23 S. E. Rep. 612; Chapman v. Persinger, 87 Va. 586, 13 S. E. Rep. 549.

In the following cases the principal case is cited and the rule there laid down is approved, but they are distinguished from the principal case on the ground that to explain written instruments parol evidence will be admitted: Knick v. Knick, 75 Va. 19; Tuley v. Barton, 79 Va. 392; Snavely v. Pickle, 29 Gratt. 30, and note; McLean v. Ins. Co., 29 Gratt. 373, and note; Harvey v. Skipwith, 16 Gratt. 415; Johnson v. Burns, 39 W. Va. 658, 20 S. E. Rep. 687; Vance v. Snyder, 6 W. Va. 31.

707 *That after the suit was instituted on the first of the single bills Lucas applied to Towner for the indemnity he had promised as the condition of Lucas' signature, who then advised Lucas to keep quite and wait a while. Afterwards Lucas called again in company with his son, and demanded the promised indemnity, and was assured by Towner that he would fulfill his promise, but that he would not commit himself, and that Lucas had nothing to fear but his death.

The prayer of the bill was that the court would compel Towner to execute and deliver to Lucas a proper indemnity and release from the said judgments; that he and all others might be enjoined from proceeding to enforce the same; and for general relief.

Towner demurred to the bill: And he stated for cause of demurrer among others, that the bill sets up a parol agreement in conflict with and in contradiction to a written agreement. The court, however, overruled the demurrer; and Towner then answered, saying that he had no knowledge of the alleged agreement of the parties, except as he had since heard from them. He was no party to and had no knowledge of any condition before the complete execution and delivery of the bonds. He denied the statement of the bill relative to the alleged promises to Lucas that he should never be required to pay any part of the debt, and that the defendant would give him a written indemnity so as to save him harmless. He denies that in any conversation with Lucas he never admitted any such promise of indemnity. There were conversations on the subject, but not such as alleged in the bill: the substance of them was a denial by the defendant that he had ever made such promise, with a declaration that he would fulfill any promise that he had ever made.

The plaintiff filed testimony tending to prove a parol promise by Towner to 708 give to Lucas a written *indemnity against these bonds; and when the cause came on to be heard, the court directed an issue to try whether Towner did induce Lucas to sign the bonds by promising him that he should never be required to pay any part of the debt, and that he would give him a written indemnity to save him harmless. This issue was found in favor of Lucas. And the judge having certified that he was satisfied with the verdict, the court thereupon decreed that Towner should execute and deliver to Lucas' executor a bond indemnifying and releasing the estate of Lucas from the judgments in the bill mentioned; and that Towner be perpetually enjoined from proceeding to enforce the same. From this decree Towner obtained an appeal to this court.

Patton and Patton, jr., for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That the demurrer to the bill should have been sustained. That the parol promise relied on was not such as could be set up against the written contract contained in the bonds. That it did not come within any of the classes of cases in which parol evidence was held to be admissible to defeat a written contract. It did not tend to prove fraud in the procurement of the bonds. It did not add another term to the written contract, but went to defeat it entirely. It did not set up a subsequent parol agreement as a substitute for the prior written contract. And it was not the case of a defendant in equity opposing the specific execution of a contract. These are the exceptions to the general rule excluding parol evidence, within none of which this case falls. They referred to Stevens v. Cooper, 1 John. Ch. R. 425; Clarkson v. Hanway, 2 P. Wm. R. 203; Crawford v. Jarrett, 2 Leigh 630; 2 Stark. Evi. 761; Philips' Evi. 56, 481, 762, 785; Hoare v. Graham, 3 Camp. R. 59; Hogg v. Snaith, 1 Taunt. R. 347; Hare v. Shearwood, 1 Ves. Jr. R. 241; Moseley
709 v. Hanford, 21 *Eng. C. L. R. 156; Rogers v. Payne, 2 Wils. R. 376; Blake's Case, 6 Coke's R. 43; Watson v. Hurt, 6 Gratt. 633; Heagy v. Umberger, 10 Serg. & Rawle 339.

2d. That it was error to direct the issue. That all the evidence was by the plaintiff and referred to a parol contract, which could not be set up in the case; and was not sufficient in itself to outweigh the answer, which was responsive to the bill, and explicitly denied the promise therein stated. They referred to Wise v. Lamb, 9 Gratt. 294; Smith v. Betty, 11 Gratt. 752.

Steger, Mason and A. Hunter, for the appellee, insisted:

1st. That this was not a case in which it was proposed to add to or vary the terms of the written contract, but to set up the whole agreement. They admitted the general rule excluding parol evidence offered to add to or vary a written agreement; but they said there were numerous exceptions to that rule as well established as the rule itself. One is where part only of the agreement had been reduced to writing. 1 Greenl. Evi. § 284, a; Jeffery v. Walton, 1 Stark. R. 267, 2 Eng. C. L. R. 385; Brent v. Richards, 2 Gratt. 539. Another exception is where there is a new additional parol agreement. 1 Greenl Evi. § 303, 304. Another exception is where the written agreement is void by reason of fraud, &c. 1 Greenl. Evi. § 284, 296; 1 Story's Equ. Jur. § 153, 154, 155, and note 1 to § 154; Clark v. Grant, 14 Ves. R. 519; Hill v. Ely, 5 Serg. & Rawle 363; Miller v. Henderson, 10 Id. 290; the last cases being precisely like the present; Lyon v. Huntingdon Bank, 14 Id. 283; Pember v. Mathers, 1 Bro. C. C. 52. They also referred to the classes of cases in which parol evidence is admissible to convert an absolute deed into a mortgage; to cases of which King v. Smith, 2 Leigh 157, is one, in which a party is permitted to prove 710 that he signed a bond as surety *on condition that another should also sign it; and to cases in relation to the exchange of bonds.

2d. That it was proper to direct an issue in the case. They endeavored to show that this case did not come within the influence of the principle of the cases of Wise v. Lamb, 9 Gratt. 294; and Smith v. Betty, 11 Gratt. 752; and they insisted that by a reference to the pleadings and proof it was shown that the issue was properly directed.

ALLEN, P. It was said by the court in the Countess of Rutland's Case, 5 Coke's R. 25, "that it would be inconvenient that matters in writing, made by advice and on consideration, and which finally import the certain truth and agreement of the parties, should be controlled by an averment of parties, to be proved by the uncertain testimony of slippery memory." In Stevens v. Cooper, 1 John. Ch. R. 425, Chancellor Kent remarks, "that there is no rule of evidence better settled than that which declares that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or substantially vary the legal import of a written agreement. Such testimony is not only contrary to the statute of frauds, but to the maxims of the common law; and the rules of evidence on this as on most other points, are the same in courts of law and of equity." See Fell v. Chamberlain, 2 Dick. R. 484; Woollam v. Hearn, 7 Ves. R. 211; Jordan v. Sawkins, 3 Bro. C. C. 388. In Crawford v. Jarrett, 2 Leigh 630, Green, J., states the rule in these words: "Parol evidence cannot be admitted (unless in case of fraud or mistake) to vary, contradict, add to or explain the terms of a written agreement, by proving that the agreement of the parties was different from what it appears by the writing to have been." In Watson v. Hurt, 6 Gratt. 633, 644, Judge Baldwin announces the rule in the following terms: "It is perfectly well settled that the terms of a written 711 contract *cannot be varied by parol evidence of what occurred between the parties previously thereto or cotemporaneously therewith." In 1 Greenl. Evi. § 275, the author observes that the rule as now briefly expressed is, "that parol cotemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written instrument." The rule thus announced as a rule of the common law at so early a day has been uniformly adhered to by the courts both of England and this country ever since; but in the application of it to different instruments, difficulties have arisen. Courts, while laying down the rule as unquestioned and unquestionable, and professing to recognize its wisdom and binding authority, have drawn distinctions to take particular cases of apparent hardship from without its operation, which at first view would seem to violate the rule itself. An examination of the cases, however, I think, will show that no case has been decided in which such oral evidence has been received to engraft upon, or incorporate with, the contract an incident occurring cotemporaneously therewith, and inconsistent with its terms.

Thus, in Crawford v. Jarrett, 2 Leigh 630, it was held that in cases of equivocal written instruments, the circumstances under which they were made may be let in to explain their meaning; and in that case parol evidence of the time and manner of the execution and delivery of the written promise was admitted to show, that a party who had signed but whose name was not in the body of the instrument, was jointly bound with those named. There no new words were added to the instrument. The proof was consistent with the terms of the instrument, and the only effect of the oral evidence was to enable the court to read the writing by the light of surrounding circumstances, that it might ascertain the meaning of the parties.

So in Wigglesworth v. Dallison,
712 Doug. R. 201, it *was decided that a custom that a tenant, whether by parol or deed, shall have the way going crop at the end of the term, is good if not repugnant to the terms of the lease; Lord Mansfield observing that the custom did not alter or contradict the lease, but only added something to it. Perhaps a more satisfactory reason for not applying the rule to such a contract is given by Park, B., in Hutton v. Warren, 1 Mees. & Welsb. 466, that such evidence is left in upon the principle of presumption that the parties did not mean to express in writing the whole of the contract by which they intended to be bound, but to contract with reference to the known usage. He doubted the wisdom of the relaxation of the common law rule, but as between landlord and tenant it had been too long settled by authority to change the practice.

So with reference to commercial transactions, proof of usage is admitted either to interpret the meaning of the language of the contract, or to ascertain its extent, in the absence of express stipulations, or where the language is obscure. As where a promissory note is payable with grace, evidence of the established and known usage of the bank where it is payable, is admissible to show on what day the grace expired. Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. R. 581. Oral evidence is also admitted to prove that a person who signed as principal was in reality an agent, when offered for the purpose of charging the principal with the contract: Upon the ground we are told in 2 Smith's Leading Cases 307, of assimilating this case of a dormant principal, to that of a dormant partner. The latter is liable on the ground of agency, and if they trade under the name of A, that name when used in a contract relating to such trade, comprehends both. And if one may contract jointly with another in the name of that other, he may contract individually in the same way;
713 and parol evidence is admissible *to show the agent so contracted for him. It is not to contradict or change the terms of the written contract, but to show the import of the signature.

So where oral evidence is admitted to show in an action on a promissory note acknowledged to be for value received, a want of consideration for the promise, or that the instrument was void by reason of fraud or illegality, these may be proved as distinct independent facts collateral to the contract, but not tending to vary or contradict the terms of it. Nor, as it seems, does the rule apply where the contract was reciprocal, and the part applicable to one party only has been reduced to writing. Of this class was the case of Brent v. Richards, 2 Gratt. 539. That was a parol contract for the sale of a slave at a reduced price, with a condition if the purchaser desired to sell, the seller should have him at the price he received. The vendor executed a bill of sale which was silent as to the condition to repurchase. The purchaser afterwards sold to a stranger at a higher price. In a suit by the seller against the purchaser this court held, that the deed was not an estoppel in evidence of any matter not inconsistent with and contradictory of it. That the deed was merely the execution of the contract on the part of the vendor, and put the property in the condition in which the contract sued on began to operate.

So oral evidence of a subsequent contract varying the terms of a previous contract on a new consideration, or of a discharge thereof, does not contradict or change the terms of the contract, but establishes independent facts, to avoid the effect of it.

And so in the cases relied on where a court of equity is called upon to exercise its peculiar jurisdiction, by decreeing a specific performance, the party to be charged is permitted to show by oral testimony, that under the circumstances the plaintiff 714 is not entitled to *have the agreement enforced. Woollam v. Hearn, 7 Ves. R. 211; Clark v. Grant, 14 Ves. R. 519; Ramsbottom v. Gosden, 1 Ves. & Beame 165. And this because parol evidence may be received to rebut an equity, and specific performance is not decreed ex debito justitiæ, but rests in discretion.

And so with respect to such evidence to prove an attempt to convert into an absolute sale that which was intended as a security for a loan; it is the fraudulent attempt of the grantee, and perhaps on the ground of a resulting trust in favor of the grantor, that such evidence is re-
715 ceived.* The latter is probably *the true reason for the relaxation of the rule in this instance. To let in oral evidence to prove that the parties intended a deed to be a mortgage which purports on its face to be absolute, is to establish a different agreement by parol testimony, in the violation of which the fraud consists. Unless this case be an exception to the general rule, I can find no case which determines that oral cotemporaneous evidence is admissible to contradict the terms of a written agreement, or substantially vary the legal import thereof, provided the instrument was a valid instrument, and the party designed to execute it in its existing form. The fraud which will let in 716 such proof, *must be fraud in the procurement of the instrument, which goes to its validity, or some breach of confidence in using a paper delivered for one purpose and fraudulently perverting it to another. In such cases the oral evidence tends to prove independent facts, which if established avoid the effect of the written agreement by facts dehors the instrument, but do not tend to contradict or vary it.

It is reasoning in a circle, to argue that fraud is made out, when it is shown by oral testimony that the obligee cotemporaneously with the execution of a bond, promised not to enforce it. Such a principle would nullify the rule: for conceding that such an agreement is proved, or any other contradicting the written instrument, the party seeking to enforce the written agreement according to its terms, would always be guilty of fraud. The true question is, Was there any such agreement? And this can only be established by legitimate testimony. For reasons founded in wisdom and to prevent frauds and perjuries, the rule of the common law excludes such oral testimony of the alleged agreement; and as it cannot be proved by legal evidence, the agreement itself in legal contemplation, cannot be regarded as existing in fact. Neither a court of law or of equity can act upon the hypothesis of fraud where there is no legal proof of it. Thus although for the reasons given, parol evidence that a person who signed as principal was in truth an agent, is admissible when offered for the purpose of charging the principal with the contract; such evidence can never be received for the purpose of exonerating an

Note by the Judge.—In Russell v. Southard & als., 12 How. U. S. R. 139, the question was, Whether the deed was a mortgage or conditional sale?

CURTIS, J., delivered the opinion of the court. "It is insisted on behalf of the defendants, that this question is to be determined by inspection of the written papers alone, oral evidence not being admissible to contradict, vary or add to their contents. But we have no doubt extraneous evidence is admissible to inform the court of every material fact known to the parties when the deed and memorandum were executed. This is clear both upon principle and authority. To insist on what was really a mortgage, as a sale, is in equity a fraud, which cannot be successfully practiced under the shelter of any written papers, however precise and complete they may appear to be." He refers to Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch 238. Then he says, "And in Nixon v. Rose, 1 How. U. S. R. 126, it is stated, the charge against Nixon is, substantially, a fraudulent attempt to convert that into an absolute sale which was originally meant to be a security for a loan. It is in this view of the case that the evidence is admitted to ascertain the truth of the transaction, though the deed be absolute on its face."

"These views are supported by many authorities." And he cites a number.

After stating that if the courts of Kentucky had decided differently, the Supreme court would not be controlled by them, he proceeds: "But we do not perceive that the rule held in Kentucky differs from that above laid down. That rule, as stated in agent who has entered into a written contract in which he appears as principal; for such evidence would alter the written contract. Higgins v. Senior, 8 Mees. & Welsb. 834; Hunt v. Adams, 7 Mass. R. 518; Stackpole v. Arnold, 11 Mass. R. 27.

Numerous examples of the cases in 717 which *such evidence has been rejected may be found referred to in 1 Greenl. Evi. § 281. Amongst the cases cited are some deciding, that where the instrument purported to be an absolute engagement to pay at a specified day, parol evidence of an oral agreement at the same time, that the payment should be prolonged, or depend upon a contingency, or be made out of a particular fund, is inadmissible. The case of Watson v. Hurt, 6 Gratt. 633, is a striking instance of the application of the rule. There a promissory note to the plaintiff, payable on demand, was endorsed by a stranger which entitled the plaintiff to fill up the blank endorsement with a guarantee by the defendant for the payment of the money according to the terms of the note. As the note was payable on demand, an action on it was barred by the statute of limitations. But the making of the note and the endorsement were cotemporaneous acts, part of the same transaction, and this court decided that it was inadmissible to show by oral testimony a parol agreement at the time of the execution of the note by the principal and endorsement by the guarantor, that the note instead of being payable on demand and absolutely, was payable only conditionally upon the happening of a future event. That such evidence would have been inadmissible as against the maker and much more so as against the guarantor. And the consequence was the defeat of the action by the statute of limitations in contravention and fraud of the cotemporaneous parol agreement, provided there could have been any legal proof of the existence of such agreement.

Cases have been cited from 5th and 14th Sergeant and Rawle's Reports, establishing a different principle, as it has been argued, and they have been much relied upon. An examination of the cases satisfies me that the court did not intend to come in conflict with the general rule, which was ex-

718 pressly recognized, but supposed *the facts of the cases withdrew them from its operation. In the case of Hill v. Ely, 5 Serg. & Rawle 363, notes were delivered to the plaintiff by the defendant in payment of goods purchased at the time of giving the notes; the notes were endorsed by the defendant, who being sued as endorser was permitted to prove by oral testimony, that at the time of the endorsements it was expressly agreed that the defendant was not to be held responsible as endorser for the payment of the notes, but that the endorsement was made for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to collect the money from the maker. The court held that the endorsee stood not as an endorsee with a full endorsement, but with a blank endorsement, which he had no authority to fill up with a full endorsement so as to render the endorser liable for payment; that the endorsement being made merely to enable the plaintiff to collect the notes, he received them in trust for this purpose alone; and the case was held to fall within the principle of cases deciding that notes delivered to an agent to be discounted for the use of the principal, discounted for his own use to persons having knowledge, should be delivered up, and other cases deciding, as between parties to negotiable paper, that no consideration or fraud may be shown. Of this case it may be remarked that the mere endorsement did not pass title; it was the contract of which the endorsement was the evidence. And the contract being conditional, made with one intent, it was a fraudulent perversion of it to use it for another purpose. The evidence did not contradict but was let in

Thomas v. McCormack, 9 Dana 109, is that oral evidence is not admissible in opposition to the legal import of the deed and the positive denial in the answer, unless a foundation for such evidence had been first laid by an allegation and some proof of fraud or mistake in the execution of the conveyance, or some vice in the consideration.

"But (the judge continues) the enquiry still remains what amounts to an allegation of fraud or some vice in the consideration: and it is the doctrine of this court, that when a loan on security was intended, and the defendant sets up the loan as the payment of purchase money, and a conveyance as a sale, both fraud and vice in the consideration are sufficiently averred and proved to require a court of equity to hold the transaction to be a mortgage."

The opinion of the court in the case referred to from Kentucky, of Thomas v. McCormack, is free from doubt as to what was meant by the phrase "of the allegation and proof of fraud or mistake in the execution of the conveyance or vice in the consideration." In a subsequent paragraph, the chief justice says, "In this case there is neither allegation nor proof of either fraud or mistake in the execution of the deed, nor is there any suggestion of an illegal or immoral consideration. On the contrary, there can be no doubt the grantor intended the deed to be absolute on its face when he signed it; and that the grantee was guilty of no fraud in procuring such a deed; and that the consideration for it was valuable and legal." Thus showing the fraud referred to, was fraud in the procurement or execution of the deed, or the consideration was vicious because immoral or illegal; and therefore such proof was not in opposition to the legal import of the deed, but on the contrary was proof of a matter collateral to it and impairing its validity as a deed. In Floyd v. Harrison, 2 Rob. R. 161, 175, the question was alluded to by JUDGE BALDWIN, who remarked in substance, that such extrinsic evidence may be received when it may be fairly referred to fraud, accident or mistake. But he does not say distinctly whether the fraud should relate to the execution of the deed; or whether it could be established by evidence of a cotemporaneous oral agreement varying the import of a valid instrument which the party knew to be an absolute deed when he executed it. The illustrations which he gives relate chiefly to the execution of the instrument.

to show what were the terms of the contract, and when filled up actually or by supposition, it was a qualified endorsement.

In the case of Heagy v. Umberger, 10 Serg. & Rawle 389, the opinion was delivered by the same learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in Hill v. Ely.

It was an action against the assignor
719 for the *insolvency of the maker.

The assignment showed no guarantee of solvency, but the contrary was expressed. Duncan, judge, observed that the courts had gone far enough in admitting parol evidence where the contract was in writing; that where there was no fraud alleged, or mistake, or omission by the scrivener, and the writing expressly excluded all guarantee of the solvency of the maker, to admit parol evidence to contradict it, would be contrary to every rule of law, and would render all writings worse than useless; that whatever is reduced to writing, that is to be considered as the evidence of the agreement, and every thing resting in parol becomes thereby extinguished.

In the case of Lyon v. Huntingdon Bank, 14 Serg. & Rawle 283, the bank agreed to loan upon the credit solely of certain bonds, but in compliance with the rules of the bank required a note with an endorser for form sake to be put in, and assured the party that the note was a mere matter of form without responsibility on the signers. Tilghman, Ch. J., said that where there is an agreement in writing, parol evidence of the same agreement is inadmissible, but the evidence offered did not fall within the rule. It was not pretended that any thing was wrong in the note or that any alteration whatever should be made in it. In point of fact it was never executed and made as an effective operative security, to bind the parties. It was a matter of form required by the officers to show a compliance on their part with the rules of the bank, and it was a fraud to attempt to set it up as a valid security. It was evidence of independent facts to avoid the effect of what purported to be a valid security, but not to contradict or vary the terms of it. How far the distinction taken was well founded might be a question; the case

720 was decided *because the court considered it did not come within the influence of the general rule.

With this view of some of the authorities in regard to the application of the rule of evidence, it remains to enquire whether by the case as made by the bill the appellee seeks relief by oral evidence of an agreement additional to, but consistent with, the terms of the written agreement, or by proof of fraud in the procurement thereof, or of a breach of confidence in perverting what was delivered conditionally or diverso intuitu, and using it as a valid instrument; or by proof of any mistake or omission and a fraudulent attempt to take advantage thereof.

The bill alleges the recovery of a judgment by the appellant against the appellee's testator Edward Lucas, in the Circuit court of Jefferson county on three single bills executed by George Reynolds, Jacob W. Reynolds, J. McMurran, C. Billmyer and the said Lucas. That these papers were given for a previous debt due by the two Reynoldses the principals, and that before they were signed, it was understood and agreed between the two principals and their three friends McMurran, Billmyer and Lucas, that all were to sign or none would be bound. That subsequently the said notes were prepared by J. W. Reynolds, and after they were signed by G. Reynolds, J. W. Reynolds, McMurran and Billmyer, and before their delivery to the appellant, they were presented to the appellee's testator, who refused to sign them, in consequence of consultation with his friends, and learning the extent of his previous liabilities for said Reynolds greatly exceeding those of the other parties. That nevertheless the appellant contrived to get possession of the bonds, without the signature of the appellee's testator, and applied himself to the appellee's testator for his signature, who again and repeatedly refused to sign the 721 bond until *some eight months after they had been in possession of the appellant, when being in the appellant's store, the latter again urged him to affix his signature, alleging that Billmyer was talking disrespectfully of Captain Reynolds, and injuring the appellant's credit; that he wished to stop Billmyer's mouth, and pledged his honor that if the appellee's testator would sign the bonds, he should never be required to pay any part of the debt, and that he would give the appellee's testator his written indemnity so as to save him harmless. That not being a lawyer and entirely ignorant of the legal consequences to others of the delivery without his signature, unapprized that by signing the bonds he might possibly jeopardize his friends, but ignorantly supposing that the appellant having got possession of the bonds with the signature of the others, they were already bound, and that therefore the addition of his name would not affect them, he permitted himself to be overcome by the importunities and representations of the appellant as to his credit, and signed the said bonds upon his said promise of indemnity.

The bill further avers that as the bonds become due the appellant put them in suit, and that still relying on the appellant's promise, no plea was put in by the appellee's testator, and judgment went against him by default. That the principals were bankrupt, and that the other defendants McMurran and Billmyer put in pleas of non est factum, and were discharged.

It is further averred in the bill that after the suit was brought upon the first bond, the appellee's testator applied to the appellant for the indemnity he had promised as the condition of his signing, and the appellant advised him to keep quiet and wait a while; that afterwards he called again in company with his son, and demanded the promised indemnity, and was assured by the appellant that he would fulfill his promise, but that he would not commit himself, and that 722 *the appellee's testator had nothing to fear but his death. The bill concludes with a prayer to require the appellant to comply with his promise to execute and deliver a proper indemnity and release from the said judgments, for an injunction, and for general relief.

To this bill the appellant demurred. The rule of evidence which excludes parol evidence tending to vary or contradict the terms of a written agreement is the same in equity as at common law. And the question is presented whether parol evidence tending to prove the oral contract set up in the bill would not vary or contradict the bonds executed by the obligor. No fraud is alleged in the procurement of the bonds; it is not averred that the appellant was apprised of the alleged understanding and agreement that all were to sign or none; the consideration of the bonds was a previous debt, and it is not pretended that they were not executed and delivered as valid securities.

What does the bond import? That the obligor binds himself to pay the money at a certain day; and the law, with reference to which the parties contracted, declares that he may be compelled to pay. If the bond or writing contained on its face and as part of the instrument a clause providing that payment should never be demanded or enforced, such stipulation would go to the whole obligation, and it would possess no validity. Without a provision of that kind, it is an obligation to pay which the obligee could enforce; with such a stipulation it is utterly worthless. The writing is but evidence of the agreement, and if it can be established and set up by oral evidence, the agreement when once proved must have the same effect. It shows that that which from the face of the instrument would appear to have been intended as a valid security, was by an agreement co-temporaneous with its execution, de-723 signed to be of no *validity as an obligation. The promise alleged is, that he should never be required to pay any part of the debt, and that he would give his written indemnity so as to save him harmless, and that he signed upon his said promise of indemnity. Treating it as equivalent to a promise not to sue, or a promise to save him harmless, it could, if in writing under seal, have been relied on as a release or defeasance, and would in effect have discharged the obligor from the obligation of his bond. The case as made by the bill cannot be brought within the principle of any of the cases withdrawn from the operation of the rule of evidence under consideration, unless it be that class where the original contract was verbal and entire, and part only of it was reduced to writing. But in this case there was no such verbal contract with the appellee's testator; his contract as set forth, was to be manifested by his signature to the bond. No consideration passed to him, no contract bound him, upon which an action could have been maintained until he executed the bond. His liability and the extent of it rests upon the bond alone. The case therefore wants an essential constituent of the cases under this head, relied upon in argument. The hirer of a slave agrees to pay a certain price, and to employ him in a certain manner. The contract is oral and complete without writing, and an action could be maintained for a breach. The execution of a note for the price would not extinguish so much of the contract as related to the mode of employment. In this class of cases too, the oral evidence does not vary, contradict or in any way affect the written instrument; it consists with it; and by admitting the evidence of the additional matter, full effect is given to the entire parol contract. The case of Brent v. Richards, 2 Gratt. 539, was decided on a principle somewhat analogous. But the case as made by the bill in this case, 724 fails in both respects. There *was no such entire original parol agreement upon which an action could have been maintained if no bond had been executed; and the proof, instead of consisting with the writing, leaving it to operate fully according to its terms, abrogates and utterly avoids it.

The case cannot be brought under any head of fraud, except by proof of the co-temporaneous agreement inconsistent with the written instrument; and, for the reasons already given, no proof of that kind can legitimately be received. No such agreement in legal contemplation exists, and no fraud can be imputed to the obligee for insisting on the terms of his bond. If it be averred, that although a note is on its face payable on demand and unconditionally, there was a cotemporaneous oral agreement, that the time for payment should be postponed, or required only upon the happening of a certain contingency, parol evidence of such an agreement is inadmissible. Mosely v. Hanford, 21 Eng. C. L. R. 156; Free v. Hawkins, 8 Taunt. R. 92; Hanson's trustees v. Stetson, 5 Pick. R. 506; Spring v. Lovett, 11 Pick. R. 417; Watson v. Hurt, 6 Gratt. 633. Yet it might be argued with the same force, that this oral agreement may have induced the party to sign the note, and that it is a gross fraud to attempt to enforce it according to its terms. And so it would be if the existence of the agreement could be judicially established. But there being no legal proof of it, there is nothing of which fraud can be affirmed. The rule is founded in wisdom, and a different principle would weaken confidence in all securities for debts. Matters in writing, instead of finally importing the certain truth and agreement of parties, would be a snare and delusion. The party relying on an instrument in writing as the final result in which all previous negotiations have centered, would be met and "controlled by an averment to be proved by the uncertain testimony of slippery memory." The principle of 725 the decision *in Waston v. Hurt, and the other cases referred to, would seem to be decisive against the pretensions of the testator of the appellee. As no evidence of the cotemporaneous agreement set out would have been legitimate, the bill, which is a bill for relief in equity, stating a case of which there can be no legal proof, shows no ground for relief, and the demurrer should have been sustained. If we look beyond the bill to the pleadings and proof, the answer expressly denies the alleged promise relied on, and there was nothing but oral evidence tending to establish it. Instead of directing an issue, the case should have been dismissed at the hearing. The application of the rule of evidence referred to removes from under the case of the appellee the ground on which it rests; being incurably defective, no amendment could help him.

I think the decree should be reversed, and a decree entered dismissing the bill.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, P.

Decree reversed.

726 *Lee v. Hodges.

January Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Seduction—Action by Father—Relation of Master and Servant.—The action by a father for the seduction of his daughter is founded on the relation of master and servant, and not that of parent and child.
2. Same—Same—Same—Declaration Must Allege.—In such action the declaration must allege the relation of master and servant, or it will be fatally defective on demurrer.
3. Same—Same—Same—Need Not Prove Loss of Services—Statute.—The only change made by the act, Code, ch. 148, § 1, p. 589, in relation to the action of seduction, is to dispense with proof of the loss of service: The act does not give the action in any case where it did not lie at common law.†
4. Same—Same—When Will Not Lie—Case at Bar.—Where a daughter over the age of twenty-one years, who lives away from her father's house, under a contract for her services made by herself after she came of age, for her own benefit, is seduced, the action by the father will not lie either at common law or under the statute.

This was an action on the case in the Circuit court of Franklin county by Elijah Hodges against Charles C. Lee, for the seduction of the plaintiff's daughter. The declaration contained two counts, the first of which charged the seduction of the plaintiff's daughter, Julia F. Hodges, by the defendant, by which the plaintiff was deprived of his domestic peace and happiness, and his comfort in the society of his daughter; and that he had been obliged to pay a large sum of money about the nursing of her; but did not charge the loss of her services. The second count was in the usual form.

The defendant appeared and demurred to each count of the declaration, and pleaded "not guilty," and the 727 *plaintiff joined in the demurrer, and took issue on the plea. There does not appear to have been any judgment upon the demurrer; but the cause came on to be tried upon the issue joined on the plea.

On the trial after the evidence had been introduced which is stated in the opinion of Judge Daniel, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed from the testimony in the cause that the said Julia F. Hodges was, at the time of the said alleged seduction, more than twenty-one years of age; that she was then residing with the defendant, and not with the plaintiff, under a contract made with the defendant by her to render him service in his own house for twelve months, for a consideration agreed by the plaintiff to be paid to said Julia F. Hodges, for her own use; and that such contract was made after the said Julia F. Hodges had attained the age of twenty-one years, they must find for the defendant. But the court refused to give the instruction; and the defendant excepted.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for four thousand five hundred dollars; which the defendant moved the court to set aside on the ground that the damages were excessive; but the plaintiff having in open court released fifteen hundred dollars, parcel of the said damages, the court overruled the motion, and rendered a judgment for three thousand dollars. The defendant thereupon applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

The case was argued orally by Patton, and in writing by Wootton, for the appellant. There was no counsel for the appellee.

DANIEL, J. The action by which a father recovers for the seduction of his daughter is founded not on the relation of parent and child, but on the relation 728 *actual or constructive of master and servant. The loss of service which he has sustained or is supposed to have sustained in consequence of the debauchment of his servant, is the ground on which his legal right to damages rests at the common law; though when this prerequisite to the maintenance of the suit is established, the damages which he is allowed to recover are not measured by the value of the services which have been lost or are supposed to have been lost to him, but find their standard rather in the magnitude of the wrong which has been done to his feelings as a father.

time of the seduction, the rules which have been adopted by the courts in this country in respect to the nature of the facts and circumstances necessary to prove the relation of master and servant and loss of service to the father, vary in some important particulars from those which have hitherto prevailed in England. Where, however, the daughter is above the age of twenty-one years, there is no difference between the English and American cases as to the necessity of the father's showing generally, in order to maintain his suit, that the daughter was living with him or was in his service at the time of the seduction; though any acts of service, however slight, have been held sufficient. Nickles v. Stryker, 10 Johns. R. 115; 2 Rob. Pr. 559 (new ed.); Postlethwaite v. Burke, 3 Burr. R. 1878; Bennett v. Allcott, 2 T. R. 166. An exception to this rule was however allowed in the case of Speight v. Oliviera, 3 Eng. C. L. R. 445, where the defendant, under the false pretense of hiring the plaintiff's daughter as a servant, induced her to leave her father's house where she was rendering service in domestic matters, and afterwards seduced her whilst she was remaining in his the defendant's house. In that case, though the daughter was twenty-three 729 years of age, the father *was allowed to recover upon the ground that the absence of the daughter from her father's house and the interruption in her services were occasioned by the fraud and contrivance of the seducer.

In the case before us it appears from the evidence, as set out in the bill of exceptions, that the daughter of the defendant in error, at the time of the alleged seduction, was between twenty-three and twenty-four years old; that her general home was at the house of her father, but that she sometimes took service in the houses of families in the neighborhood, returning, at the end of the terms of such service, to her father's house; and that she was, at the time of the said alleged seduction, residing not with her father, but in the neighborhood, in the house of the plaintiff in error, under a contract, made by her with him, after she had attained the age of twenty-one years; by the terms of which contract she was to render him service in his house for the space of twelve months for a price to be paid her for her use; and that before her pregnancy became known to others, and before the end of the year for which she had contracted to live with the plaintiff in error, she left his house and service, and after living a short time at the house of another person, returned to the house of her father, where she was delivered of a child before the institution of the suit.

If we apply to this statement of the case the rules of the common law already mentioned, it is obvious that there is no ground on which to rest the refusal of the Circuit court to instruct the jury that the action could not be maintained.

The daughter was of full age, living away from her father's house, under a contract made by her and for her own exclusive benefit, after she had attained her majority, when she had a right to make her own contracts. There is an absence 730 of any evidence going to *show that improper means were used to induce her to enter into the contract, or that the plaintiff in error entertained any improper designs towards her when he engaged her services. It does not even appear that she was in the father's service, or that she owed him any service, or was living with him at the time when the contract was made. The fact that she returned to her father's house, and was there delivered of a child before the institution of the suit, does not make out a case. There is no evidence that the father paid or became in any manner liable to pay the expenses of her lying in. And indeed had there been such evidence, it would not have furnished under the circumstances a ground for the action.

It is suggested, however, in the petition for the supersedeas, (and I presume properly,) that the judge of the Circuit court, in refusing to give the instruction, was governed by what he supposed to be a change in the law, effected by a provision of the Code of 1849, declaring that "an action for seduction may be maintained without any allegation or proof of the loss of the service of the female by reason of the defendant's wrongful act."

The defendant in error has not been represented by counsel here; and I regret that in a case of such interest turning upon a statute, the construction of which is now for the first time made the subject for the consideration of this court, and to which such important effects have been attributed by the judge below, we have to proceed to a decision without the aid of the views which controlled his judgment.

On the part of the plaintiff in error the ground is taken in the petition for a supersedeas, that in an action for seduction at the common law, it is necessary to aver and prove not only the relation of master and servant, but also the fact of the loss of service; and it was urged as well in an oral as in a written argument pre-731 sented *by his counsel, that the only design contemplated by the section in question is to dispense simply with what is familiarly known in pleading as the "per quod servitium amisit," and the proof to sustain its averments; and consequently, that it is just as essential now as it was before the enactment of the Code, to aver and prove the relation of master and servant; or the right (at least) of the plaintiff to the services of the female alleged to be seduced. In support of this view, it was said that such was evidently the design of the revisors in recommending the enactment of the section as shown in their report; and it was argued that as the legislature adopted the section without alteration, it was fair to infer they had the same design in passing it.

At page 734 of their report, in a note to this section, the revisors say, "The foundation of the action by a father to recover damages against the wrongdoer for the seduction of his daughter, has been uniformly placed not upon the seduction itself, which is the wrongful act of the defendant, but upon the loss of service of the daughter, in which service he is supposed to have a legal right or interest. It has therefore been held in England that the loss of service must be alleged in the declaration and proved at the trial, or the plaintiff must fail. 'It is (says Chief Justice Tindal in Grinnell v. Wells, 7 Mann. & Gran. 1033, 49 Eng. C. L. R. 1033,) the invasion of the legal right of the master to the services of his son, that gives him the right of action for beating his servant; and it is the invasion of the same legal right and no other, which gives the father the right of action against the seducer of his daughter.' Yet in Revill v. Satterfit, 1 Holt's R. 442, 3 Eng. C. L. R. 153, it was conceded by Hullock, sergeant, for the defendant, that in most cases of this sort the condition of service was regarded as a mere conveyance to the 732 *action. It was the form through which the injury was presented to the court; and having obtained its admission upon legal principles, it brought along with it as parts of itself all the circumstances of the case. And Chief Justice Tindal, in the case referred to, says 'The damages recoverable by the father when he brings the action, are confessedly not limited to the actual expenditure of his money, but may be given according to the circumstances of aggravation in the particular case.' It is obvious, then, that the ground of action is technical and the loss of service in a great degree a fiction; since the most trifling and valueless acts of service have been admitted as sufficient. In some cases indeed the action is placed upon the right to claim the services. In Hewitt v. Prime, 21 Wend. R. 79, Nelson, C. J., delivering the opinion of the Supreme court of New York, says, 'The old idea of loss of menial services, which lay at the foundation of the action, has gradually given way to more enlightened and refined views of the domestic relations. These are, that the services of the child are not alone regarded as of value to the parent. As one of the fruits of more cultivated times, the value of the society and attentions of a virtuous daughter is properly appreciated; and the loss sustained by the parent from the corruption of her mind and the defilement of her person by the guilty seducer is considered ground for damages.' The action being fully sustained in his judgment by proof of the act of seduction in the particular case, other circumstances come in by way of aggravating the damages. There being such opposite opinions as to what is necessary to afford a legal ground for the action, and the rule established in New York placing the action upon that which a jury look to in estimating the damages, we think it best that the same rule should be adopted in Virginia."

If after looking to the note of the 733 revisors any *doubt remains as to the end which they had in view in proposing the enactment, that doubt may, I think, be removed by noticing somewhat more particularly the cases to which they refer. In the first case, Grinnell v. Wells, the declaration alleged that the daughter of the plaintiff was a poor person, who maintained herself by her labor and personal services, and was unable to maintain herself except by her labor and personal services; that she was under the age of twenty-one years, and that by means of the seduction and her consequent pregnancy and sickness she became unable to work or to maintain herself, and that her father being of sufficient ability to maintain her, was forced and obliged to maintain her at his own charges, and incurred and paid divers expenses in maintaining, nursing and taking care of her during her sickness, &c.

It will be perceived that there was a failure to allege any loss of service to the plaintiff; and after a verdict in his favor for two hundred pounds, there was a motion in arrest of judgment, which was sustained. Tindal, C. J., after stating the character of the declaration, said that the right of the father to recover damages for the seduction of his daughter had been uniformly placed, not upon the seduction itself, but upon the loss of the service of the daughter. And in support of the propriety of the rule stated that the action rested on the same principle that governed the action of a master for the beating of his servant; and cited a passage from the opinion of the court in the case of Robert Mary, in which it was said, "If my servant be beaten, the master shall not have an action for this beating, unless the battery is so great that by reason thereof he loses the service of his servant; but the servant himself for every small battery shall have an action; and the reason of the difference is, that the master has not any damage by the personal beating 734 of *his servant but by reason of a per quod; viz: per quod servitium amisit; so that the original act is not the cause of his action, but consequent upon it, viz: the loss of the service is the cause of his action." And in concluding his opinion in support of the motion, he observes that if the liability of the father under the statute of Elizabeth to support his child when unable to support herself, would form a ground of action per se independently of loss of service, the anomaly would follow, that as the father is only liable under the statute when he is of sufficient ability to do so, and as the damages recoverable by the father where he brings the action are confessedly not limited to the actual expenditure of his money, but may be given according to the circumstances of aggravation in the particular case, the right of action to recover compensation would be confined to persons of ability to maintain the daughter, and would be denied to the poorer classes of the community.

In the case of Revill v. Satterfit, the second case referred to by the revisors, the daughter of the plaintiff had been at service in the family of the defendant's uncle. Some suspicion having attached to her intercourse with the defendant, she had been removed to another situation, from which she returned to her father's house. Here she had been in the habit of receiving the defendant and of sitting up with him at late hours of the night after the family had retired to rest. Another daughter of the plaintiff proved the acknowledgment of the defendant that he had seduced her sister, and that he was the father of a child which she had borne. The girl who had been seduced was not introduced as a witness. The counsel for the defendant contended that the case of the plaintiff left so bare of evidence, should be dealt with upon the strict legal principles on which the action was founded; and that the damages 735 should not exceed *the value of the services actually lost. He admitted that in most cases of this sort the condition of service was regarded as a mere conveyance to the action. It was the form through which the injury was presented to the court; and having obtained its admission upon legal principles, it brought along with it as parts of itself, all the circumstances of the case. But when the object of seduction was not herself produced, the strongest suspicion attached to the quality of the injury. He contended therefore that the jury ought not to estimate the damages upon the ordinary principles which obtained in cases of the kind. Mr. Baron Wood said that the plaintiff had his right of action for loss of the services of his daughter; a loss which he alleged he had sustained by the seduction of the defendant. It was not necessary to produce the daughter, though the withholding of her was open to observation. In strictness, the action being founded on the loss of service, the damages ought to have reference to the extent of the service. But that an injury of the kind was always complicated with circumstances; and it was difficult to separate one part from the other; and held that it was not necessary to produce the girl as a witness.

In the case of Hewitt v. Prime, the suit was brought by the plaintiff for the seduction of his daughter of the age of seventeen, whilst she was a member of his family. And the suit was brought after the daughter was discovered to be pregnant, but before the birth of the child. Such being the state of facts proved on the trial, the counsel for the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury that to sustain the action it was necessary that the plaintiff should have proved loss, expense or damage before suit brought, in consequence of the seduction. But the judge charged the jury that the daughter being in her minority, a member of the family of her father, 736 no loss, expense or *damage prior to the suit need be shown. And there being a verdict for the plaintiff, the question was, Whether there should not be a new trial on account of the charge given by the judge at the trial? It will be seen that in this last case cited by the revisors, there was no question raised as to the relation of master and servant. The daughter was a minor living with her father, a member of his family; and the motion to give such instructions as were asked, implied the concession that nothing was wanting to make out the case but proof of some actual loss of the services of the daughter, resulting from the wrongful act.

Upon this view of the character of the cases to which the revisors refer, and the grounds on which they were decided, it does not seem to me that there can be any serious doubt as to the design which they contemplated in recommending that the rule established in Hewitt v. Prime should by a provision of the Code be adopted as the rule in Virginia. The rule in Hewitt v. Prime goes to the extent of dispensing with proof of actual loss of the services of the daughter, but no further. And I do not think that the recommendation of the revisors shows a purpose to accomplish any thing more by the enactment of the statute which they reported to the legislature for its adoption. See 2 Rob. Pr. 562, (new ed.). Showing plainly that such is the view of Mr. Conway Robinson, one of the revisors, taken in the recent edition of his practice. It must be conceded, however, that the term employed in the act, loss of service, is sometimes used in a sense which would embrace as well the actual loss of service or inability of the female to render service, as the right of the plaintiff to such service; and if it is apparent from the language of the act, that the term is used in that sense, it would be our duty, I apprehend, so to construe it, though in doing so we 737 should be led *to results beyond those which we might infer were in the contemplation of the legislature, from the fact of their having passed the law as it came from the revisors.

The loss of service is the gist of the action, and it may be said, not incorrectly, and in the reports is, frequently, said that a plaintiff has failed to maintain his action, because he has failed to show that he has sustained any loss of service, in cases where the sickness and confinement of the female and birth of her child consequent upon the seduction, show her inability to render service; and the only defect is that the plaintiff has failed to show the relation of master and servant, or his right to the services. Yet, in pleading and in practice there are three constituents of the action, the presence of all of which is essential to its maintenance, viz: the relation of master on the part of the plaintiff to the female, her seduction, and the actual loss of her services as a consequence. This actual loss of service, though frequently spoken of in the text books and in the opinions of judges as a mere fiction or form, had rarely if ever been dispensed with either in England or in this country prior to the decision in Hewitt v. Prime. From the case of

Grinnell v. Wells, decided in 1844, we have seen that it is still, or was, at the time of the enactment of the Code, indispensable to the maintenance of the action in England. And in the cases of Martin v. Payne, 9 John. R. 387, Clark v. Fitch, 2 Wend. R. 459, Hornketh v. Barr, 8 Serg. & Rawle 38, which, in opposition to the decision in Dean v. Peel, 5 East's R. 45, have established in this country the rule, that whilst the daughter is under twenty-one, she will, for the purposes of the action, be regarded as the servant of the father, though not living with him, but away from him, in the family and service of another, except where the father has renounced and abandoned her totally, and devested 738 *himself of all right to reclaim her services. In each of these cases the disability of the daughter to perform services, resulting from the act of seduction, was shown; and the legal right of the father to have damages for loss of service, was placed on the ground that the daughter was his servant de jure though not de facto at the time of the injury; and being his servant de jure, the defendant had done an act which deprived the father of his daughter's services—services which he might have exacted and she might have rendered but for that injury.

It is also worthy to be observed, that in the case of Hewitt v. Prime, Nelson, C. J., in taking the ground that proof of the actual loss of the daughter's services was not essential, after assigning the reasons stated in the portion of his opinion quoted by the revisors, thought it well to fortify his position by the further argument that the value of her services would be necessarily diminished by the defilement of her person and corruption of her mind.

From this view of the state of the law on the subject when the legislature came to pass the act, it will be seen that an important change in the law would still be affected, and the terms of the act satisfied, by giving to the words in question the restricted meaning contended for by the plaintiff in error.

That this is the true construction, is made still more apparent when we observe the obvious difficulty if not impossibility of giving any effect to that construction which would dispense as well with the necessity of proof of right to the services of the female as of proof of the actual loss of such services. The statute does not in terms confer the right to bring the action on the father or any one else; and as at the common law neither he nor any other person can maintain the action without showing his right to the services of the female who has been wronged, if the 739 statute is to be *construed as dispensing with the proof of such right, we should have the anomaly of an action maintainable without any ascertainment of the person or persons to bring it. And if by a strained inference we might otherwise intend that inasmuch as the action is one more generally used to enable a father to recover exemplary damages for the seduction of his daughter than for any other purpose, the legislature designed by the passage of the act to enable him to recover in cases in which at the common law he would be defeated by want of proof to establish the relation of master, or the right to the services of the daughter, we should still have to encounter objections of a character so serious as to forbid such a construction. For, as was argued by the counsel of the plaintiff in error, the statute does not take away the right of any one to maintain the action who before had it at the common law. And if the statute be construed to give to the father, as such, the right to sue in every case of the seduction of his daughter, the necessary consequence would follow that the defendant might be exposed to two or more recoveries of exemplary damages for the same act. As under such a construction neither loss of service nor right to the services is necessary to the maintenance of the action, no reason is perceived why the father might not maintain the action for the seduction of a married daughter, whose husband had already recovered damages for the injury done to him. Indeed it is now held that exemplary damages may always be allowed in this kind of action, in the discretion of the jury. Ingersoll v. Jones, 5 Barb. Sup. Ct. R. 665. If, therefore, in a case of the seduction of a daughter who has attained her majority, and who has passed from the control and protection of the father, and is at service with another person, we allow the father to maintain his suit, a defendant may be subjected to the double recov-
740 ery of exemplary damages, *in direct violation of the spirit of the rule by which the right of the master to recover such damages is maintained. For in the case just cited the distinction is taken between the case of an action by the master for the beating of his servant and that of an action or the seduction of his servant, in respect to the damages; and it is said that in the case of the assault and battery the servant has an action himself, and may recover exemplary damages; and that to allow such damages to the master would therefore subject the defendant to their payment twice; whilst for the seduction, the servant has no action.

And really I do not perceive any satisfactory answer to the argument of counsel, that if after the daughter has been fully emancipated from all parental control; after the father has parted with all legal interest in her services—all legal right to the comforts of her society and attentions—he may still maintain such a suit—the mother would also be entitled to a like action. And so in respect to the brothers and sisters. In such a state of things the father's right to the action could only rest on the injury done to his feelings: And no reason is seen why the right of the other members of the family to have their action would not be just as clear. There is no reason for supposing that the mother would be less deeply affected than the father by the loss of a daughter's virtue and the destruction of the peace and happiness of the domestic circle consequent upon it. A brother might feel just as acutely the wound inflicted on the honor of the family; whilst an unmarried sister just entering upon society, sharing as fully, in all other respects, in the common grief, might have her sufferings enhanced by the dread of uncharitable doubts and suspicions in respect to her own purity and innocence.

This view of the consequences which seem to me to result from that con-741 struction on which the judgment *of the Circuit court is supposed to be found, coupled with the considerations already adverted to, have led me to the conclusion that the construction contended for by the plaintiff in error is the true one.

Under the latter construction, cases of an apparently aggravated character may in some instances go unredressed: And from the amount of damages given by the jury, we infer that in their belief and in the opinion of the Circuit court, who has rendered a judgment in conformity with the verdict, this is a case of that kind. We may regret that we can find no legal ground on which to sustain the action of the court and jury; but I do not think that we are at liberty to break through the forms of the law to reach what we may regard a case of hardship. So long as a daughter is a minor, subject to the father's control; indeed after she has attained her majority, so long as she lives with him and he has any legal right to command her services, her society and attentions, he has, under the construction I would give to the act, a right to bring his action for her seduction, and to found his claim for damages on the wrongful act, without any proof showing that there has been a failure or inability in the daughter to render him services in consequence of such act. But further than this I do not think the law has yet gone.

When the daughter has arrived to years of discretion, has left the paternal roof, has emancipated herself from all legal control on the part of the father, and become in all regards the mistress of her own conduct and actions, I think the law gives the father no action for her seduction. And as some apology for this supposed defect in the law, it is perhaps worthy of consideration, whether a reason for the failure of the lawgivers to allow an action in such case may not be found in the belief on their part that if in such a state of things the well established virtuous habits and character 742 *of the daughter, her own well matured sentiments of female purity and honor, and the discrete conduct and modest deportment which are their outward evidences, do not protect her against the arts of the seducer, no great additional safeguard to female virtue, no important additional security for the preservation of the public morals, would be afforded by a law conferring on the father or any one else a right to maintain a suit for her seduction.

Upon the whole, I think that the Circuit court ought to have rendered a judgment sustaining the demurrer to the first count in the declaration, and ought to have given the instructions asked; and that because of the error in these particulars the judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, the demurrer to the first count in the declaration sustained, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

743 *Watkins v. Hopkins' Ex'or.

January Term, 1857, Richmond.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

1. Action on Bond—Plea of Equitable Set-Off—Affidavits.—A plea of equitable offset under the statute, must show that the offset is such as may be set up under the statute, and must be verified by affidavit.

2. Same—Same—Failure of Consideration—Case at Bar.—In an action on a bond for five hundred dollars, given for the last payment of the purchase money of land, a plea that the plaintiff was to make defendant a good title to the land upon the payment of the bond, and that defendant had offered to pay it upon the making of the title, and that the plaintiff had failed and refused to make the title; by reason whereof the consideration had failed to the extent of two hundred and fifty dollars; is not a good plea in substance.

3. Same—Same—Same—Same.—In such an action a plea that the plaintiff had failed to give the defendant possession of two acres of the land; or a plea that plaintiff had failed to deliver possession of the land for two months after the time at which by the contract he was to deliver possession; or that he had not delivered the tenement in the plight and condition in which it was at the time of the sale, and in which by the contract he

*Action on Bond—Plea of Equitable Set-Off.—The rule laid down in the principal case, that in an action on a bond the defendant may, under the Act of 1831 (now § 3299, Code of 1887) plead, in an action at law, failure of consideration, etc., is followed and approved in the following cases, citing the principal case: Watkins v. West Wytheville Land, etc., Co., 92 Va. 9, 22 S. E. Rep. 554; Fisher v. Burdett, 21 W. Va. 630-1, following a similar statute, § 5, ch. 126, W. Va. Code.

Citing and distinguishing the principal case, the following cases hold that the plea is not good where there is a total absence of consideration and a rescission of the contract is asked: Williamson v. Cline, 40 W. Va. 206, 20 S. E. Rep. 921, where it is said: "As just stated, failure of consideration may be shown under that statute as defense to a sealed instrument. Fisher v. Burdett, 21 W. Va. 626. We must, under that section 5, draw the line of distinction between want of consideration and failure of consideration, as they are different. The words, 'failure in the consideration,' used in that section, refer to contracts where originally there was consideration subsequently failing, not to contracts wholly wanting consideration at their execution.

was to deliver it, but delivered it in a damaged condition from injuries done or permitted in the mean time to the tenement and freehold; is a good plea, setting up a partial failure of the consideration.

This was an action of debt upon a bond for five hundred dollars in the Circuit court of Louisa county, brought in June 1854 by James P. Hopkins' executor against Robert B. Watkins. The defendant appeared and tendered five special pleas, which were objected to by the plaintiff, and rejected by the court; and the defendant excepted. The substance of the pleas are stated in the opinion of Judge Lee. There was then a judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the bond and interest. And thereupon Watkins applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

744 *Holladay, for the appellant.

There was no counsel for the appellee.

LEE, J. The pleas tendered by the plaintiff in error appear to be five in number and they were all rejected by the court; and the question here is were they all properly so rejected.

The fifth plea consists of a specification of items and the several amounts thereof, which the party claimed, with a general averment that the defendant in error was indebted to him in the same by way of offset. The items claimed are however all of an equitable character going to the consideration of the bond sued on, and could not constitute the subject of an offset under the general law of offsets, and the plea fails sufficiently to aver the elements which would constitute a good equitable offset under our statute, nor is it verified by affidavit as the statute requires. It was therefore properly objected to by the court.

The fourth plea avers (by reference to the first) that the bond sued on, was given for the third and last installment of the purchase money of two tracts of land sold by the defendant in error to the plaintiff, a complete title to which was to be made upon the payment of that installment. It then avers that the plaintiff in error had performed all parts of the contract on his part and had offered to pay the amount of the bond on the defendant's conveying the property by a sufficient legal title, which he had failed to do; by reason whereof the consideration of the bond had failed to the extent of two hundred and fifty dollars, for which failure he claimed compensation to that amount.

It is somewhat difficult to determine the exact gist of the plea or the precise scope which the pleader intended to give it. It is not a plea in bar of the action because of the failure of the defendant in error to comply with a precedent or concurrent
745 condition on *the performance of which or the offer to perform it, only, he would be entitled to his action. Nor is it the plea of a vendee of lands who waives his right to the specific execution of the contract at the hands of a court of equity and goes for complete reimbursement in the form of damages for the vendor's breach of the contract. For whilst it alleges the purchase of lands at a price of which the bond for five hundred dollars sued on was but the third and last installment, it claims only the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars as compensation for the breach of the contract. It must be regarded therefore that the party is claiming both the right to have the contract executed specifically by a conveyance of the title and also by this plea, compensation for the breach of the contract in the failure to make it. This I apprehend he cannot do. He cannot hold to both rights of action to wit, the one in equity for the conveyance of the title, and the other at law for damages for the breach of the contract in the failure to make it. It has been held upon the construction of this statute that in an action on a bond for the purchase money of land a plea of failure of consideration upon equitable grounds requiring a rescission of the contract and a reinvestment of the obligee with the interest sold to the obligor, is inadmissible. Shiflett, &c., v. The Orange Humane Society, 7 Gratt. 297. And, e converso, I think it equally clear that in such an action a plea of failure of consideration by the party's refusal or neglect to make a title according to his contract and showing that the vendee was entitled to a specific performance of the contract without a plain election to waive such relief and to go for entire damages for breach of the contract, would not be authorized by the statute. The party must make his election; and if he will claim the right to specific execution, he cannot also come with his action or plea under this statute for damages 746 *generally, for breach of the contract to make the title. Whether in a case in which special damage has been sustained by reason of the vendor's failure to make the title in due time according to his contract, the vendee may claim compensation in this form, it is not necessary to decide in this case, as nothing of that kind is alleged in this plea, the claim being for compensation, generally, for the vendor's breach of contract in failing to make the title. I think this plea was not authorized by the statute and was properly rejected.

The first, second and third pleas allege the contract for the sale of the two tracts of land and that the bond sued on was given for the third and last installment of the purchase money, and they aver a partial failure of consideration in the following particulars: the first, that the vendor had never delivered possession of a portion of one of the tenements sold; the second, that he did not deliver possession of either of the tenements sold for two months after the time at which by the contract he was to deliver possession, and the third, that he did not deliver them in the plight and condition in which they were at the time of the sale and in which by the contract he was bound to deliver them, but delivered them in a damaged condition from injuries done or permitted in the mean time to the tenements and freehold. Now possession of the whole subject sold and at the time and in the condition stipulated for in the contract, may fairly and legitimately be considered part and parcel of the consideration moving from the vendee, and if the vendor fail to make good his undertaking in these respects, there can be no reason why the vendee should not be entitled to compensation for the loss thereby occasioned. He does not get all which he stipulated for and for which he promised to pay the agreed price. The diminution in the value 747 of the subject by reason *of the vendor's short comings should therefore in some form be made good to the vendee, and I can perceive no good reason why compensation should not be made in this form by an equitable plea of offset under our statute. Indeed it seems a very appropriate mode by which the diminution in the value of the thing purchased may be compensated by a correspondent diminution of the price to be paid. There is nothing in the terms of the statute to restrict the plea of equitable setoff to contracts in relation to personalty. The terms of the act are general, "in any action on a contract," and it includes contracts by deed as well as by parol, and there can be no reason for excluding all contracts relating to the sale and purchase of real property from the operation. In a case indeed as we have seen where the equitable grounds relied on would require a rescission of the contract and a reinvestment of the vendor with the interest alleged to have been sold, a plea of failure of consideration under this statute could not be relied on. And upon the terms of the statute which authorize the plea in case of a breach of warranty of the title or soundness of personal property, it may be argued that such a plea is inferentially excluded in case of a breach of warranty of the title to real estate.

In Pence, &c., v. Huston's ex'ors, 6 Gratt. 304, this question was raised, but was not decided because the court thought that the matter of the plea showed that the defendant would have been entitled to relief either at law or in equity and constituted a substantial defense to the action. And as the plaintiff instead of objecting to the filing of the plea or demurring, had taken issue upon it and there had been a verdict for the defendant the question whether the defense was authorized by the statute did not arise, the defect, if any, being cured by the act of jeofails. But in this case, the claim is for compensation for a partial fail-
748 ure *of consideration only, and the matters shown in the pleas make no case for a rescission of the contract: in fact they proceed on the assumption that the contract has been in part executed, and in part is yet to be executed, and for a part as to which it has not been and cannot now be specifically executed, compensation is to be made. That the vendee claims to have specific execution by a conveyance of title constitutes no objection. This is in perfect consistence with the claim for compensation for the failure in those particulars as to which specific performance cannot be had. The vendor is bound to make good his contract in all its parts, and if in any he cannot now perform it specifically, he must make compensation. It will not do for him to say that if he makes the title and the vendee accepts his conveyance the latter thereby waives his claim to compensation for the failure to deliver possession at the time and in the condition stipulated for. In practice it has not been unusual where a vendee comes with a bill for specific execution for the court of chancery to decree the title and also to go on and give an account of rents and profits and for waste done to the inheritance during the time for which the possession was improperly withheld as well as compensation for deficiency in quantity upon the principles of that court, upon the ground that having possession of the subject it will give complete relief and save the necessity of further litigation. And if the correctness of this practice may be successfully questioned (as to which I express no opinion) certainly the vendee may maintain his action at law against the vendor for damages for his breach of the contract; and in either view, where he is sued upon the contract on his part, he may assert his claim against the vendor by plea in the nature of a setoff under the statute. The object of the statute is to save litigation by enabling the parties to settle all the matters in con-
749 troversy *in one suit, and to effectuate this purpose, it should where necessary receive a liberal construction.

No objection can be raised in this case upon the idea that the statute does not authorize the plea in the case of a breach of warranty of the title to real property, as the claim is founded on an executory contract of sale stipulating for the possession of the premises at a certain time and in a certain condition as well as for the conveyance of the legal title, and the alleged breach relates to the possession only and not in any manner to the title.

I think therefore the three first pleas set out in the bill of exceptions although in some respects defective in point of form are yet good in substance and should have been received by the court; and am of opinion to reverse the judgment and remand the cause with directions to permit them to be filed.

750 *Cocke v. The Commonwealth.

October Term, 1855, Richmond.

1. Indictments*—Forgery—Case at Bar.—An indictment charges the forgery of an endorsement on a negotiable note, which is described as to the amount, date, to whom payable and when due; but the indictment does not state who is the maker of the note or where it is payable. It is a good indictment.

2. Same—Same—Evidence to Prove Note—Case at Bar.—Upon a trial for the forgery of an endorsement on a note, the commonwealth having proved that the note went into the prisoner's possession, and notice to the prisoner to produce it, may prove the note and the forgery in its absence; and the note having been deposited in bank for collection, the original entries in the book of the note clerk of the bank, proved by the clerk to have been made by him from the note, are competent evidence to prove that the note and endorsement thereon was as described in the indictment.

3. Same—Same—Verdict—Uncertainty of.—The indictment charges in one count the forgery of a note, and in another count the forgery of an endorsement upon the note. The jury find the prisoner not guilty on the first count; and then say, "On the second count, viz: that of uttering a negotiable note knowing it to be forged, we find the prisoner guilty, and affix the term of his imprisonment for the term of two years." The verdict upon the second count is too uncertain to authorize any judgment upon it, and a venire facias de novo on that court should be awarded.

At the April term 1854 of the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, Edwin Cocke was indicted for forgery. The first count was for the forgery of an endorsement of the name of J. V. Crawford upon a paper purporting to be a negotiable note for the sum of ninety-five dollars and six cents, bearing date the 16th day of April 1852, payable to Crawford, or order, four months after date. The second count was for uttering as true the forged endorsement upon a note described as in the first count.

751 *When the prisoner was arraigned he moved the court to quash the indictment against him, and each count thereof; but the court overruled the motion; and the prisoner then pleaded "not guilty."

On the trial which commenced on the 30th of April 1854, the commonwealth called a witness, Robert Hill, and asked him if he knew any thing of the forgery charged against the prisoner of a certain note for ninety-five dollars and six cents, dated April 16th, 1852, payable to J. V. Crawford, or order, four months after the date of said note. Whereupon the prisoner by his counsel called for the production of the note, and objected to any evidence of its contents being given. But the attorney for the commonwealth produced a notice to the prisoner, dated the 12th of April, requiring him to produce before the court a note described as in the indictment, and for an endorsement of the name of Crawford, on which note he had been indicted for forgery; and stating that if the note was not produced he would offer secondary evidence of its contents: And the attorney stated that he proposed to prove by the witness that the note had gone into the possession of the prisoner. To this notice the prisoner objected as insufficient, it having been served on Saturday at 5 P. M. when the court commenced its session on the next Tuesday; and also as informal as not describing the paper described in the indictment. But the court overruled the objection to the notice, and admitted the secondary evidence of the contents of the note: And the prisoner excepted.

Hill deposed that the prisoner gave to him a note similar to the one described in the indictment, the date of which he could not recollect, for the sum of ninety-five dollars and six cents, purporting to be drawn by Edwin Cocke, and endorsed 752 by J. V. Crawford; *but that he could not say whether or not it was payable to order. That he sold it as a negotiable note, but could not say at what bank it was payable. That he sold the note to H. J. Christian, and paid the proceeds to the prisoner. That afterwards there was a rumor that the note was forged, and he had a conversation with the prisoner, in which the prisoner said it was genuine, and requested him to take the note back from Christian, and that he would convince Crawford it was genuine. That he paid Christian for the note, who gave witness his order on the bank for it; that under this order it was withdrawn from the bank; and he afterwards purchased a piece of property from the prisoner and gave the note as money. The note was in the Farmers Bank.

The commonwealth then introduced Charles B. Williams as a witness; who deposed that he was the note clerk in the Farmers Bank. That he recollected generally that he saw a note purporting to be drawn by Edwin Cocke, and endorsed by J. V. Crawford, but what was the amount of the note, or its date, or where it was payable, he could not say. That from his general knowledge of Crawford's signature, derived from seeing his checks and notes,

*See monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments."

Digitized by Google

he suspected that the note which he saw was a forgery. And that he was unable from his own knowledge to give any other testimony in respect to said note; but that he had in court the book kept by him which contained a description of the note, which description was taken by him from the said note about the time it was deposited, and registered in said book as the original record of the particulars and identity of said note: and that the particulars of description set out in this book were sustained by another book, which was also an original record kept by the witness, and that the entries therein relating to said note 753 were taken from *the note itself, and made by him. But the entries in these books do not state in which of the banks at Richmond the note was payable.

The commonwealth then offered in evidence the books spoken of by the witness in connection with his evidence, so far as they related to said note. To the admission of these books the prisoner by his counsel objected; but the court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence: Whereupon the prisoner again excepted.

The jury having retired after the argument of the cause was concluded, came into court and rendered a verdict as follows:

We the jury in this case beg leave to state that on the first count of the indictment it is our opinion forgery is not clearly proven and we therefore find the prisoner not guilty on this charge.

On the second, viz: that of uttering a negotiable note, knowing it to be forged, we find the prisoner guilty, and affix his sentence to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of two years, the shortest allowed under the law.

But in consideration of the mitigating circumstances of the case, we each individually do earnestly recommend the said Edwin Cocke to the clemency of his excellency Governor Johnson.

After the reading of the verdict, the clerk of the court asked if he should put the verdict in proper form; and the counsel for the prisoner thereupon objected to any alteration of it, and insisted that it should be entered literally as the jury had rendered it. But the court permitted the clerk to put the verdict in the following form:

"We the jury find the prisoner not guilty upon the first count of this indictment; but we find him guilty upon the second count of the same, and ascertain the 754 *term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary at two years."

And directed the clerk to read it to the jury, to ascertain whether they would assent to it. To which opinion and action of the court the prisoner excepted.

The amended verdict only appears in the bill of exceptions; and it does not appear whether or not the jury assented to it. From the fact that their own verdict stands on the record as their verdict, it is to be presumed they did not assent to that prepared by the clerk.

The prisoner moved the court in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, but his motions were overruled; and sentence passed upon him in accordance with the verdict. From this judgment the prisoner obtained a writ of error from this court.

Crump and August, for the prisoner, insisted:

1st. That the indictment should have been quashed, because it does not state who made the note. That though under the English statute no fac simile of the paper is necessary, and it is sufficient to describe it as in larceny; still the indictment must so describe the paper that the judgment upon it shall be a protection to the prisoner against another prosecution for the same forgery. That whatever might be the case in England, certainly in Virginia the offense must be so accurately and fully stated, as that it will show for what he is prosecuted; and thus be evidence of what is the charge for which the prisoner has been tried.

2d. That the notice to the prisoner to produce the note, was not sufficient, and was not sufficiently explicit. Moreover that according to the bill of rights of Virginia the prisoner could not be required to produce a paper; and not having this right, the secondary evidence of the note was inadmissible.

3d. That the books of the bank were 755 not by themselves *admissible in evidence. Courtney's Case, 6 Rand. 666. And though it is said they may be given in evidence in connection with the evidence of the teller; that is where the teller is able to testify as to the facts. But where the witness knows nothing, as was the case with the witness in this case, the mere introduction of him as a witness cannot render the books admissible evidence.

4th. That the verdict was too uncertain to authorize a judgment upon it; or it should have been a judgment of acquittal. They referred to Starkie Crim. Pl. p. 383 to 395; Anonymous, 3 Salk. R. 373; 6 Comy. Dig. title Pleader, Verdict, § 20; 8 Bac. Abr. Verdict, C, p. 98; The King v. Woodfall, 5 Burr. R. 2661; Sharff v. The Commonwealth, 2 Binn. R. 514; Commonwealth v. Call, 21 Pick. The Attorney General, for the commonwealth, insisted:

1st. That the statute now dispensed with the necessity of setting out the paper forged; and allows a description which would be good in larceny. And in larceny as the paper is not in possession of the commonwealth it cannot be described minutely. He referred to 2 Russ. on Crimes 108, 109, 110, 372 to 385; Kearne's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 109; Pomeroy's Case, 2 Id. 342.

2d. That the notice was unnecessary; but when it was proved that the paper was in possession of the prisoner the proof of the paper was admissible. Indeed it was admissible without that proof; though if the paper was in possession of the 756 commonwealth, it *would be suspicious if it was not produced. Kirk's Case, 9 Leigh 627; Moore's Case, 2 Leigh 701.

3d. As to the books of the bank as evidence, he referred to 1 Starkie's Evi. 128, 129.

4th. That the verdict on the second count was guilty. That the videlicet referring to the count is repugnant not only to the count but to the verdict. The jury find expressly that on the second count the prisoner is guilty; and they have only added a matter under a videlicet, which is surplusage, and may therefore be disregarded. He referred to 1 Wms. Saund. 169; 2 Id. 290, note 1; Pomeroy's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 342; Boatright v. Meggs, 4 Munf. 145; Roane v. Drummond, 6 Rand. 182.

ALLEN, P., delivered the judgment of the court:

It seems to the court here, that the verdict of the jury upon the second count in the indictment is too uncertain to authorize any judgment upon the said verdict and finding on the second count of the said indictment, and that the judgment of the Circuit court on the verdict on said second count is erroneous. It further seems to the court, that there is no other error in said judgment. It is therefore considered that so much of said judgment as acquits and discharges the plaintiff in error from the felony charged in the first count of said indictment be affirmed, and that the residue of the said judgment be reversed and annulled; and it is ordered that so much of said verdict as relates to the said second count be set aside, and that this cause be remanded to the said Circuit court with directions to award a venire facias de novo upon the said second count of said indictment, and for further proceedings, &c.

757 *Hunt v. The Commonwealth.

[70 Am. Dec. 443.]

October Term, 1855, Richmond.

1. Criminal Law—Larceny—Possession of Lost Property—Presumption.—Upon a trial for the larceny of a bank note, the property of G, of the value of twenty dollars, it is error to instruct the jury, that if they believe from the evidence that G lost a bank note of the value of twenty dollars, and that the same was afterwards found in the possession of the prisoner, they ought to find him guilty, unless his possession of the note was explained by testimony.

2. Same—Same—Same—Same.—The mere possession of goods which had been actually lost does not furnish any conclusive or even prima facie proof of guilt: of itself it does not raise the suspicion of guilt.

3. Same—What Constitutes Larceny of Lost Goods.†—To constitute larceny in the finder of goods actually lost, it is not enough that the party has general means by the use of proper diligence, of discovering the true owner. He must know the owner at the time of the finding, or the goods must have some mark about them understood by him or presumably known by him, by which the owner can be ascertained: And he must appropriate them at the time of finding with intent to take entire dominion over them.

This was an indictment against Calvin Hunt in the Circuit court of Mercer county, for the larceny of a bank note. The case is stated by Judge Allen in his opinion.

The case was submitted by the Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

There was no counsel for the prisoner.

ALLEN, P. The prisoner was indicted for stealing a bank note for the payment of twenty dollars, the property of Green Gore. The first count charges the stealing of a bank note for the payment of twenty dollars, without further description. The second count charges the stealing of a 758 bank note on the *Bank of the Valley of Virginia, issued at Winchester in Virginia, dated the — day of July 1853, for the payment of twenty dollars. On the trial the prisoner excepted to three instructions to the jury, given at the instance of the commonwealth's attorney. By the first the court instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence, that Gore lost a bank note of the value of twenty dollars, and that the same was afterwards found in the possession of the prisoner, that then they ought to find him guilty, unless his possession of the stolen note is explained by testimony.

There is no statement of the facts which

*Criminal Law—Larceny—Possession of Lost Property—Presumption.—The mere possession of goods which had been actually lost does not furnish a conclusive or even prima facie proof of guilt: of itself it does not raise the suspicion of guilt. For the above proposition the principal case is cited and followed in Perrin v. Com., 87 Va. 557, 13 S. E. Rep. 76. In Walker v. Com., 28 Gratt. 976, and note, the above ruling is approved.

†Same—What Constitutes Larceny of Lost Goods.—To constitute larceny of lost property, the person finding it must know or have the means of knowing the owner, or have reason to believe that the owner may be discovered, and he must intend at the time of the finding of the property to appropriate it to his own use. For the above proposition the principal case is cited and followed in Tanner v. Com., 14 Gratt. 635; Perrin v. Com., 87 Va. 557, 13 S. E. Rep. 76. See monographic note on "Larceny" appended to Johnson v. Com., 24 Gratt. 555.

As to the time when the intent to appropriate goods found or received by mistake must exist, in order to constitute larceny thereof, see a discussion in 2 Va. Law Reg. 702.

Upon the question as to the presumption where stolen property is found in the possession of the accused, see Wash v. Com., 16 Gratt. 530, and note; Price v. Com., 21 Gratt. 846, and note. See also, note to the principal case in 70 Am. Dec. 443.

the evidence offered proved or tended to prove. But as the instructions were given, it must be taken that they were pertinent to the facts proved or which the evidence tended to prove. And if they do not propound the law correctly, the prisoner may avail himself of the error if prejudicial to him.

To constitute larceny of the kind set out in the indictment, there must be a taking animo furandi, and against the will of the owner. At one time it was supposed that if the finder of goods converts them to his own use with a full knowledge of the owner, it is not larceny, there being no trespass committed in obtaining possession. Lord Coke, 3 Inst. 108, says, if one lose his goods and another finds them, though he convert them animo furandi to his own use, yet it is no larceny, for the first taking is lawful. So he says, if one find treasuretrove or waif, or stray and convert them ut supra, it is no larceny, both in respect of the finding, and also for that dominus rerum non apparet, ideo cujus sunt incertum est. To the same effect is 1 Hale P. C. 506.

The precise effect of these propositions of Coke and Hale was considered in the case of Regina v. Thurborn, 5 British Crown Cas. 387; and it was there determined 759 *that if lost goods are taken originally animo furandi, that is with the intent not to take a partial or temporary possession, but to usurp the entire dominion over them, but under such circumstances as to warrant the jury in finding that at the time of the appropriation the prisoner really believed the owner could neither find the chattel or be found himself, such appropriation is not larceny. But that lost goods which the taker justly believes to have been lost, may be taken and converted so as to constitute the crime of larceny, when the party finding may be presumed to know the owner of them, or there is any mark upon them, presumably known by him, by which the owner can be ascertained. This case was reviewed and approved in the subsequent case of Regina v. Preston, 3 British Crown Cas. 357. In the last case it was held that where a bank note is lost, and is found by a person who appropriates it to his own use, the jury are not to be directed to consider at what time the prisoner after taking it into his possession, resolved to appropriate it to his own use, but whether at the time he took possession of it, he knew or had the means of knowing who the owner was, and took possession of it with intent to steal it. If the original possession of it was an innocent one, no subsequent change of his mind, or resolution to appropriate it to his own use would amount to a larceny.

From these decisions it appears, says the annotator, 2 Waterman's Archbold 388, that a taking by finding in larceny may be classed under three heads: "1st. Where upon the finding there is no intention to appropriate the thing found to his own use, but on the contrary the finder intends to restore it to the owner if he be found, but afterwards he disposes of it to his own use either before or even after he knows who the owner is, this is not larceny, because there was no animus furandi at the 760 time of the taking. 2d. Where *the party finds goods that have been actually lost, or reasonably supposed by him to have been lost, and appropriates them with intent to take entire dominion over them, really believing then that the owner cannot be found, and he afterwards dispose of them to his own use, either before or even after he knows who the owner is, it is not larceny, because the taking, though not exactly innocent, was not punishable, and could not be made the subject of an action of trespass. 3d. Where goods lost or supposed to be lost as aforesaid, are found and appropriated with the like intent, the party at the same time knowing or reasonably believing that the owner can be found, this is larceny, whether the finder afterwards convert them to his own use or not." Under these rules it is not enough that the party has general means by the use of proper diligence of discovering the owner. He must know the owner at the time of the finding, or the goods must have some mark about them understood by him or presumably known by him, by which the owner can be ascertained.

Whether goods were actually lost, whether appropriated by the finder lucri causa, with intent to take entire dominion over them at the time, whether at the time he so acquires possession he knew the owner, or by some mark about them presumably known by him, the owner could be ascertained, are questions entirely for the jury.

In the application of these rules the judge, in the case first referred to, remarks that "questions of some nicety may arise, but it will generally be ascertained whether the person accused had reasonable belief that the owner could be found, by evidence of his previous acquaintance with the ownership of the chattel, the place where it is found or the nature of the marks on it."

From this it appears that the mere 761 possession of *goods which had been actually lost does not furnish any conclusive or prima facie proof of guilt: of itself it does not raise the suspicion of guilt.

The most honest man may be found in possession of a chattel proved to have been actually lost, but holding it with the intention of restoring it to the owner; and yet according to the terms of this instruction, the mere possession under such circumstances raises the presumption of guilt, unless he can explain by testimony how his possession was acquired.

A man finding a chattel actually lost, may instantly take possession thereof animo furandi, that is, with the intent to usurp the entire dominion over it, and in pursuance thereof does convert it to his own use. Such conduct in a moral aspect of the transaction may be as dishonest as to steal it, for although he may not know the owner, or there be nothing in the circumstances attending the place where it is found, or the marks thereon, to indicate the true owner, yet he must be conscious that there was an owner, and he should use all proper diligence to trace him out. Yet as the property was in fact lost and the owner unknown, and no marks existing to indicate who he is, such a taking animo furandi and conversion is not larceny, because there was no trespass in the taking, as the possession acquired could not be said to be against the will of the owner under the reason of the rule given by Lord Coke, quia dominus rerum non apparet ideo cujus sunt incertum est.

The instruction under consideration dispenses with all proof of the circumstances under which possession of goods which had been lost was acquired, the fact of ownership known to the finder at the time or indicated by circumstances attending the finding, or by marks on the property, and lays down the law to be that proof of loss by the owner and possession in a third person, whether the finder or not, amounts 762 to *proof of guilt unless the possession is explained. The instruction furthermore holds that those circumstances amount to guilt without reference to the question of intent, and in fact takes from the jury the consideration of the question, with what intent the possession was taken, the intent to steal laying at the foundation of the charge of larceny, and being a question entirely for the jury. The instruction furthermore assumes in the last clause that the note was stolen; thus passing upon the effect of the testimony instead of leaving it to be weighed by the jury. In all these particulars the instruction was erroneous, to the prejudice of the prisoner.

The second instruction whether strictly right or wrong, depending on the facts in evidence, was immaterial. If the prisoner supposed there was a variance between the note alleged to have been stolen and the note described in the second count, he should have moved to have excluded it as evidence under that count, or to have asked for an instruction applicable to that count. But there being one count to which the objection did not apply, and the instruction as asked for and given applying to both counts, the prisoner could not have been prejudiced by it.

I think the court erred in the first instruction, and for that error the judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, P.

Judgment reversed.

763 *Hooker v. The Commonwealth.

October Term, 1855, Richmond.

1. Criminal Law—Arson—Dwelling House—Statute.—A house though it was built for a dwelling-house and had been used as such, and although it was about to be used as such again, yet having been unoccupied for ten months previous, and being unoccupied when it is burned, is not a dwelling-house within the meaning of the statute. Code, ch. 192, § 2, p. 727.*

2. Criminal Proceedings—Motion for New Trial—Presence of Accused.†—A verdict having been found against a prisoner, he moves the court to set it aside as contrary to evidence; which motion is on another day overruled. On the day when the motion is made and also when it is overruled, the record states that the prisoner appeared by attorney; and there is nothing in the record to show that he was present. This is error.

John Hooker was indicted in the Circuit court of Patrick county for burning three houses, one of them an unoccupied dwelling-house, the property of Spencer F. Nowlin, situated in the county of Patrick. The case is stated by Judge Samuels in his opinion.

Standard, for the prisoner, and the Attorney General, for the commonwealth, submitted the case.

SAMUELS, J. The plaintiff was indicted in the Circuit court of Patrick county, for having "feloniously and maliciously set fire to and burned three houses, to wit, an unoccupied dwelling-house, kitchen and smoke-houses and some fodder, being the property of Spencer T. Nowlin."

†Criminal Proceedings—Larceny—Presence of the Accused.—For the proposition, that, in felony cases the accused must be present throughout all the proceedings and that fact must appear from the record, the principal case is cited and followed in the following cases: State v. until about ten months before it was burnt; that the owner had been in the habit of renting it out, and had a short time before it was burnt rented it as a dwelling, and ordered it to be cleaned out for the tenant, who had not taken possession.

The plaintiff on the trial moved the court to instruct the jury, if they believed him guilty, that upon the facts above stated his offense did not come within the second section of chapter 192 of the Code of 1849; which instruction the court refused to give: and thereupon the plaintiff filed his bill of exceptions number one.

The jury having found the plaintiff guilty on the 21st of April 1855, the attorney for the plaintiff on the 24th of April moved the court to set aside the verdict as being contrary to evidence. On the 26th of April the court overruled the motion to set aside the verdict, and rendered judgment thereon. The entries upon the record made on the 24th and 26th days of April respectively, show that the plaintiff appeared by attorney, and there is nothing in the record to show that he was present in court in his proper person on either of those days.

The plaintiff filed his bill of exceptions number two to the opinion of the court overruling his motion to set aside the verdict; and in this exception is set forth all the facts proved at the trial. No question is made, or can be made, upon this part of the record, except that the building alleged to be a dwelling-house, was not such, within the true intent of the statute. The facts bearing on this question are the same as those set out in the first bill, and further, that the buildings burnt were the property of Nowlin; that they were 765 *one mile distant from his residence, and that they were burnt by the plaintiff in the daytime.

I am of opinion the Circuit court erred in deciding that the building described as a dwelling-house, was such within the meaning of the second section of chapter 192 of the Code of Virginia. It was one mile distant from Nowlin's residence, and no one lived or slept therein; nor had it been occupied as a dwelling for about ten months previous to its destruction. If it had been within the curtilage of Nowlin's dwelling-house, but not adjoining thereto, nor under the same roof, it would have been excepted out of the second section by the third section. It must therefore be held that if the section standing alone would embrace the case, (as it would not I conceive,) yet it falls within the exception in the third section. The facts that a building has once been used as a dwelling-house and is intended for the same use in future, do not of themselves make the building a dwelling-house within the meaning of the criminal statutes of Virginia. The safety of the inmates and their property afford a good reason for denouncing heavier penalties against crimes perpetrated against dwelling-houses, and which might endanger both, than against offenses which endanger property only. Thus, arson of a dwelling-house, and of certain other specified buildings, has been regarded as a crime of deeper dye than burning other buildings, and has accordingly been visited with punishment commensurate with the greater enormity. The statute, chapter 192 of the Code, intended to preserve this distinction, by prescribing a greater degree of punishment in case of conviction for burning a dwelling-house than for burning other houses, unless they be of the class enumerated in the first and second sections of the statute. The house alleged in this case to have been a "dwelling-house," does not answer the legal definition of such 766 building, as well settled by *many adjudged cases. See Lyon's Case, 1 Leach 185; Fuller's Case, 1 Leach 186; Haws' Case, 2 Leach 701; Silk's Case, 2 Leach 876. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Circuit court erred in refusing the instruction prayed for: and from this refusal the jury must have been led to suppose that the case came within the second section of the statute, and may have been thereby induced to find a verdict different from that which they would otherwise have found.

The record, made up as it now stands, shows that on the 24th of April when a motion was made to set aside the verdict of the jury, and again on the 26th of April, when the motion was overruled and judgment rendered, the plaintiff appeared by attorney; and there is nothing to show that he was personally present in court on either day. This is probably the result of mere inadvertence in making up the record, yet this court must look only to the record as it is. That this is error is shown by Sperry's Case, 9 Leigh 623. It is the right of any one, when prosecuted on a capital or criminal charge, "to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses;" and it is within the scope of this right that he be present not only when the jury are hearing his case, but at any subsequent stage when any thing may be done in the prosecution by which he is to be affected.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

Judgment reversed.

5. Constitution—Taxes on Licenses.§—Taxes on licenses are not required by the constitution of Virginia to be equal and uniform.

At the October term 1853 of the Corporation court of Fredericksburg, Franklin Slaughter was presented by the grand jury for that he did, on, &c., at, &c., establish and keep an office and transact business as agent of the Protection insurance company of Hartford, incorporated and authorized by the state of Connecticut, without having a license therefor, against the act, &c.

768 *The defendant demurred to the presentment, but the demurrer was afterwards withdrawn, and issue was made up on the plea of "not guilty."

On the trial the jury found the defendant guilty, and assessed his fine at forty dollars; whereupon he applied to the court for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence; but the court overruled the motion, and he excepted. He also moved in arrest of judgment, but the motion was overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict: And the defendant again excepted.

On the trial the facts stated in the presentment were proved, and it was also proved that the members of the Protection insurance company of Hartford were citizens of the state of Connecticut, and that there was no law of Virginia imposing a tax upon or requiring a license to be taken out by any citizen of Virginia, or any corporation created by the state of Virginia, who might establish an insurance office or transact the business in the state of Virginia, or by any agent of either.

Slaughter obtained a writ of error to the judgment from the judge of the Circuit court of Spotsylvania; but when the case was heard there, the judgment of the Corporation court was affirmed. And he then applied to his court for a writ of error, which was allowed.

Wellford and Patton, for the appellant.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

SAMUELS, J. Franklin Slaughter was presented by the grand jury in the Corporation court of Fredericksburg, for having opened and kept (within the jurisdiction of that court) an office, and transacting business as agent, without a license therefor, of the Protection insurance company of Hartford, incorporated and authorized 769 *by the state of Connecticut. Issue was made up on the plea of not guilty, and a trial had, upon which the facts alleged in the presentment were proved, and the further fact that the members of the company are citizens of Connecticut. A verdict was found for the commonwealth assessing the fine at forty dollars. Several motions were made by the plaintiff in error for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment. These motions were severally overruled and judgment rendered on the verdict. The record was carried by writ of error to the Circuit court of Spotsylvania, by which court the judgment of the Corporation court was affirmed. The record is brought here by writ of error to the judgment of the Circuit court.

Whether the presentment should have been adjudged sufficient upon a demurrer, it is not material here to enquire, as the demurrer filed when the plaintiff in error first appeared, was afterwards withdrawn. After verdict a motion in arrest of judgment for defects in the presentment, can be sustained only in case it be so uncertain that judgment "according to the very right of the case," cannot be given thereon. Although there is no distinct averment in the presentment that the Protection insurance company is an insurance company, and we are left to infer the fact that it is such from its name, yet the offense is "charged therein with sufficient certainty for judgment to be given thereon according to the very right of the case." The defect in the presentment, if it be a defect, is cured by the verdict; and the motion in arrest of judgment for this defect could not be sustained. Code of Virginia, ch. 207, § 12, p. 770.

The question made in the Circuit court and in this court in regard to the constitutionality of the statute, Code of Virginia,

†Code, ch. 38, § 25, p. 210. "No agent or subagent of any insurance company or office, incorporated or authorized by another state, shall establish or keep any office, or transact the business of his agency within this state without a license. Any person violating this section, shall pay a fine of not less than forty nor more than one hundred dollars."

‡Foreign Corporations—Right of State to Exclude.—The proposition laid down in the 4th headnote of the principal case, that, the general assembly of Virginia has authority to forbid foreign corporations engaging in any pursuit within the state; and of consequence to grant permission to engage therein only upon terms, is quoted with approval in Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Warwick, 20 Gratt. 624, and note.

§Constitution—Taxes on Licenses.—The proposition laid down in the 5th headnote of the principal case that taxes on licenses are not required by the constitution of Virginia to be equal and uniform, is quoted with approval in Ould & Carrington v. ch. 38, § 25, p. 210, under which this prosecution is had, is presented by the motion for a new trial, and that in arrest of 770 judgment. It is insisted *that the judgment should be reversed, for that the plaintiff in error was merely an agent for the Protection insurance company of Hartford, incorporated or authorized by the law of the state of Connecticut; that the individual corporators of that company are citizens of that state; that as such citizens, under the constitution of the United States, article 4, § 2, clause 1, they are "entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states;" that in a case like this they have the privileges and immunities of citizens of Virginia; that as citizens of Virginia have the privilege to make contracts in Virginia for the insurance of others, with an immunity from taxation for making such contracts, that these citizens of Connecticut have the same privilege and immunity; and that the statute above cited, imposing terms upon the agents and subagents of the company, which are not imposed upon citizens of Virginia, is a violation of that portion of the federal constitution above cited.

It is somewhat difficult to perceive how the plaintiff in error can raise this question in his case. He points out no discrimination between his privileges and immunities and those of all other citizens of Virginia engaged in his pursuit. It is not shown that he is a citizen of a state other than Virginia; the restrictions prescribed by the statute are imposed alike upon all in his condition. The defense, however, is not founded upon any alleged violation of the plaintiff's personal privileges or immunities, nor upon any violation of privileges and immunities pertaining to his immediate principal, the Protection insurance company of Hartford; but upon an alleged violation of privileges and immunities guaranteed to those citizens of Connecticut, the corporators in that company.

This defense has its basis upon an error in confounding things, which are essentially different, in holding these individual citizens, with their privileges and im-
771 munities *as such, to be identical with the company in which they are corporators. The privileges and immunities guaranteed to them are annexed to their status of citizenship. They are personal, and may not be assigned or imparted by them, or any of them, to any other person, natural or artificial. If it were otherwise, and these citizens could impart their right to others, the limitation of the guaranty to "citizens" would be without practical effect; the right might be imparted to classes, and for purposes in contravention of our policy and laws; and thus our welfare or even our safety be endangered.

It must be conceded by all, that these citizens of Connecticut can have no greater "privileges and immunities" than those which an equal number of our own citizens might enjoy. It must be further conceded by every one in Virginia, that fifty or a hundred (whatever number) citizens of Virginia could not without a charter associate themselves together, and usurp the franchise of a corporation; adopt a corporate name or seal; nor establish a perpetual succession, nor exempt their members from personal liability for contracts of the association; nor to any extent affect or repeal the laws regulating the succession to property, real or personal. In fine, it must be conceded, that our citizens, in any number, of their own motion, and in virtue of their mere citizenship, could do no corporate act whatever. Regarding citizens of Connecticut and of Virginia respectively as having equal privileges and immunities in this respect, we must hold that mere citizenship in Connecticut confers no corporate franchise in Virginia.

It is said however, in effect, that the charter in Connecticut confers the corporate existence, and also the faculty of trading as a corporation; and that the federal constitution guarantees to the corporators the right to trade in Virginia as our own 772 citizens may *trade. The reply is obvious, that we do not recognize the authority of Connecticut to confer on her own citizens privileges or immunities in Virginia, which we have not given to our own citizens within the state. Our own citizens, without a charter from our own authorities, can do no corporate act within the state. Those of Connecticut can be in no better position. The general assembly of Virginia alone has authority to say how far the general rules of property and the general law of liability for contracts shall be varied in favor of corporations. They have heretofore, by general laws and by private acts of incorporation, exercised that power, and will, without doubt, continue to exercise it with reference to the welfare of our own people exclusively. They have not (if they could) conferred on another state unlimited discretion to charter companies to transact business in Virginia. It is a grave exercise of sovereign power to create artificial persons in our midst not amenable to our laws; to vary the general laws by conferring corporate existence, capacity and power. The authorities of Connecticut could not confer such faculties and functions on citizens of Virginia, to be exercised in Virginia; by parity of reason, if no more, they cannot confer them on citizens of Connecticut, to be exercised here. The plaintiff's theory rests upon the assumption that because private individuals may engage in particular pursuits, that therefore artificial persons called corporations, created and existing elsewhere, may engage in the same pursuits; that the right to exercise their natural faculties in lawful pursuits, is identical with the right to engage in the same pursuits with the aid of a new organization with other and different faculties from those pertaining to the same individuals.

If we carry out the pretensions of the plaintiff to their legitimate results, 773 we must hold that the authority *of another state may create a corporation within that state, but to use its corporate power within this state in any pursuit permitted to our own citizens: and that the only mode by which we can expel the intruder will be to forbid our own citizens to engage in that pursuit.

It seems to me that the chain of reasoning, by which corporate powers beyond the limits of the state conferring them are to be deduced from private individual rights of citizens, is utterly defective. I have no doubt of the power of the general assembly of Virginia to forbid foreign corporations from engaging in any pursuit within the state; and, of consequence, to grant permission to engage therein only upon terms; and that the statute, Code of Virginia, ch. 38, § 25, p. 210, is clearly within the scope of their legitimate powers.

The question as to the nature and extent of the privileges and immunities secured to citizens of the several states by the federal constitution, has from time to time been the subject of consideration in the federal and state courts. In several of the cases the claim to privilege and immunity was asserted under circumstances very like those of our case; but in no one of them was the claim allowed. In the cases of The Commonwealth v. Milton, and City of Lexington v. Same, 12 B. Monr. R. 212, the Court of appeals of Kentucky decided that a statute of that state imposing a tax upon insurance companies chartered in other states but doing business in Kentucky, was valid, although insurance companies chartered in Kentucky were not subjected to the same tax. In these cases the defendant relied upon the federal constitution, article 4, § 2, as does the plaintiff in our case; yet upon full consideration, it was held that the legislature have authority to enact the statute.

In Tatem v. Wright et al., 3 Za-
774 briskie's R. 429, the *Supreme court of New Jersey affirmed the validity of a statute imposing a tax upon the agents of foreign insurance companies from other states doing business in New Jersey. They overruled the claim of privilege and immunity founded on the section of the federal constitution above cited; and they decided that a corporation aggregate was not a citizen, or entitled to the privileges of a citizen, except perhaps for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the federal courts.

In Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. R. 371, the subject was under consideration; and the opinion of the court, pronounced by Judge Washington, contains an enumeration of the privileges and immunities secured by the federal constitution, but the franchise of corporation is not embraced therein. In Virginia they may be regarded as set forth in our bill of rights and constitution.

In the Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Peters' R. 519, the question was argued, and the right of the bank, a corporation chartered in Georgia, to make a contract in the line of its business, in Alabama, was affirmed. It was so held, because the comity of the state of Alabama permitted the contract to be made within her borders. If there had been a statute in that state forbidding the bank to do business within that state, or allowing it to do so only upon terms, the Supreme court would have given full effect to such statute.

It is not necessary in the case before us to express any opinion on the conflict between the decision of this court in Bank of Marietta v. Pindall, 2 Rand. 465, and that of the Supreme court in the Bank of Augusta v. Earle. The principle of either case seems to require the affirmance of the judgment.

The plaintiff's counsel, in the argument here, alleged that the statute is in violation of the constitution of Virginia; that as the constitution, article 4, clause 22,
775 *prescribes that "taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth, and all property, other than slaves, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, which shall be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by law;" and as clause 25 of the 4th article authorizes the general assembly to levy a tax on "incomes, salaries and licenses," that such tax must also be "equal and uniform."

The provisions of the 22d and 23d clauses were inserted with the intention of preventing onerous taxes upon slaves. As that species of property was chiefly held in the eastern portion of the commonwealth, and as the power of laying taxes would in a short time pass into the hands of the western portion, it was foreseen that the western portion, if the tax laying power should not be restricted, might discriminate in the levy of taxes to the prejudice of the owners of slaves. These clauses were therefore inserted in the constitution as a compromise, a guaranty for such equality of taxation as therein prescribed. A tax on the value of all property, other than slaves; as to slaves a tax equal to and not exceeding the tax assessed on three hundred dollars worth of land was imposed on every one over the age of twelve years. The provisions of the clauses, taken in connection with the history of the times, leave no doubt that they were inserted as an adjustment of the supposed antagonism of eastern and western interests. The language, however, is broad enough to embrace all subjects of assessable value except slaves, and such is the construction put upon it by the general assembly. It is proposed, however, in the argument here, to extend the equality and uniformity prescribed by clause 22 to the subjects of taxation enumerated in clause 25. If it be conceded for the purposes of this case, that the rule of uniformity and equality must apply to both classes of subjects, yet it can only be so ap-776 plied as far as practicable; *property of assessable value may readily be brought under the rule; so of incomes and salaries; but the very large class of licenses, whence is derived a large revenue, cannot be assessed; licenses are necessarily obtained before engaging in the licensed pursuit; it would be idle to speculate in advance as to the value of the privilege. To fix arbitrarily a specific tax for all licenses would be grossly unequal and far from uniform; to tax the merchant who may have fifty thousand dollars profitably invested in his business, and an inn keeper with a tenth part of that capital paying poorly in his business, the same specific sum, would be against the true meaning of the constitution. The requisitions of the constitution may be carried out by a uniform tax on licenses to persons following the same pursuit, under the same conditions and circumstances; a difference therein will justify a discrimination in the tax. The case before us is an apt instance of business pursued under a difference of circumstances, to justify such discrimination. Our domestic insurance companies are taxed upon their capital, or upon their dividends; a license tax cannot therefore be exacted of them. Constitution of Virginia, art. 4, clause 25. The Protection insurance company of Hartford is not and cannot be taxed upon its capital or dividends, they being beyond the reach of our laws. Our insurance companies are exempt from license tax because, and only because they pay a large tax in a different mode. The Protection insurance company of Hartford, insisting on equality and uniformity, claims an exemption from the license tax, although it does not pay that other tax in that other form, or any other tax whatever. Holding then that the general assembly of Virginia had authority to enact the statute, Code of Virginia, ch. 38, § 25, p. 210, I am of opinion that the defense founded upon its alleged unconstitutionality, is without merit.

777 *As I have said in regard to the other branch of the defense, I may say in regard to this, that it is difficult to perceive how the plaintiff can make it in his case; there is no discrimination against him; he and all others in his business are subjected to precisely the same tax; he must be understood as maintaining the rights claimed for his principal.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

I. DEFINITIONS AND DISTINCTIONS.

A Corporation.—A corporation is "a body composed of one or more individuals, and possessed of a franchise, by virtue of which it subsists as a body politic, under a special designation, and by the policy of the law is vested with the capacity of perpetual succession, and of acting in several particulars however numerous the association, as a single individual." 1 Minor's Inst. (3rd Ed.) 529.

"A corporation is an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law. Being the mere creature of law, it possesses only those properties which the charter of its creation confers upon it, either expressly or as incidental to its very existence. Among the most important are immortality, and, if the expression may be allowed, individuality. By these means a perpetual succession of individuals is capable of acting for the promotion of the particular object like one immortal being." MARSHALL, C. J., in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 636, cited in Railroad Co. v. Transportation Co., 25 W. Va. 324.

A corporation is an inanimate artificial being having no power to act except through living agents. Frazier v. Va. Mil. Inst., 81 Va. 59.

A Franchise.—A franchise is a special right or privilege conferred on individuals by grant, actual or presumed, from the government and which otherwise they could not exercise. The property acquired is not the franchise, but the franchise consists in the incorporeal right. Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Va. 214; Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe R. Co., 11 Leigh 76.

Public and Private Corporations Distinguished.—Corporations are generally divided into two classes, based on the character of their business. Corresponding to the private person is the private corporation, created for private purposes or for the pecuniary gain of its members; and of course they do not cease to be private corporations, simply because the legislature supposed, as it always does, that their creation would indirectly promote the public interest.

On the other hand public corporations correspond to public officers in the division of natural persons. They are created generally for governmental purposes; or they may be created for business purposes and will still be public corporations, if the whole interest in the corporation belongs to the state. Railroad Co. v. Transportation Co., 25 W. Va. 324.

Quasi-Public Corporations.—There is also a third class of corporations corresponding to quasi public officers, called quasi public corporations, viz. owners of ferries, common carriers, innkeepers, etc., who are chartered to conduct a business in which the public has an interest; and hence are subject to the control of the legislature as to their maximum charges, etc. Railroad Co. v. Transportation Co., 25 W. Va. 324.

II. CREATION OF CORPORATIONS.

Status before Incorporation—Conveyance to a Future Corporation.—After the corporators had signed an agreement to become a corporation, but before the charter had been obtained, a deed conveying land to such corporation by name was signed and acknowledged by the grantor, and delivered to a third party, with directions to retain it until the corporation obtained its charter and organized, and then to deliver it to the corporation; and, after the charter had been received, and the corporation organized under it, such third person delivered the deed to, and it was accepted by, the corporation. Held, the said deed operated as a valid conveyance of said land to the corporation from the date of the delivery of said deed to it. Spring Garden Bank v. Hulings Lumber Co., 32 W. Va. 357, 9 S. E. Rep. 243.

Contracts Made in Behalf of a Future Corporation.—While a corporation cannot ratify contracts made in its name or behalf before it has acquired life, it may exercise its power to make contracts when it comes into existence by accepting or adopting such contracts. Richardson v. Graham, 45 W. Va. 134, 30 S. E. Rep. 92.

No Particular Form of Words Necessary.—No particular form of words is necessary to the creation of a corporation, but it may result from implication and intendment. It is the grant of certain powers and privileges and the imposition of the necessary restrictions, which constitute the main elements of a corporation and as it is always a question of intention, the formal words, "erect, establish, incorporate," etc., are not deemed essential; so an act of assembly authorizing a foreign corporation to extend their road into West Virginia makes such foreign corporation a West Virginia corporation. Goshorn v. Board, 1 W. Va. 307.

A Pipe Line Company an Internal Improvement Company—Might Formerly Be Created by Special Act in West Virginia.—A pipe line company, whose object is the transportation of petroleum and other oils, is an internal improvement company and might have been created by a special act of the legislature under Art. XI, § 5, Constitution of West Virginia, and the power of eminent domain might have been conferred upon it. W. Va. Transp. Co. v. Volcanic O. & C. Co., 5 W. Va. 382.

Now no corporation can be created by special act in West Virginia but only by general law. Art. XI, sec. 1, Constitution of 1872.

Present Statute Relating to Court Charters.—For the provisions of the present statute for obtaining a charter by a corporation, see Code Va. (1887) sec. 1145; Code W. Va. (1891) ch. 54.

Same Effect as When Conferred by the Legislature.—Franchises and corporate rights granted indirectly by the state through instrumentalities provided by general laws for such purposes, are the same in effect, as if the power conferring such franchises and rights had been exercised directly by the state itself. Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co., 17 W. Va. 396.

No Fee Required Now in Virginia.—There is now no law in Virginia requiring a fee to be paid on every charter before it becomes operative. Combined Saw & Planer Co. v. Flournoy, 88 Va. 1029, 14 S. E. Rep. 976.

When Legal Existence of Corporation Chartered by the Courts Begins.—When a charter has been granted by a circuit court, pursuant to section 1145 of the Code, and lodged with the secretary of the commonwealth for recordation (the tax thereon having been paid when a tax is required), the corporation so chartered has a legal existence, and may sue and be sued as a corporation. In the absence of any provision in the order granting the charter requiring the minimum capital to be subscribed, the stockholders are not liable as partners although the minimum capital has not been subscribed. The subscription of the minimum capital is not a condition precedent to the existence of the corporation. Coalter v. Bargamin, 6 Va. Law Reg. 757.

Necessity for Filing Certificate of Incorporation.—Where the statute law of a state requires the filing of the original certificate of incorporation, such filing is a condition precedent to the creation of the corporation and until this has been done, it has no existence, and that fact may be taken advantage of collaterally whenever the fact of incorporation is called in question. Childs v. Hurd, 32 W. Va. 66, 9 S. E. Rep. 362.

Presumption That Incorporation Was Regular.—Where the law requires that notice shall be given of a meeting to organize a corporation, if it appears by the books of the corporation that such a meeting was held with the requisite number of stockholders present, it will be presumed that the proper notice was given. Grays v. Turnpike Co., 4 Rand. 578.

Where the law requires the presence at the first meeting of a corporation, of "the number of persons entitled to a majority of all the votes which could be given on all the shares" and the books showed merely the presence "of a majority of shareholders" it will be presumed that the meaning was the same. Grays v. Turnpike Co., 4 Rand. 578.

De Facto Corporations.—Where the defendant is sued by its corporate name and issues its policies signed by the president and treasurer, that fact alone will justify the inference that defendant is a de facto corporation. Bon Aqua Imp. Co. v. Insurance Co., 34 W. Va. 764, 12 S. E. Rep. 771.

Liability.—The principle to be deduced from our statute and the authorities, is, that a private business corporation, acting, and carrying on its corporate business in its corporate name, after its legal existence has ended by the expiration of its charter, must be held to be a corporation de facto; and that as such, so long as it in fact so carries on its business, and contracts or incurs liabilities with, or to third persons dealing with it as a de facto corporation, it may sue and be sued at law, either in actions ex contracto or ex delicto, and it cannot defeat such action by alleging that its charter had expired before the cause of action arose. Its directors and stockholders by failing to wind up its business when the charter expires, as it is their duty to do under our statute, cannot relieve the corporation from liability for acts done in its name, and during its actual existence as a de facto corporation. In order to relieve it from liability the corporation must have ceased to exist both in law and in fact. And consequently, when it is sued as a corporation, a plea averring simply that it has ceased to exist in law, or as a legal corporation, will be insufficient, but it must aver also that it had ceased to exist in fact at the time the alleged cause of action arose. Miller v. Newburg, etc., Coal Co., 31 W. Va. 886, 8 S. E. Rep. 600.

III. INCIDENTS OF INCORPORATION.

A. GENERALLY.

Corporation a Distinct Entity.—It is well settled that from the very nature of a private business corporation, the stockholders are not the private and joint owners of its property, etc.; the corporation is the real though artificial person substituted for the natural persons who procured its creation and have pecuniary interests in it. It must purchase, hold, grant, sell and convey the corporate property, do business, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded for corporate purposes by its corporate name. Park v. Petroleum Co., 25 W. Va. 108; Barksdale v. Finney, 14 Gratt. 338.

Its Property Taxable in Name of Corporation.—Property belonging to a corporation is vested in the shareholders in their corporate capacity and not as individuals, and is consequently taxable in the name of the company. B. & O. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 3 W. Va. 319.

B. THE CHARTER.

All Persons Dealing with Corporation, Bound with Notice.—Persons dealing with a corporation are bound with notice of whatever is contained in the law of its organization and they must be presumed to be informed as to the restrictions or conditions annexed to the grant of power, by the law under which the corporation is authorized to act. Silliman v. R. Co., 27 Gratt. 119; Bocock v. Alleghany C. & I. Co., 82 Va. 913, 1 S. E. Rep. 325; Haden v. F. & M. Fire Ass'n Co., 80 Va. 683; Smith v. Cornelius, 41 W. Va. 59, 23 S. E. Rep. 599; Bockover v. Life Ass'n, 77 Va. 85; Whitehurst v. Whitehurst, 83 Va. 155, 1 S. E. Rep. 801; Building Ass'n v. Snyder, 98 Va. 710, 37 S. E. Rep. 298; Campbell v. Building Ass'n, 98 Va. 729, 37 S. E. Rep. 350, 6 Va. Law Reg. 632.

In Case of Court Charters, from the Time of Filing.—After the charter of a corporation has been lodged for record in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth anyone dealing with such corporation is bound with notice of its provisions. Real Estate Co. v. Claiborne, 97 Va. 734, 34 S. E. Rep. 900.

Acquiescence in Change of Charter.—And if a stockholder pays any installment on his stock or participates in a stockholders' meeting, he is estopped to deny knowledge of the terms and provisions of the charter, however much it may vary from his contract of subscription. Real Estate Co. v. Claiborne, 97 Va. 734, 34 S. E. Rep. 900.

The General Law Forms Part of the Charter.—A general law does not need to be copied into the charter, but forms an essential part of it and all parties are bound by its terms whether copied into the charter or found only in the statute book. Knights of Pythias v. Weller, 93 Va. 605, 25 S. E. Rep. 891.

Also Provisions Made in Pursuance of Authority of the Legislature.—Where the act of incorporation is a bare grant of existence to the corporation, to be effectuated by the provisions imposed on it by the governing bodies of the cities and counties named therein respectively, such provisions will constitute an organic part of the charter of such corporation. Richmond, etc., Ry. Co. v. Brown, 97 Va. 26, 32 S. E. Rep. 775.

Construction of Charter.

Construed Strictly against the Corporation.—It is a well-settled rule of construction of grants by the legislature to corporations, whether public or private, that only such powers and rights can be exercised under them, as are clearly comprehended within the words of the act or derived therefrom by necessary implication, regard being had to the objects of the grant; any ambiguity or doubt arising out of the terms used by the legislature must be resolved in favor of the public. Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Va. 214.

"The grant of privileges and exemptions to a corporation is strictly construed against the corporation, and in favor of the public. Nothing passes but what is granted in clear and explicit terms. And neither the right of taxation nor any other power of sovereignty which the community have an interest in preserving, undiminished, will be held by the court to be surrendered, unless the intention to surrender is manifested by words too plain to be mistaken." CHIEF JUSTICE TANEY in Ohio Life Ins. Co. v. Debolt, 16 Howard 416, cited with approval in B. & O. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 3 W. Va. 319.

Effect of Acceptance of New Charter.—When a new charter is granted to and accepted by a corporation the former charter is not thereby wholly superseded, but only in those respects in which it is inconsistent with the new charter. B. & O. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 3 W. Va. 319.

C. THE BY-LAWS.

Stockholders Bound with Notice.—A stockholder is bound, at his peril, to take notice of the by-laws of the corporation, of which he is a member. Real Estate Co. v. Claiborne, 97 Va. 739, 34 S. E. Rep. 900; Campbell v. Ass'n, 98 Va. 729, 37 S. E. Rep. 350, 6 Va. Law Reg. 632.

Absence When They Were Adopted Immaterial.—Where the charter of a corporation allows a majority to alter and amend the rules and regulations as they may judge necessary, all members of the corporation will be bound by such subsequent change, confirmed by Act of Assembly, though not present at the meeting adopting it. Currie v. Mut. Ass'n Soc., 4 H. & M. 315.

General Power to Make By-Laws.—The power to make reasonable by-laws, consistent with its charter inheres in every corporation. One who becomes a member, subjects himself not only to regulations then existing, but to those afterwards enacted within the scope of such power. The corporation cannot by a subsequent by-law destroy the contract of membership or change the essential character of an antecedent agreement between a member and the corporation; but a by-law more or less affecting the remedy of shareholders may be passed and existing members will be bound by it, so far, at least, as they consented to the exercise of such a power when they became members. Building Ass'n v. Snyder, 98 Va. 710, 37 S. E. Rep. 298.

Limitations.—A corporation has not the power, by laws of its own enactment, to disturb or devest rights which it has created, or to impair the obligation of its contracts, or to change its responsibility to its members, or to draw them into new and distinct relations; and all by-laws attempting to do this are inoperative and void. Savage v. People's Building, etc., Ass'n, 45 W. Va. 275, 31 S. E. Rep. 991.

Must Not Be Contrary to Existing Laws.—A by-law in contravention of the laws of Congress is void. Feckheimer v. Bank, 79 Va. 80.

D. POWER OF COURTS AND LEGISLATURE OVER PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.—Neither the courts nor the legislature can control the conduct or actions of a private corporation when acting within the scope of the powers conferred upon it by its charters, any more than they can control the conduct of a private person in his business. To this rule there are some exceptions arising from the character of the business, for which see "Quasi-Public Corporations," infra. Railroad Co. v. Transportation Co., 25 W. Va. 324.

Where the charter of a water company provides that the water rates shall be uniform throughout the town for the same class of service, but allows a charge of $9 per hydrant, and also allows a maximum charge of 5 cents per hundred gallons thereby impliedly authorizing a charge by measurement, the plaintiff cannot enjoin the water company from charging by measurement as long as the company keeps within its charter and does not discriminate between consumers in the same circumstances. Exchange, etc., Co. v. Roanoke Gas & Water Co., 90 Va. 83, 17 S. E. Rep. 789.

May Compel Payment of Employees in Lawful Money.—The act of March 7, 1891, prohibiting corporations, etc., from paying their employees in other than lawful money, also the act of March 9, 1891, touching the weighing of coal, are not in violation of the Constitution of the United States or of West Virginia. Coal Co. v. State, 36 W. Va. 802, 15 S. E. Rep. 1000.

Charter a Contract.—The charter of a strictly private corporation is almost universally admitted to be a contract and the legislature cannot, without the corporation's consent, alter its charter in a material respect, since it would be impairing the obligation of the contract, and consequently unconstitutional. Railroad Co. v. Transportation Co., 25 W. Va. 324.

A Ferry Franchise Private Property.—A ferry franchise is private property within the meaning of the constitution, which declares that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation. Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co., 17 W. Va. 396.

Grant of a Charter Not Exclusive.—The grant of a charter to one corporation is not held to be exclusive and to prevent the chartering of rival companies, but whenever exclusive rights are intended express provisions must be introduced. Monopoly is not a matter of inference; it must rest its pretensions upon express grant. It is a restriction upon common right and legislative power, hence cannot be implied. Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe R. Co., 11 Leigh 43, 36 Am. Dec. 374; Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Va. 214.

Reserved Power of Modification or Repeal.

May Repeal but Cannot Modify without Consent of Corporation.—"The power of the legislature to 'repeal, alter or modify the charter of any bank at its pleasure,' must be held to be limited to this extent. It may certainly repeal the charter of any bank, but it cannot compel a bank to accept an amendment or modification of its charter. Nor is any such amendment or modification of its charter binding upon the bank without its acceptance. Banks are private corporations, created by a charter, or act of incorporation from the government, which is in the nature of a contract, and therefore, in order to complete the creation of such corporations, something more than the mere grant of a charter is required; that is, in order to give to the charter the full force and effect of an executed contract, it must be accepted. It is clear that the government cannot enforce the acceptance of a charter upon a private corporation without its consent. These well-settled principles are everywhere recognized as applicable to the original charters of incorporation; and upon principle and authority they apply with equal force to any amendment or modification of the charter as well as to the original charter. Though the legislature may have the reserved power to amend or modify a charter of incorporation, it can no more force the corporation to accept such amendment or modification, than it could have forced upon them the acceptance of the original charter without their consent. Under the reservation they can repeal or destroy the charter, without any consent on the part of the corporators, but as long as they remain in existence as a corporate body, they necessarily have the power to reject an amendment or modification of their charter. The power reserved by the legislature gives the right certainly to repeal or destroy, but so far as the right to modify or alter is concerned, it is nothing more than the ordinary case of a stipulation that one of the parties to a contract may vary its terms with the consent of the other contracting party. These principles grow out of the nature of charters or acts of incorporation, which are regarded in the nature of contracts. The amendment or modification must be made by the parties to the contract, the legislature on the one hand, and the corporation on the other, the former expressing its intention, by means of a legislative act, and the latter assenting thereto by a vote of the majority of the stockholders, according to the provisions of its charter, or by other acts showing its acceptance.

"The reservation of the right to alter, amend or repeal the act by which the corporation is created, may be prudent and salutary; but it seems to be a necessary implication, that if the legislature should undertake to make what in their opinion is a legitimate alteration or amendment, the corporation has the power to reject or accept it, whatever may be the consequences. One consequence undoubtedly is, that the corporation cannot conduct its operations in defiance of the power that created it; and if it does not accept the modification or amendment proposed, must discontinue its operations as a corporate body. But such amendment or modification cannot be forced upon the corporation without its consent." CHRISTIAN, J., in Yeaton v. Bank of Old Dominion, 21 Gratt. 593; Norwich Lock Mfg. Co. v. Hockaday, 89 Va. 557, 16 S. E. Rep. 877.

The act of March 1st, 1867, entitled "An act to authorize the James River & Kanawha Company to borrow money;" though, when accepted by the company, it created a contract between the company and the state, did not create a contract between the company and the holders of the state bonds therein mentioned; and though the company executed a mortgage on its property to secure the money authorized to be borrowed by said act, yet, if the company has not borrowed the money or made use of the bonds intended to be secured by the mortgage, it cannot be held to have accepted the terms of the act or become liable under its proviso. Stuart v. James River, etc., Co., 24 Gratt. 294.

Not Necessary to an Immaterial Change.—A limited power to borrow money conferred on a building association by a new charter, is not such a radical departure from the original design and business of the company as would necessitate the assent of each member of the company in order that he may be bound by it. Bosang v. B. & L. Ass'n, 96 Va. 119, 30 S. E. Rep. 440.

A Branch Bank Cannot Accept Modification for Mother Bank.—A branch bank, having no separate charter has no power to accept a modification of the charter of the mother bank. Yeaton v. Bank of Old Dominion, 21 Gratt. 593.

Cannot Disturb Existing Contracts.—Under the reserved right "to repeal, alter or modify" the legislature may alter the charters of banks or take them away altogether, but it cannot disturb contracts lawfully made under such charters, or disturb rights already legally vested under the old charters. ANDERSON, J., dissenting. Bank of Old Dominion v. McVeigh, 20 Gratt. 457.

May Be Exercised Either by General or Special Law.—Under a power of modification or repeal reserved in the charter, the charter may be modified by a general law as well as by special act, so as to make shareholders personally liable, and those who become, or continue shareholders, must be understood as consenting to it. Anderson v. Com., 18 Gratt. 295; Robinson v. Gardiner, 18 Gratt. 509; Va. Devel. Co. v. Crozer Iron Co., 90 Va. 126, 17 S. E. Rep. 806.

Distinction in Case of Quasi-Public Corporation.—But a quasi-public corporation having accepted a franchise in which the public has an interest, is subject to the control of the legislature as to its charges, etc., in the exercise of the police power, and a provision in their charter fixing a maximum charge, is not a contract, but amounts to nothing more than a license which may at any time be changed by the sovereign power from the state. Railroad Co. v. Transportation Co., 25 W. Va. 824.

May Take Away Exclusive Privileges.—The right to establish ferries and toll bridges is in the legislature and that body can at any time, by a repeal of the general law, take away all the exclusive privileges of proprietors theretofore existing; but it has not done so in West Virginia. Mason v. Bridge Co., 17 W. Va. 396.

When Mandamus Will Lie to a Corporation to Compel a Transfer of Stock.—Where a by-law requires that the transfer of shares be made on the books of the bank and the right to a transfer is established, if the bank refuses to open its books and allow the transfer, a court of equity will compel the bank to transfer not only the shares but the accrued dividends, since it is a case for specific performance and damages would be inadequate. Feckheimer v. Bank, 79 Va. 80.

To Compel Performance of Its Corporate Duties. Mandamus will lie to a corporation to compel it to perform the duties imposed upon it by its charter, viz. issuing a transfer when required to do so by its charter. Richmond Ry., etc., Co. v. Brown, 97 Va. 26, 32 S. E. Rep. 775.

Sunday Laws Applicable to Corporations Engaged in Interstate Commerce.—In Norfolk & West. R. Co. v. Com., 88 Va. 95, 13 S. E. Rep. 340, the statute, Code Va. § 3801, prohibiting the running of trains on Sunday, with certain specified exceptions, was held void as in conflict with the United States constitution, as an improper regulation of interstate commerce, whether intended to be so or not, in a matter of national concern, and that it made no difference that Congress had not acted in the matter; and it could not be justified as an exercise of the police power. LONG, J., dissenting. But in Norfolk & West. R. Co. v. Com., 93 Va. 761, 24 S. E. Rep. 837, this same statute was upheld as constitutional, as being a valid exercise of the police power, and, though in this case the train consisted only of empty coal cars, hence was held not to be engaged in interstate commerce, yet the court expressly disapproved of the decision in Norfolk & West. R. Co. v. Com., supra, saying, "A state may, in order to secure and protect the lives and health of its citizens, or to preserve good order and the public morals, legislate for such purposes, in good faith and without discrimination against interstate or foreign commerce, without violating the commerce clause of the United States constitution although such legislation may sometimes touch in its exercise the line separating the respective domains of national and state authority, and to some extent affect foreign and interstate commerce." State v. Railroad, 24 W. Va. 783.

E. THE TERM "PERSON" AS APPLIED TO CORPORATIONS.—"The term 'person' used in law, is unquestionably sufficiently comprehensive to embrace corporations; and it must be held to embrace them, unless there is something in the law showing the legislative intent to restrict its application." CABELL, J., in Stribbling v. Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 132; Crafford v. Supervisors, 87 Va. 110, 12 S. E. Rep. 147; State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

"Corporations are to be deemed and taken as persons when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of natural persons expressly included in a statute." ALLEN, J., in B. & O. R. Co. v. Gallahue, 12 Gratt. 655; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Richmond, 26 Gratt. 1; Quesenberry v. Ass'n, 44 W. Va. 512, 30 S. E. Rep. 73; Bank v. Distilling Co., 41 W. Va. 530, 23 S. E. Rep. 793. See Code Va. 1887, § 5, subsec. 13; Code W. Va., ch. 13, sec. 17, clause 9.

Especially is this true of statutes imposing a tax in which the word "persons" embraces corporations unless excluded by express terms or necessary implication. Miller v. Com., 27 Gratt. 110.

"For civil purposes, corporations are in law deemed persons. The only doubt has been whether that word would be so construed as to embrace them within the purview of penal statutes, and in the case of U. S. v. Amedy, 11 Wheat. 393, the court decided that under the act of Congress making it felony to destroy a vessel with the intent to prejudice any person or persons that had underwritten such vessel corporations were comprehended." ALLEN, J., in U. S. Bank v. Merchant's Bank, 1 Rob. 573. But see Miller v. Com., 27 Gratt. 110.

Corporations are in law for civil purposes deemed persons; they have power to plead, be impleaded, grant or receive by their corporate names and to do all other acts within the purview of their corporate power, which natural persons can do. B. & O. R. Co. v. Gallahue, 12 Gratt. 655.

A corporation is a "person" so as to come within the purview of the act, 1 R. C. 1819, p. 474, directing the method of proceeding against absent debtors in courts of equity so that a suit may be maintained against a foreign corporation where it has estate within the commonwealth. Bank of U. S. v. Merchants' Bank, 1 Rob. 573. STANARD and BROOKS, JJ., dissenting. B. & O. R. Co. v. Gallahue, 12 Gratt. 655.

Liable as Garnishee.—A corporation is liable as garnishee under the attachment laws, being included in the word "person" used in the statute. B. & O. R. Co. v. Gallahue, 12 Gratt. 655.

Subject to the Usury Laws.—Corporations generally are within the usury laws; being included under the designation of "person." The fact that a bank is allowed to take a fraction of a per cent. more than the general law allows does not amount to a general repeal of the usury law as to that bank, but is only a protection against the usury law up to the specified limit. Stribbling v. Bank, 5 Rand. 132; Crabtree v. Ass'n, 95 Va. 670, 29 S. E. Rep. 741, 4 Va. Law Reg. 12, and note.

Effect of Rule of Ejusdem Generis.—But, in Lynchburg v. R. Co., 80 Va. 237, it was held that a section of the charter of the city of Lynchburg which granted authority to impose a license tax upon persons engaged in certain enumerated callings and "upon any other person or employment, which it may deem proper whether such person or employment be herein specially enumerated or not" does not empower the city to impose such a tax upon a railroad corporation, "which is neither a person nor employment in the ordinary acceptation of these words." HINTON, J. The decision was based on the rule of ejusdem generis.

F. POWERS OF CORPORATIONS.

Corporation Must Exercise its Powers Collectively, Not Individually.—Where authority is conferred on a corporation aggregate by statute to make contracts, neither a majority of the members, nor all of them acting separately have the power to bind the corporation; one of the principal objects being the concurrent counsel and deliberation of the members acting together; and of course, if they cannot make a binding contract acting separately, they cannot, individually, ratify what has been done, so as to bind the corporation. A corporation can only act as a body or by its authorized agents. Penn. Lightning Rod Co. v. Board of Education, 20 W. Va. 360.

Implied Powers.—"Corporations aggregate are artificial beings created for specific and limited objects, public or private, in order to conduct and continue in succession the interests pertaining to those objects, by the exercise collectively of appropriate, legitimate means, such as natural persons may employ individually. The difference between the powers of corporations and individuals is to be found mainly in the limited objects of the former, and the necessity of their acting in a concrete character. It is essential to corporations, as well as individuals, that they should have the capacity to sue and be sued, to make contracts, to acquire and alienate property. Without these powers the purposes of their institution could not be accomplished. But they have not, like individuals, an unlimited discretion in the application of these powers. They may not exercise them for purposes foreign to their creation. A bank of discount and deposit cannot engage in manufacturing or agricultural pursuits; an insurance or mining company cannot discount bills or notes, or circulate their paper as money; a road or navigation company cannot speculate in lands or stocks. But all such corporations have the right to secure and collect debts due to them, and consequently to obtain deeds of trust or mortgages therefor upon property real or personal, or to commute them by taking in payment assignments of choses in action, or conveyances of lands or goods. The authority to use such means is to be determined by the lawfulness of the end which they are employed to accomplish.

"It is true that the capacity of corporations at common law to purchase and hold lands and chattels is laid down broadly in the books, though I am not aware of any case in which the question was made whether this power was unlimited. However this may be, I think it clear that our statutory corporations cannot take and hold real estate for purposes wholly foreign to their creation." Rivanna Nav. Co. v. Dawsons, 3 Gratt. 20; The Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand. 136; Wroten v. Armat, 31 Gratt. 228.

Whilst no powers will be implied except those only which are incident to the very existence of the corporation or so necessary to the enjoyment of some special grant that without the implied power such right would fail, yet it is an established principle that corporations may exercise all the powers within the fair intent and purpose of their creation which are reasonably proper to give effect to powers expressly granted. Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 6 S. E. Rep. 866.

Implied Powers May Be Curtailed by the Provisions of the Charter.—It is, moreover, unquestionable that the general incidental power of a corporation, whether derived from the common or the statute law, may be curtailed by the provisions of its legislative charter, either expressly or by necessary implication. Thus the charter may in terms prohibit the corporation from purchasing lands or goods for any purpose whatever, or for any but a particular specified purpose; or the prohibition may be implied from an insertion, by way of enactment, of the general incidental power to purchase, with a proviso limiting it to a given purpose. But a general prohibition would not be inferred from a mere partial enactment of the incidental common-law power; as, for example, from a clause authorizing a bank, insurance or manufacturing company to purchase land for the erection of its necessary buildings. Such a clause, whether with or without limitation as to quantity or value, would not exclude the incidental power to take mortgages or other securities on real or personal estate, for debts due the corporation, or assignments or conveyances of chattels or lands in commutation therefor.

The incidental capacity of a corporate body to acquire property for its chartered objects, is for the most part salutary, and the entire prohibition of it would often be productive of great inconvenience. Nothing is easier, whenever sound policy may require the denial of this otherwise inherent power, than a plain manifestation of such legislative intent in the charter of incorporation; and it ought not to be lightly inferred, but made manifest by express terms or necessary implication. Rivanna Nav. Co. v. Dawsons, 3 Gratt. 19; Wroten v. Armat, 31 Gratt. 228.

Powers of Corporations Depend upon the True Construction of Their Charters.—Whatever the implied powers of corporations aggregate may be at common law and the modes by which those powers are to be carried into operation, corporations, either private or public, created by statute, must depend, both for their powers and the mode of exercising them upon the true construction of the statute creating them; they are precisely what the statute has made them, they derive all their powers from the statute, and are capable of exercising their powers only in the manner prescribed or authorized by it. Penn. Lightning Rod Co. v. Board of Education, 20 W. Va. 360; B. & O. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 3 W. Va. 319; Smith v. Cornelius, 41 W. Va. 59, 23 S. E. Rep. 599.

Subject to the Police Power of the State.—A corporation, where it is not otherwise provided in its charter expressly or by clear implication, in the use of its property, the exercise of its powers and the transaction of its business, stands upon the same footing as natural persons and is subject to the same control under the police powers of the state or a municipal corporation. Under this police power a city ordinance forbidding a railroad to propel cars through certain crowded streets of a city by steam, was upheld as not impairing the obligation of the contract of incorporation. Richmond, Fred'g & Pot. R. Co. v. City of Richmond, 26 Gratt. 83.

Power of Corporation to Contract—Necessity for Seal. Old Rule—New Rule.—In ancient times corporations aggregate could do nothing except by deed under their corporate seal. But this rule cannot now be supported as a general proposition. A corporation, like a natural person can grant or convey land only by deed but it is now firmly established that a corporation may be bound by promises express or implied, resulting from the acts of its authorized agents, although such authority be conferred only by virtue of a corporate vote unaccompanied by the corporate seal. Penn. Lightning Rod Co. v. Board of Education, 20 W. Va. 360.

A corporation may make a contract without the use of a seal in all cases where this may be done by an individual. Grubbs v. Insurance Co., 94 Va. 589, 27 S. E. Rep. 464; Kelly v. Board, 75 Va. 263; Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand. 136, 15 Am. Dec. 706; Legrand v. Hampden-Sidney College, 5 Munf. 324.

Realty Passes Only by Deed.—When the charter of a corporation declares its stock to be personal estate, but that its real estate should only be conveyed as other real estate, such real estate will not pass except by deed duly executed. Barksdale v. Finney, 14 Gratt. 338.

Seal Must Be Affixed by Authority of Corporation, and Be Intended for a Seal.—The mere presence of what purports to be the seal of a corporation impressed upon a contract that would be a valid and binding contract, though not under seal, will have no effect on its apparent character without proof that the seal is the seal of the corporation and was affixed by its authority and that it was the intention of the parties that it should be a sealed instrument. Grubbs v. Insurance Co., 94 Va. 589, 27 S. E. Rep. 464, 3 Va. Law Reg. 279, and note.

Private Seal of President Not Sufficient.—To constitute a valid deed of a corporation, the corporate seal must be affixed, the private seal of the president is not sufficient; but such an instrument purporting to be a deed of trust of the corporation though invalid as the "deed" of the corporation, is valid as a mortgage of the personal property of the corporation, which it purports to convey. Rauch v. Oil Co., 8 W. Va. 36.

Sufficient Authority to Execute Deed.—When a corporation, at a meeting of stockholders, authorizes the officers of the corporation to execute a deed under the direction of the executive committee, that is sufficient authority to the president to execute the deed under the direction of said committee. Merchants' Bank v. Goddin, 76 Va. 503.

Presumption That Seal Was Affixed by Proper Authority.—The rule is well settled that if a contract purports to be sealed with the seal of the corporation and it is proved to be signed and executed by the proper agents, the presumption is that the seal was regularly affixed by the proper authority; and a contract under seal, executed by an agent within the scope of his appointed power, will be held valid and binding upon the corporation until evidence to the contrary has been introduced, and the presumption of authority to affix to the instrument the seal of the corporation will not be overcome by the mere fact that no vote of the directors authorizing it is shown, since it is often the case that large powers are executed by corporate officers with the tacit approval of the corporation, and if the stockholder has notice of the contract and acquiesces by failing to make any inquiry as to its validity, he is estopped to question its validity afterwards. Fidelity Ins. T. & S. D. Co. v. Shenandoah Val. R. Co., 32 W. Va. 344, 9 S. E. Rep. 180.

The President a Proper Person to Execute the Deed.—A deed of a corporation, executed by the president under the seal of the corporation, is a valid deed. Merchants' Bank v. Goddin, 76 Va. 503.

Where the deed of a corporation was signed by the corporation, by its president, with the corporate seal affixed and the certificate of the notary stated that "Thos. L. Rosser, president, whose name is signed to the writing hereto annexed," acknowledged the same before him in his county, this was held a sufficient execution of the deed by the corporation. Banner v. Rosser, 96 Va. 238, 31 S. E. Rep. 67.

Seal Must in Any Case Be Acknowledged.—The seal of a corporation, even though an actual seal, must be acknowledged in the body of the instrument. Salt Co. v. Norfolk, etc., Co., 95 Va. 461, 28 S. E. Rep. 567, 3 Va. Law Reg. 722, and note.

Sufficient Acknowledgment of Seal.—It is a sufficient acknowledgment of a corporate seal in the body of an instrument, if the instrument is there acknowledged to be a bond, inferentially an instrument under seal. Dinwiddie Co. v. Stuart, 28 Gratt. 526.

Act Validating Deeds of a Corporation Must Not Interfere with Vested Rights.—The Act approved March 1, 1894 (Acts 1893-4, p. 580) validating deeds in favor of a corporation, which were acknowledged before a notary, who was an officer or stockholder of the corporation at the time, is unconstitutional in so far as it impairs the lien of judgments recovered and docketed prior to the approval of such act. Merchants' Bank v. Ballou, 98 Va. 112, 32 S. E. Rep. 481.

Defective Certificate of Acknowledgment of a Deed.—A certificate of acknowledgment of a deed conveying real estate by a corporation, which fails to show that the officer or agent executing it was sworn, and deposed to the facts contained in the certificate, as required by sec. 5, ch. 73, Code, is fatally defective, and does not entitle such deed to be recorded. Abney v. Ohio Lumber & Mining Co., 45 W. Va. 446, 32 S. E. Rep. 256.

Defence of Usury Not Available to Corporation.—The Act of March 22, 1873, Code Va. 1887, sec. 2825, in prohibiting the defence of usury to corporations is not in violation of the federal constitution or that of Virginia and is retroactive in its operation, even though suit has been brought on such a contract before its passage. Danville v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 1.

Relation of Corporation to Stockholder Not a Fiduciary One.—An individual stockholder is not, by reason of being a stockholder, a part owner of the property of the corporation, or entitled to act for it as its agent; but he stands as a stranger towards it and may sue it and be sued by it and deal with it at arm's length. Kanawha Coal Co. v. Ballard & Welch Coal Co., 43 W. Va. 721, 29 S. E. Rep. 514.

May Contract with Its Members.—An incorporated company is, in a legal point of view, wholly distinct from the persons composing it and may make any contract with one of its members or stockholders that it might make with a stranger. Biggs v. Elliston Dev. Co., 93 Va. 404, 25 S. E. Rep. 113.

May Secure Debts to Shareholder.—A corporation may contract debts to its individual corporators and is as much bound to pay or secure such debts as debts due to strangers, and the fact that a deed is given to secure such debts does not render it fraudulent unless some fraudulent intent is shown. Burr v. McDonald, 3 Gratt. 215; Hope v. Salt Co., 25 W. Va. 789.

Ultra Vires Contracts.

When Corporation May Set up Defence of "Ultra Vires."—When want of power is apparent upon comparing the act done with the terms of the charter, the party dealing with the corporation is presumed to have knowledge of the defect, and the defense of ultra vires is available against him. But such a defense would not be permitted to prevail against a party who cannot be presumed to have had any knowledge of the want of authority to make the contract. Hence, if the question of authority depends nor merely upon the law under which the corporation acts, but upon the existence of certain extrinsic facts resting peculiarly within the knowledge of the corporate officers, then the corporation would be estopped from denying that which, by assuming to make the contract, it had virtually affirmed. Boyce v. Montauk Gas Coal Co., 37 W. Va. 73, 16 S. E. Rep. 505.

Where there is nothing on the face of the paper indicating that a corporation has exceeded its corporate powers in the execution of a mortgage, it will not be allowed to plead "ultra vires" in a suit to enforce it. The stockholders only can object, not the corporation itself. Boyce v. Montauk Gas Coal Co., 37 W. Va. 73, 16 S. E. Rep. 501.

Who May Contest Ultra Vires Acts.—The corporation can contest an ultra vires act of its directory, also the attorney general may restrain a corporate excess which tends to the public injury.

But the president and directors, as such, have no authority to sue in behalf of the corporation. Smith v. Cornelius, 41 W. Va. 59, 23 S. E. Rep. 599.

Rights of a Minority of Shareholders.—In order to give standing in a court of equity to a small minority of shareholders, contesting, as ultra vires, an act of the directors, it must appear that they have exhausted all the means within their reach to obtain redress of their grievance within the corporation itself and that they were stockholders at the time of the transaction complained of or that the shares have devolved on them since, by operation of law. Boyce v. Montauk Gas Coal Co., 37 W. Va. 73, 16 S. E. Rep. 501.

Contracts Fairly within the Objects of Incorporation Not "Ultra Vires."—A contract by a railway company to deliver a certain number of bales of cotton in a certain place at a specified time is not ultra vires a railroad corporation, being incident to and for the benefit of their business as common carriers, and not forbidden by their charter. The court, citing 1 Wood Ry. Law, pp. 179, 480, said: "There is no question but that, under the head of its implied powers, a corporation, especially a railroad corporation, may, in order to increase its business, enter into many contracts and undertakings which are not strictly within its express powers, if they are not expressly prohibited and are essential to promote the business of the corporations, or add materially to the convenience of its prosecution." R. Co. v. Compress Co., 83 Va. 272, 2 S. E. Rep. 139.

Where the charter of a corporation authorizes a bond issue, an application of the proceeds to pay off the floating debts of the corporation is not ultra vires. Addison v. Lewis, 75 Va. 701.

Jurisdiction of Equity to Annul Such Contracts.—Equity has jurisdiction to declare null and void an order of the board of directors of a corporation that is ultra vires and obstructs its rights to property, though that order be void. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co. v. Woodyard, 46 W. Va. 558, 33 S. E. Rep. 285.

Corporation a Necessary Party.—In a suit to annul an act of a corporation as ultra vires, the corporation is a necessary party. Smith v. Cornelius, 41 W. Va. 59, 23 S. E. Rep. 599.

Power of Corporations to Acquire Land.

Charters Merely Directory.—"It seems to me, that the charters limiting the amount of land that a corporation may acquire are merely directory. They impose no penalty in terms. They do not declare the purchase by or conveyance to the banks to be void, nor vest the title in the commonwealth or any other than the banks in consequence of such purchase and conveyance. The legal title passed to the banks by the conveyance to them, and their conveyance would effectually transfer that title to any other. If, in making the purchase of the land in question, the banks violated their charters, the corporation might, for that cause, be dissolved by a proceeding at the suit of the commonwealth; and even in that case, it seems the better opinion that the property, if not previously conveyed away would revert, upon the dissolution of the corporation, to the grantor and not to the commonwealth. But any conveyance made by the corporation, before its dissolution would be effectual to pass its title. The banks therefore have a title which they can convey to the appellee and which would, in his hands, be indefeasible. It would seem extremely inconvenient if a contractor with one of these banks could for the purpose of avoiding his contract, institute the inquiry whether the bank had violated its charter." GREEN, J., in The Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand. 136; Fayette Land Co. v. L. & N. R. Co., 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. Rep. 1016; Litchfield v. Preston, 98 Va. 530, 37 S. E. Rep. 6, 6 Va. Law Reg. 397, and note; Wroten v. Armat, 31 Gratt. 228.

It seems that where the corporation is trying to enforce a sale by it of lands already acquired contrary to its charter, specific performance will be enforced, but not where the corporation is trying to enforce a sale to itself in violation of its charter. Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand. 136, and dictum in Fayette

Land Co. v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. Rep. 1016.

Such Charters Construed Liberally.—Under an act of assembly, authorizing a bank to hold as much real property as may be requisite for its immediate accommodation, in relation to the convenient transaction of its business, and no more, the bank may purchase more ground than is necessary for the erection of a banking house, build fire-proof houses on the vacant land, for the greater security of the banking house, and sell them to third persons. Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand. 136. See also, Davis v. Lee Camp (Va.), 18 S. E. Rep. 839.

Statute of Mortmain Not in Force in Virginia.—The statute of mortmain has never been adopted into the law of Virginia, and there is no proceeding authorized by the common or statute law of Virginia under which lands acquired by a corporation in violation of its charter can be forfeited to the state. Fayette Land Co. v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co., 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. Rep. 1016; Rivanna Nav. Co. v. Dawsons, 3 Gratt. 19.

Incapacity to Take Not Inferred from Inhibition to Hold.—An incapacity to take will not be inferred from an inhibition to hold, though the policy of the latter be to prevent the accumulation by the corporation of a specified description of property, if the purpose of the conveyance be a sale of the property by the corporation, and the application of the proceeds to the objects contemplated by the charter. Rivanna Nav. Co. v. Dawsons, 3 Gratt. 19; Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand. 136.

Prohibition to Take Land as Security Does Not Avoid the Security.—A prohibition on a bank to take a deed of trust or mortgage to secure loans will not render the security void, for such a provision is made for the benefit of the government and not of the borrower and the government alone can take advantage of it or not at its pleasure. Wroten v. Armat, 31 Gratt. 228.

Power to Alienate Its Franchise, Must Be Authorized by Its Charter, Private Corporations.—A private corporation, unless authorized by charter to do so, cannot lease or dispose of its franchise or its property needful in the performance of its obligations to the state, without legislative consent. Dictum in Smith v. Cornelius, 41 W. Va. 59, 23 S. E. Rep. 599.

Such authority is now given by statute in Virginia, in case of a foreclosure and sale under a deed of trust or mortgage, or under a decree of court, of all the works and property of an internal improvement company. Code Va. 1887, §§ 1233-4, 1236, Acts 1891-2, p. 623; 1 Va. Law Reg. 546.

Quasi-Public Corporations.—In Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Va. 214, a ferry was held to be a quasi-public franchise, in the proper exercise of which the public was interested, hence could not be transferred without express legislative authority.

A quasi-public corporation has the power to mortgage its property for the furtherances of the objects of its creation, when authorized by the legislature. Enders v. Board of Public Works, 1 Gratt. 364.

Cannot Thus Exempt Itself from Liability.—A railroad corporation cannot, without distinct legislative authority, by lease or any other contract, turn over to another company its road and the use of its franchises, and thereby exempt itself from responsibility for the conduct and management of the road. Ricketts v. R. Co., 33 W. Va. 433, 10 S. E. Rep. 801, 25 Am. St. Rep. 901; Fisher v. R. Co., 39 W. Va. 366, 19 S. E. Rep. 578; Naglee v. R. Co., 83 Va. 707, 3 S. E. Rep. 369, 5 Am. St. Rep. 308.

Power to Subscribe to Stock in Another Corporation May Take Such Stock as Security.—The taking of stocks and bonds of another corporation merely as collateral security for advances made to such corporation does not come within the prohibition of the Code of W. Va., prohibiting one corporation from subscribing to or purchasing the stocks, bonds or other securities of another corporation except in payment of a bona fide debt. County Court v. R. Co., 35 Fed. Rep. 161.

May Be Authorized by Law.—A law authorizing a bank to subscribe to the stock of a joint stock company is valid. Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh 120.

May Accept Devise or Bequest of Its Own Stock.—A corporation has the power to accept a devise or bequest of its own stock whether such is declared by its charter to be realty or personalty. Rivanna Nav. Co. v. Dawsons, 3 Gratt. 19.

Power to Accept Bequests.—Corporations have the legal capacity to take charitable bequests, when, and to the extent, authorized by their charters. Wilson v. Perry, 29 W. Va. 169, 1 S. E. Rep. 302; University v. Tucker, 31 W. Va. 621, 8 S. E. Rep. 410; Roy v. Rowzie, 25 Gratt. 599.

Parol Evidence Admissible to Show Identity of Corporation.—Roy v. Rowzie, 25 Gratt. 599; Wilson v. Perry, 29 W. Va. 169, 1 S. E. Rep 302.

Corporation May Act as Trustee.—The old rule that a corporation could not be a trustee has been long rejected and now the well-established doctrine is that corporations of every description may take and hold estates as trustees for purposes not foreign to the objects of their creation and existence and they may be compelled by the courts to carry the trusts into execution. Prot. Epis. Ed. Soc. v. Churchman's Reps., 80 Va. 718.

Power to Form a Partnership with a Natural Person.—The authorities are conflicting as to whether a corporation can form a partnership with an individual; but it is believed that the weight of authority is against such power. A dictum in Wilson v. Carter Oil Co., 46 W. Va. 469, 33 S. E. Rep. 249.

Where a corporation and an individual have assumed to enter into a partnership, and jointly transacted business together, they may recover, by reason of their joint interest, upon obligations made to them in their partnership name, irrespective of their partnership rights and duties as between themselves, or the power of such corporation to execute the powers incident to a partnership. Wilson v. Carter Oil Co., 46 W. Va. 469, 33 S. E. Rep. 249.

Power to Borrow Money.—A private manufacturing company may borrow money to carry on its operations. Burr v. McDonald, 3 Gratt. 215; Pyles v. Riverside Furniture Co., 30 W. Va. 123, 2 S. E. Rep. 909.

Certification of Mortgage Bonds by Trustee.—Where certain first mortgage bonds have been deposited as security for general mortgage bonds, it is not necessary for them to be certified by the trustee, and if it were, it is such a power coupled with a trust that a court of equity will compel its execution. Atwood v. R. Co., 85 Va. 966, 9 S. E. Rep. 748.

Power to Make an Assignment for the Benefit of Creditors.—A corporation has the power to make a deed of assignment to trustees for the benefit of creditors. Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 6 S. E. Rep. 866; Planters' Bank v. Whittle, 78 Va. 737; Burr v. McDonald, 3 Gratt. 215; Lamb v. Cecil, 25 W. Va. 288.

ently of the Act of Feb. 1866. Farmers' Bank v. Willis, 7 W. Va. 31.

Manner of Making Assignment.—A corporation may execute a deed of assignment by any agent duly authorized and a deed prepared according to the directions of the corporation and approved by the company in general meeting is valid. Burr v. McDonald, 3 Gratt. 215.

Passes Unpaid Subscriptions—Construction.—A deed of assignment to trustees for the benefit of creditors, of all the property of a corporation, passes all unpaid subscriptions to the trustee, with the right to collect the same, when a call has been duly made, by suit in his own name, as well under the statute, Code 1873, ch. 141, sec. 17, as in the exercise of the original powers of a court of equity. Such a deed is to be construed by the law of the domicil of the corporation. Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 6 S. E. Rep. 866.

Effect of Sale under Deed of Trust.—In Wash. Alex. & Georg. R. Co. v. Alex. & Wash. R. Co., 19 Gratt. 624, DORMAN, J., was of opinion that ch. 61, §§ 28, 29, Code Va. 1860, providing that a sale under a deed of trust or mortgage of a corporation's property, passed subsequently acquired property as well, that the corporation was ipso facto dissolved and the purchaser became a corporation, did not apply to the sale by a trustee of a mere equity, conveying no legal title. See Code Va. 1887, §§ 1233, 1234, 1236; Acts 1891-2, p. 623.

Power to Create Preferences.

In Virginia.—A deed by a private manufacturing corporation incorporated in 1833, in trust to pay its debts, which gives preferences in favor of some of its stockholders who had been sureties for the corporation, was valid, the Act of Feb. 13, 1837, Sess. Acts, ch. 84, § 17, prohibiting such preferences by mining and manufacturing corporations not applying. Burr v. McDonald, 3 Gratt. 215.

Prior to the act of 1837 there was no law prohibiting preferences by any insolvent private corporation. Pyles v. Riverside Furn. Co., 30 W. Va. 123, 2 S. E. Rep. 909. See also, Planters' Bank v. Whittle, 78 Va. 737. For present statute, see Code Va. 1887, § 1149.

In West Virginia.—The law in West Virginia was the same as in Virginia until 1863, when the provisions of the Act of 1837 were omitted from a general reenactment of the law governing corporations, so that trust deeds preferring creditors executed in 1882, 1883 and 1884 were valid, since there was nothing, at that time, in the policy of the West Virginia statutes, against such preferences. Pyles v. Riverside Furn. Co., 30 W. Va. 123, 2 S. E. Rep. 909. But in Hulings v. Hulings Lumber Co., 38 W. Va. 351, 18 S. E. Rep. 621, the court said that the policy of the West Virginia statutes was changed adversely to such preferences by ch. 74, sec. 2, Code W. Va.

Now Enure Ratably to the Benefit of All Existing Creditors.—A deed of trust executed by a corporation, if not executed to secure a debt contracted, or money borrowed at the time of the creation of the lien, will enure ratably to all the creditors existing at the time of the creation of the lien. Code Va. 1873, ch. 57, § 63; Code Va. 1887, § 1149; Clinch River Veneer Co. v. Kurth, 90 Va. 737, 19 S. E. Rep. 878; Haskin Wood-Vulcanizing Co. v. Cleveland Ship Building Co., 94 Va. 439, 26 S. E. Rep. 878, 3 Va. Law Reg. 108, and note; Hardy v. Mfg. Co., 80 Va. 404.

A Confession of Judgment is a Voluntary Preference within the Statute.—A confession of judgment by a corporation chartered by a court, for an antecedent debt, is such an illegal voluntary preference as comes within the purview of sec. 1149, Code Va. 1887; hence will enure ratably to the benefit of all creditors whose debts existed at the time. RIELY, J., saying obiter that such a corporation might suffer a judgment, where it had no defense. Tate v. Building Ass'n, 97 Va. 74, 33 S. E. Rep. 382.

Statute Applies to the Creation of a Lien, Not to the Payment of Indebtedness.—An assignment of bonds of a corporation at their face value in discharge of the company's indebtedness and not as security for the indebtedness of the company is not the creation of a lien so as to come within the language of the statute providing that "Any lien or incumbrance created by any company on its works or property for the purpose of giving a preference to one or more creditors of the company over any other creditor or creditors, except to secure a debt contracted or money borrowed at the time of the creation of the lien or encumbrance shall enure ratably to the benefit of all the creditors of the company." Code Va. 1873, ch. 57, § 63; Code Va. 1887, § 1149; Planters' Bank v. Whittle, 78 Va. 737.

Priority of Lien to Those Furnishing Supplies, etc.—Sections 2485, 2486, providing that employees and persons furnishing supplies to railroads, mining and manufacturing companies shall have liens superior to mortgages, deeds of trust, etc., executed since March 21, 1877, is not in conflict with the 14th amendment to the United States Constitution, as being special and class legislation, and pig iron furnished to a rolling mill is included among such "supplies." The supply liens are given precedence over all mortgages, etc., executed since March 21, 1887, not merely over those executed between that date and May 1, 1888. Va. Devel. Co. v. Crozer Iron Co., 90 Va. 126, 17 S. E. Rep. 806.

The Capital Stock a Trust Fund for the Benefit of Creditors.—The capital stock of a corporation is a trust fund for the benefit of creditors; for the same reason, the entire assets are also, and the directors are the trustees for the creditors of the corporation. Lamb v. Laughlin, 25 W. Va. 800; Lamb v. Pannell, 28 W. Va. 603; Sweeney v. Refining Co., 30 W. Va. 443, 4 S. E. Rep. 431; Newcomb v. Brooks, 16 W. Va. 63; Hardy v. Manufacturing Co., 80 Va. 404.

Especially, the Unpaid Subscriptions.—"Corporate property and assets, especially the unpaid subscriptions, constitute a trust fund, specially set apart for the payment of corporate debts, upon the faith of which those debts were contracted, and it will be pursued and subjected to the satisfaction of the corporate liabilities. When, as in this case, a joint stock company makes an assignment for the benefit of its creditors, all the property and assets of the company, embraced in the deed, pass thereby to the trustees for the purposes of the trust, as provided by the instrument; and the effect of the assignment is to divest the company of the right to collect and apply such assets, and to vest that authority in the trustees. Though the company does not, and cannot, assign its right of franchise to make the calls necessary to enable the trustees to pay off the debts, and it remains its duty to make such call, yet if it neglects or stubbornly refuses to discharge that duty, and a court of equity is called on to administer the trust, and it appears that the trustees named in the deed have proved inefficient, or are not, for reasons satisfactory to the court, the proper persons to execute the trust, such court will remove them and appoint another or others in their place, and confer upon the trustee or trustees substituted, all the powers and authority necessary to the prompt and faithful execution of the trust; which authority is not only conferred upon the court by our statute, but is necessarily incident to the exercise of its ordinary powers touching the administration of trusts. In short, the application of these principles exemplifies the fact that corporations, as well as natural persons, must pay their debts." Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 981, 6 S. E. Rep. 866.

G. EMINENT DOMAIN.—See monographic note on "Eminent Domain."

May Be Delegated to Private Corporations.—The right of eminent domain appertains to every independent government, and may be delegated to private corporations, to be exercised by them in the execution of works, in which the public is interested. B. & O. R. Co. v. P. W. & K. R. Co., 17 W. Va. 841; W. Va. Trans. Co. v. Vol. O. & C. Co., 5 W. Va. 382.

Must Condemn the Fee Simple.—Corporations except a turnpike company condemning land under Code Va. 1873, ch. 56, sec. 11, Code Va. 1887, § 1079, must take and pay for the fee simple and not merely an easement, and such provision is not unconstitutional. Roanoke v. Berkowitz, 80 Va. 616.

Corporation Must Pay Money into Court, Where the Title is Disputed.—A corporation can only acquire a clear title to land condemned for its purposes by paying the damages into court, so that parties in interest may be convened before the court. Robinson v. Crenshaw, 84 Va. 348, 5 S. E. Rep. 222.

Telegraph and Telephone Poles an Additional Servitude.—Placing of poles on a public highway constitutes an additional servitude, and the act Feb. 10, 1880, Code Va. 1887, §§ 1287-1290 authorizing telegraph and telephone companies to erect their poles along the public roads, etc., does not authorize them to do so without compensating the owners of the fee, since the public have only the easement of right of way and such taking without compensation would violate the constitutional prohibition against taking private property without compensation. W. U. Tel. Co. v. Williams, 86 Va. 696, 11 S. E. Rep. 106.

Property of a Corporation Equally Subject to the Right of Eminent Domain.—The property of a corporation is as much subject to the right of eminent domain as that of a natural person, whether consisting of the land itself or a mere right of way and if the charter of a railroad company authorizes it to cross the right of way of a canal company, it may do so provided they do not obstruct the traffic of the canal, on payment of a just compensation, condemning the land as the property of the canal company if they own it; but if they have only a right of way, condemning it as the property of the original owner subject to the right of way of the canal company. Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe R. Co., 11 Leigh 43.

There is nothing so sacred in the title of a railroad company to property, that it cannot be taken under the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Property belonging to a railroad company and not in actual use necessary to the proper exercise of the franchise thereof may be taken for the purposes of another railroad under the general railroad law of the state. An express legislative enactment is generally required in order to take such property in use by a railroad company, except where the proposed appropriation would not destroy or greatly injure the franchise of the company, or render it difficult to prosecute the object thereof. B. & O. R. R. Co. v. P. W. & Ky. R. R. Co., 17 W. Va. 812, 852.

H. LIABILITY OF CORPORATIONS.

Civilly.

Corporations Liable Civilly for the Torts of Their Agents, Committed within the Scope of Their Employment.—It was at first doubted whether a corporation was in any case liable in a civil suit for the torts of its agents, especially whether an action of trespass would lie against a corporation. But modern authorities all agree, that corporations are liable for torts committed by their agents in the discharge of the business of their employment and within the proper range of such employment and that too whether the tort be one, the responsibility for which is to be enforced by an action on the case or by trespass. State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362; Norfolk v. West. R. Co. v. Neely, 91 Va. 539, 22 S. E. Rep. 367.

Lease or Mortgage Works No Exemption.—A corporation cannot exempt itself from liability by leasing its property and the use of its franchises to another, without the authority of the legislature. Ricketts v. Railroad, 33 W. Va. 433, 10 S. E. Rep. 801, 25 Am. St. Rep. 901.

Nor does a voluntary conveyance by deed of trust of its property and franchises, without the authority of the legislature, work such an exemption. Naglee v. Railroad Co., 83 Va. 707, 3 S. E. Rep. 369.

Even When Torts Are Wilful and Malicious.—Although there has long been doubt on the question, and there is still conflict, the better opinion now is that a corporation is liable not only for the unintentional torts of its agents when done within the scope of their employment, but also for their wilful or malicious torts under the same circumstances. State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

Liability for Punitive Damages.—In West Virginia, a corporation is not liable to punitive damages even for the wanton and malicious acts of its agents, in the absence of evidence tending to show that his conduct was either authorized or approved by the corporation or that the agent was incompetent or of known bad character. Ricketts v. Ches., etc., R. Co., 33 W. Va. 433, 10 S. E. Rep. 801, 25 Am. St. Rep. 901. See also, dictum in Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Lipscomb, 90 Va. 137, 17 S. E. Rep. 809. This question has never arisen directly in Virginia, but in Norfolk & West. R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Va. 1, 17 S. E. Rep. 737, the corporation was held liable for punitive damages, but on the ground that the corporation subsequently ratified the act of its agent.

Unintentional Tort of Agent.—But where the unlawful act of the agent is not wilful or malicious but the result of a mistake, punitive damages cannot be exacted from the corporation. Norfolk & West. R. Co. v. Lipscomb, 90 Va. 137, 17 S. E. 809.

When Not Liable for Non-Feasance.—A corporation chartered for the improvement of a river and authorized to charge tolls thereon, if it has not charged tolls, is not liable for damages resulting from failure to improve the river. James River & Kanawha Co. v. Early, 13 Gratt. 541.

Criminally.

In Virginia Cannot Be Indicted by Its Corporate Name.—A corporation such as the President, Directors and Company of Swift Run Gap Turnpike Co. cannot be impleaded criminaliter by its artificial name for committing a nuisance in obstructing a common public highway by digging it up and placing stone in it. Com. v. President, etc., of S. R. G. Turnpike Co., 2 Va. Cas. 362.

In West Virginia Corporation Liable Criminally for the Acts of Misfeasance as Well as Non-Feasance.—

Digitized by Google

Although formerly a matter of doubt, it may now be regarded as settled that a corporation may be indicted for a failure to perform certain public duties which the law or its charter has imposed upon them. A distinction was formerly made between acts of non-feasance, or failure to perform such duties, and acts of misfeasance by the agents of a corporation, in the former the corporation was held liable, in the latter, some courts held it not to be so; but this distinction is no longer recognized by the weight of authority. GREEN, P., in State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

Where Evil Intention Constitutes an Element of the Offence.—"In view of the fact that since these decisions have been rendered, the courts have shown a tendency to extend the liability of corporations in civil actions for the misfeasance of their agents, and as it seems now well settled that they may be held liable in suits for libel, and perhaps malicious prosecution, and for assaults and batteries committed by their agents in the performance of their duties, and in view of the further fact that they may in such suits, it is said, be subjected to exemplary or punitive damages, I hesitate to accede to the statement that they cannot be held liable to an indictment for any offences which derive their criminality from evil intention. The very basis of an action of libel, or for a malicious prosecution, is the evil intent, the malice of the party against whom such a suit is brought; and I cannot now well see how it is possible to hold that a corporation may be sued for a libel, and punitive damages recovered, and at the same time hold that such corporation could not be indicted for such libel. The suits of libel and malicious prosecution are in their nature very like to criminal proceedings; and if they lie against a corporation, it would seem to follow, that there are cases for which indictments may lie against a corporation where the evil intention constitutes an element in the offence. And if a corporation is, as has been said, liable civilly for an assault and battery committed through its servants, it is perhaps going too far to say that a corporation can in no case be liable criminally for any offence against the person under any circumstances." GREEN, P., in State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

May Be Indicted for a Nuisance.—If a railroad company, under authority from a county court giving it license to build its road upon, along, or across public highways upon the express condition that it shall restore such highways to their former state, or to such state, as not unnecessarily to have impaired their usefulness, takes possession of a part of a public highway and constructs its road upon it, but fails to restore the highway to such state as is required by law, it is guilty of maintaining a nuisance, and may be indicted under section 45, ch. 43, of the Code, notwithstanding it has such authority from the county court. State v. Monongahela R. R. Co., 37 W. Va. 108, 16 S. E. Rep. 519.

Liable for Contempt.—A corporation is liable to a fine for a contempt, by motion. B. & O. R. Co. v. Wheeling, 13 Gratt. 40.

May Be Indicted for "Sabbath Breaking."—A corporation may be indicted for "Sabbath breaking" under Code W. Va., ch. 149, §§ 16 and 17: State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

Proof Necessary in Indictment.—"But while in a civil suit for a tort, even when done wilfully, perhaps no other proof may be necessary in any case than that the act was done by its agents, yet to hold such proof sufficient to sustain an indictment against a corporation for the misfeasance of its agents in every case would be to disregard the maxim, that the accused is always presumed to be innocent: and clear proof of guilt on the part of the accused must be produced, before a conviction can properly be had. The act of misfeasance may, in a particular case, be of such a character, that though done by an authorized agent within the scope of his general employment and for the benefit of the corporation, yet it may give rise to but a suspicion that it has been directed or approved by the corporation. And if the act be of such character, independent proof must in such case be produced of the approval of the corporation, before it can be found guilty in a criminal proceeding. In such case it would clearly not be necessary to prove that the corporation by a distinct act, such as a vote of its directors, either directed the act to be done or subsequently approved of its being done. For if this was required, it would amount to an absolute exemption of a corporation from all liability criminally for the wrongs of its agents: for criminal acts are never so formally directed or approved. Still in such a case the approval of the corporation must be satisfactorily proven, but such approval may be shown satisfactorily otherwise than by proving such direct act of approval. The criminal act being in such a case done by an authorized agent acting within the scope of his authority, the mere doing of the act, even though done wilfully, sufficiently shows, we incline to think, the assent and approval of the corporation, to make them liable in a civil suit; and it gives rise to a suspicion in a criminal proceeding against the corporation, which, if corroborated by evidence that similar acts have been done by the agents of the corporation repeatedly, would be sufficient proof of their approval to justify a conviction. It is but a reasonable inference that acts which are habitually done by the authorized agents of a corporation are done with their approval; and this is indeed almost the only manner in which the approval by the corporation of the acts of its agents can ever be proven. The tacit appropriation by a corporation of the benefits of the acts of its agents, repeatedly occurring, is full and satisfactory proof of the assent of the corporation to the doing of such acts." GREEN, P., in State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

Liability of a Quasi-Public Corporation.—A corporation is liable to be sued in assumpsit under the authority of its charter for work done and materials furnished even though the governor and other officers are members, as mere trustees for the state, having no personal interest in it, and the object of the corporation is to effect a public improvement at the public expense. The court distinguished this case from that of Sayre v. Turnpike Co., 10 Leigh 454, holding that case only authority for the proposition that a quasi-public corporation like the above is not liable for a remote and consequential injury. Dunnington v. Pres., etc., Turnpike Road, 6 Gratt. 160.

until a valid call has been made. Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 6 S. E. Rep. 866.

Character of Subscription a Question for the Jury.—Whether the contract of defendant was a contract to take stock in an existing corporation or merely an agreement to subscribe to a corporation to be subsequently formed, is a question for the jury. Exposition v. Ocheltree, 44 W. Va. 626, 30 S. E. Rep. 78.

Ratification of Subscription Contract.—A stockholder who votes in a corporate meeting and pays an assessment on his stock, is estopped to deny the existence of the corporation when sued on his subscription; and though the capital stock be reduced after his subscription, by voting he acknowledges himself a shareholder and is presumed to consent to such change, being bound with notice of it as a shareholder. Greenbrier Ind. Exp. v. Squires, 40 W. Va. 307, 21 S. E. Rep. 1015.

Proof of Subscription.

Name on Book of Corporation.—Where the name of an individual appears upon the stock book of a corporation as a stockholder, the presumption is that he is the owner of the stock appearing in his name; and such book is proper evidence to go to the jury to show that he was a subscriber to the capital stock of such corporation. South Branch Ry. Co. v. Long, 43 W. Va. 131, 27 S. E. Rep. 297. See also, Exposition v. Ocheltree, 44 W. Va. 626, 30 S. E. Rep. 78; Grays v. Turnpike Co., 4 Rand. 578.

A Certificate Not Necessary.—The certificate is merely evidence, but not the only evidence of ownership of stock. He is a stockholder, who has subscribed and paid for shares of stock in a corporation. Crumlish v. Shen. Val. R. Co., 40 W. Va. 627, 22 S. E. Rep. 90.

Must Be in Subscriber's Handwriting.—The fact that defendants' names appear on the books of the company, if not in their handwriting, is no proof of a written contract to take stock and the statute of limitation to the suit on a verbal contract is a good defence, after the lapse of three years. Savings Bank v. Land Co., 96 Va. 352, 31 S. E. Rep. 511.

Failure to Make Required Cash Payment No Defence.—A subscriber to stock in a corporation cannot escape his liability to pay his subscription on the ground that he did not make the required cash payment at the time he subscribed. P. W. & K. R. Co. v. Applegate, 21 W. Va. 172.

Subscription Contract Not Avoided to Injury of Creditors by Fact That a Lottery Constituted the Inducement.—In a suit by the receiver of a court to collect an assessment on unpaid subscriptions to an insolvent corporation, for the benefit of creditors, who credited the corporation on the faith of such subscriptions, without knowledge of their vice, such subscriptions being lawful on their face, shareholders will not be allowed to set up the defence that the inducement to said subscriptions was the distribution by lot of lots of unequal value. Cardwell v. Kelley, 95 Va. 570, 28 S. E. Rep. 953.

Subscriptions Need Not Necessarily Be in Cash.—Subscriptions to stock in a corporation need not, in the absence of statutory provisions requiring it, be paid in cash, but any property which the corporation is authorized to purchase, or which is necessary for the purpose of its legitimate business may be received in payment. Richardson v. Graham, 45 W. Va. 134, 30 S. E. Rep. 92.

Act Transferring Suits to Enforce Stock Subscriptions from Courts of Equity to Courts of Law, Constitutional.—The Act of Dec. 22, 1897, giving courts of law jurisdiction of all suits for the recovery of unpaid stock subscriptions, is not unconstitutional as taking away a vested right to a remedy in equity, and it cannot be claimed that equity still has jurisdiction of such suits on the ground that the remedy at law is inadequate. Shickell v. Improvement Co. (Va.), 37 S. E. Rep. 813.

Evidence of Insolvency in Making Assessments.—A return of "no effects" on an execution against shareholders in a suit to collect an assessment, is prima facie evidence of their insolvency, and a further assessment may be laid on such as have paid the first, without inquiring as to what real estate or other property is owned by the delinquent stockholder, since that would unduly delay creditors in obtaining their debts. Martin v. Salem Land Co., 97 Va. 349, 33 S. E. Rep. 600.

Sale of Stock May Be Delayed until Default in Payment of All the Installments.—Internal improvement companies, which have the right to sell the stock of shareholders for delinquencies in the payment of installments called for by them, are not obliged to sell at the first failure to pay an installment, but may wait until delinquencies have occurred on them all, and may sell the stock, and hold the stockholder liable for the amount of any loss that may result to the company, with interest on the installments from the time they severally fell due. Brockenbrough v. James River, etc., Co., 1 Pat. & H. 94.

Statutory Remedy Merely Cumulative.—The remedy given by statute to make sale and transfer of the shares of a defaulting stockholder is simply cumulative and does not deprive the corporation of its right of action or relieve the stockholder from his obligation of payment. Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 6 S. E. Rep. 866; Grays v. Turnpike Co., 4 Rand. 578.

Distinction between Guaranteed and Preferred Stock.—Where a contract calls for the payment of eight per cent. preferred stock by a corporation at its par value, it is error to decree the payment of that amount of guaranteed stock in lieu thereof since the corporation was not required to guarantee the payment of the eight per cent. Dickinson v. Ches., etc., R. Co., 7 W. Va. 390.

Liability of Vendor of Stock.—Where buyer and seller of stock in a joint stock company have both regarded and treated the stock as paid up and non-assessable, the seller is liable to the buyer for future assessments lawfully made on the stock, although the contract of sale stipulates that he is to be relieved from all liability as endorser or otherwise, for the debts of the company. Such assessment is not a debt or liability for the company, but a debt or liability of the stockholder to the company. Stuart v. Peyton, 97 Va. 796, 34 S. E. Rep. 696.

Measure of Damages for Failure to Deliver Stock.—Where defendant sold plaintiffs certain shares of stock at a certain price, but the company denied that defendant owned any shares, if the plaintiff sues without unreasonable delay, he is entitled to recover the highest price of the stock in market at any time after demand and refusal. Gray v. Kemp, 88 Va. 201, 16 S. E. Rep. 225.

B. LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS.

No Liability on Stockholder at Common Law beyond His Subscription.—It is a well-settled rule of the common law, that in the absence of any constitutional provision or statute law to the contrary there is no liability upon the stockholders of a corporation to pay its debts or liabilities beyond his subscription. Nimick v. Iron Works, 25 W. Va. 184.

Digitized by Google

Nature of Common-Law Liability.—"The liability of the stockholder, to the extent of his liability under the charter, is not simply as such, but it is a personal liability as surety for the company. It is virtually and in effect a liability upon a contract, and the mutual agreement of the parties; not indeed, in form an express personal contract, but an agreement of equally binding obligation, consequent upon and resulting from the acts and admissions or implied assent of the parties." LACY, J., in Hardy v. M'f'g Co., 80 Va. 404.

Payment by a Stockholder Extinguishes a Debt of the Corporation.—Where a stockholder satisfies a lien on property of the corporation and takes an assignment of the lien to himself, such lien is extinguished and the stockholder cannot revive it by an assignment to a third party. Hardy v. Norfolk M'f'g Co., 80 Va. 404.

Statutes Imposing Further Liability to Be Strictly Construed.—All such constitutional or statutory provisions which impose a personal liability upon the stockholders for the payment of the corporate debts are to be strictly construed. Nimick v. Iron Co., 25 W. Va. 184.

Enforced by Bill in Equity—Proper Parties.—Such liability must be enforced by a bill in equity to which the corporation, the stockholders and creditors are necessary parties, since the liability of the stockholders is not primary, but secondary, and conditional on the insufficiency of the corporate assets and cannot be determined without ascertaining who are the solvent stockholders, the amount of stock held by each, the amount of all debts due by the corporation to its several creditors, and the amount of the available corporate assets. Nimick v. Iron Co., 25 W. Va. 184. See Crumlish v. Railroad, 28 W. Va. 623.

Enforced in Courts of State Imposing It—Changed by Statute in West Virginia.—Such liability must be enforced in the courts of the state imposing it and through the remedy provided by the laws of that state, WOODS, J., saying: "Dwelling in the place of its creation, all contracts made with the corporation must, by legal intendment, be made subject to the laws of its creation, and all persons contracting with it must be presumed to contract with reference to the remedies provided them by the state creating the corporation, and if these remedies are not as convenient and efficient as they might possibly have been made, they can have no rightful claim by law or comity to supplement such inefficient remedies by invoking the aid of the courts of a foreign state. They have contracted with reference to the advantages afforded them by the laws of the state under which the corporation was created, and no injustice is done them when they are obliged to be content with the remedies which the laws of the same state afford for the protection of their property and the enforcement of the rights thereby granted to them." Nimick v. Iron Works, 25 W. Va. 184.

The doctrine of this case has been superseded by §§ 58, 59, ch. 53, Code W. Va. which gives the circuit courts jurisdiction of such suit. Swing v. Furniture Co., 45 W. Va. 283, 31 S. E. Rep. 925; Swing v. Veneer & Panel Co., 45 W. Va. 288, 31 S. E. Rep. 926.

C. RIGHT OF STOCKHOLDERS TO SUE OR DEFEND ON BEHALF OF CORPORATION.

When Corporation Is a Going Concern.—Stockholders cannot sue in behalf of a corporation in a court of law; but in a court of equity the rule is different. There, though redress should be obtained if possible through its regularly appointed agents, if it is shown that the directors or managing officers have refused to act and redress has been vainly sought within the corporation, a bill by the stockholders themselves will be entertained. Crumlish v. R. Co., 28 W. Va. 623; Moore v. Schoppert, 22 W. Va. 290.

In order to entitle a stockholder to institute and maintain a suit in equity to redress a corporate injury committed infra vires, against a solvent corporation in the full exercise of its franchises, and carrying on its corporate business, it must appear not only that the directors are either disabled by their misconduct to sue, or that they have wrongfully refused to do so upon a proper demand; but where the matter will admit of the necessary delay, and it is practicable to call upon the stockholders to act, this must also be done. Until it is shown that every reasonable effort to obtain redress through the regularly constituted agents and controlling power of the corporation has proved unavailing, a stockholder cannot sue in his own name alone, nor on behalf of himself and other stockholders. Nor do sections 57 and 58, ch. 53, Code W. Va. have any application to such a suit. Rathbone v. Parkersburg Gas Co., 31 W. Va. 798, 8 S. E. Rep. 570.

What Allegations Are Insufficient.—Where the bill does not allege that the corporation is either insolvent or has abandoned its corporate business, or that any of its officers have done any act ultra vires, but merely that the president and manager of the company's business has abused his trust and that a majority of the directors and stockholders are under his influence and refuse to remove him, alleging that the said directors and stockholders are near kinsmen of said president; that some of them reside at a distance and permit him to select their proxies, that they refused to permit a committee appointed to investigate the books of the company to employ an expert to assist them, that, at a meeting for the election of a board of directors, some of them withdrew and broke up the meeting and that they afterwards gave notice for a meeting to elect five directors, ignoring the fact that three directors had been elected at the former meeting; such facts, taken singly or all together do not of themselves necessarily establish that the directors and stockholders have acted either fraudulently or in wilful disregard of their duties or that they have manifestly abused the discretionary power vested in them or that a majority of them have by their misconduct disabled themselves to act or that they have been legally called upon to act and refused to do so, so as to entitle stockholders to file a bill in their own name. Rathbone v. Gas Co., 31 W. Va. 798, 8 S. E. Rep. 570.

Right of Stockholders to Defend a Suit against Corporation.—A corporation must defend a suit brought against it, in its corporate name, and a stockholder will not be permitted to defend, and his answer will be stricken out. But if the officers and agents of the corporation refuse to defend the suit, in its name the court may in equity allow such defence to be made by the stockholders. Park v. Oil Co., 26 W. Va. 486.

A stockholder of a corporation cannot be regarded as answering for the corporation itself. In a special case, however, where there is an allegation that the directors fraudulently refused to attend to the interest of the corporation, a court of equity will, in its discretion, allow a stockholder to become a party defendant, for the purpose of protecting, from unfounded and illegal claims against the company, his own interest and the interest of such other stockholders as choose to join him in the defence. Kanawha Coal Co. v. Ballard & Welch Coal Co., 43 W. Va. 721, 29 S. E. Rep. 514.

When Corporation Has Ceased Business.—When, however, it is shown that the corporation has ceased to exist either in law or in fact or that it has abandoned its corporate business and neglected to maintain its corporate existence by the election of officers, nothing more can be required of the stockholder or creditor in order to entitle him to sue for the protection of his rights in such corporation, than that he should show the condition of such corporation and its management. Crumlish v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 623; Finney v. Bennett, 27 Gratt. 365; Code W. Va. ch. 53, § 58.

When Corporation Not Even a Necessary Party.—And when such a suit is brought by the stockholders of a foreign corporation to compel a domestic corporation to account for certain assets of the said foreign corporation in its possession, the domestic courts have jurisdiction and the foreign corporation is not even a necessary party. The court distinguished this case from that of Nimick v. Iron Works, 25 W. Va. 184, where the object was to enforce a statutory liability imposed by the state of Ohio, on stockholders of an Ohio corporation resident in West Virginia. The court held that such liability being conditional on failure of assets could not be enforced by the West Virginia courts, since they had not jurisdiction over the Ohio corporation, to determine the amount of its assets. But in the principal case the liability of the domestic corporation is absolute and unconditional. Crumlish v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 623.

Multifariousness of Bill.—A bill filed by a stockholder of a dissolved corporation in his own behalf and that of other stockholders against a domestic corporation, primarily to compel it to hand over assets of the dissolved corporation in its hands and, secondarily, to ask that the creditors of the dissolved corporation may be convened and the assets distributed among its creditors and shareholders, is not open to the objection of multifariousness. Crumlish v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 623.

Barred by Laches.—While a minority of the stockholders of a corporation may maintain a bill in equity, in behalf of themselves and other stockholders, for fraud, conspiracy, or ultra vires acts, against a corporation, its officers, or others who participated therein, when the minority stockholders have been injured by said act, they must act promptly, and not wait an unreasonable time. If they postpone their complaint for an unreasonable time, they forfeit their right to equitable relief. Boyce v. Montauk Gas Coal Co., 37 W. Va. 73, 16 S. E. Rep. 501.

Where a stockholder has notice or the means at hand of becoming acquainted with the contracts made by the corporation in which he is a stockholder, a court of equity will not allow him to remain quiet an unreasonable length of time, with a view of ascertaining whether the contract will result in profit to him, and then repudiate the contract if it has resulted in loss. Boyce v. Montauk Gas Coal Co., 37 W. Va. 73, 16 S. E. Rep. 501.

Acquiescence by Failure to Attend Meetings.—And if the minority of stockholders fail to attend meetings, they will be held to acquiesce in whatever is done by the majority, and are barred of relief in equity. Boyce v. Montauk Gas Coal Co., 37 W. Va. 73, 16 S. E. Rep. 501.

Parties to the Suit.—Where, in a suit in equity by a shareholder to protect his equitable interest in the affairs of a corporation, all the parties in interest, stockholders, directors and president are before the court, it is unnecessary to make the corporation a formal party. Kyle v. Wagner, 45 W. Va. 349, 32 S. E. Rep. 213.

D. DIVIDENDS.—The board of directors may from time to time declare dividends of so much of the net profits as they may deem it prudent to divide. If any stockholder be indebted to the corporation, his dividend, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be applied to the payment of the debt; if the same be then due and payable. Code W. Va. 1891, ch. 53, § 39; Donnally v. Hearndon, 41 W. Va. 519, 23 S. E. Rep. 646.

Stock Dividends.—A stock dividend is not in the ordinary sense of the word, a dividend, the latter being the distribution of profits to stockholders as income from their investment. A stock dividend is merely an increase in the number of shares, the increased number representing exactly the same property that was represented by the smaller number of shares. Hence where two parties agree to exchange shares in two corporations, retaining the dividends declared for a certain month, and one corporation declares a stock dividend, such dividend goes with the stock and cannot be retained as a true dividend. Kaufman v. Woolen Mills, 93 Va. 673, 25 S. E. Rep. 1003, 2 Va. Law Reg. 669, and note.

E. CORPORATE MEETINGS.—Where by the charter a general meeting of the company is to be held at least once annually, other meetings may be held as often as the interests of the corporation require it. Burr v. McDonald, 3 Gratt. 215.

All Members Must Have Reasonable Notice of Meetings.—No function existing in a number of persons, such as the stockholders of a corporation, can be rightfully exercised in the absence of any of the members composing such body, unless they have had reasonable notice and an opportunity to be present, otherwise all proceedings had at such a meeting are invalid. Reilly v. Oglebay, 25 W. Va. 36.

V. OFFICERS AND AGENTS OF PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.

See monographic note on "Officers and Agents of Private Corporations" appended to Richmond Enquirer Co. v. Robinson, 24 Gratt. 548; also, note on "Agencies" appended to Silliman v. Fred., etc., R. Co., 27 Gratt. 119.

A. GENERALLY.

Contracts between Corporation and its Officers Not Void but Voidable.—Contracts between a corporation and its officers are not void per se, but merely voidable at the option of the corporation or its receiver within a reasonable time. Such reasonable time as applied to executory contracts would be before they become executed. A partly executed contract can be avoided before its final execution, but the executing party must be placed in statu quo, in the absence of fraud or mala fides. Griffith v. Lumber Co., 46 W. Va. 56, 33 S. E. Rep. 125.

Ratification of Agent's Contract.—Whether a contract by an agent of a corporation be beyond his authority or not, the corporation may ratify, and such ratification, once made, is final. Newport News, etc., Devel. Co. v. Newport News St. Ry. Co., 97 Va. 19, 32 S. E. Rep. 789.

Negligence of Officer Imputed to Corporation.—The negligence of an officer of a corporation in allowing a judgment to be rendered against the corporation as garnishee, when the debt had been previously assigned to another party and notice thereof had been given to another officer, will preclude the corporation from relief in equity against the judgment. Richmond Enquirer v. Robinson, 24 Gratt. 548.

Misconduct of Officers.—It may be stated as a general rule that there is no wrong or fraud, which the directors or officers and agents of a corporation may commit that cannot be redressed by appropriate and adequate remedies. From the fiduciary relation which the director of a corporation holds to the corporation itself and to its shareholders and creditors, and from the fact that they are held to strict good faith in the management of the corporate concerns, it follows that they are liable either to the corporation, or, in a proper case, to the shareholders or creditors, for a fraudulent breach of trust or misappropriation of corporate funds, whereby a loss or injury results to the corporate assets. Rathbone v. Gas Co., 31 W. Va. 798, 8 S. E. Rep. 570.

The Promoters.

Occupy a Fiduciary Relation.—The promoters of a corporation stand in a fiduciary relation to the corporation, and cannot make a profit out of their transactions in behalf of the corporation, unless with the full knowledge and consent of the corporation. Central Land Co. v. Obenchain, 92 Va. 130, 23 S. E. Rep. 876.

Promoters Entitled to a Fair and Open Profit.—Where a promoter of a corporation holds an option on land and in soliciting subscriptions, proposes in writing, which is shown to each subscriber, a certain price at which he will sell it to the corporation, and after the corporation was organized, it agreed to purchase on those terms, such promoter is entitled to any profit arising from such sale. Richardson v. Graham, 45 W. Va. 134, 30 S. E. Rep. 92.

B. PARTICULAR OFFICERS.

The Directors.

The Representatives of the Corporation.—The directors of a corporation are, as to all purposes of dealing with others, the corporation itself and when convened as a board they are the primary possessors of all the powers possessed by the corporation. What they do as the representatives of the corporation, the corporation itself is deemed to do. Hulings v. Hulings Lumber Co., 38 W. Va. 351, 18 S. E. Rep. 620.

Until the appointment of a receiver and the awarding of the injunction the management of the affairs of the company remains in the hands of the directors. Planters' Bank v. Whittle, 78 Va. 737.

Must Act as a Body.—The directors of a corporation cannot separately and individually give consent to, or make a contract to bind the corporation. They can act only as a board, their power being not joint and several, but joint. Limer v. Traders' Co., 44 W. Va. 175, 28 S. E. Rep. 730; Smith v. Cornelius, 41 W. Va. 59, 23 S. E. Rep. 599.

Power of Directors to Make an Assignment.—Directors have no authority to make an assignment of the entire assets of a corporation without the assent of the stockholders, such assignment amounting to dissolution, and the statutory mode of dissolution, ch. 53, sections 56 and 57, Code W. Va. being exclusive. Kyle v. Wagner, 45 W. Va. 349, 32 S. E. Rep. 213.

Power to Bind the Corporation.—Money borrowed by the directors and expended in the prosecution of the enterprise constitutes a valid debt; in spite of a resolution of the stockholders in regular meeting that "No further assessment should be made except by authority of the shareholders." Shickell v. Improvement Co. (Va.), 37 S. E. Rep. 813.

Power to Fix Capital Stock under Maximum Amount.—Under section 23, ch. 53, Code W. Va. the increase of the capital stock of a corporation is entirely in the control of the board of directors and the only limitation upon their power in this respect is that the maximum capital be not exceeded. Exposition v. Ocheltree, 44 W. Va. 626, 30 S. E. Rep. 78.

When Contract between Directors and Corporation Upheld.—Though the directors or other agents of a corporation occupy a fiduciary relation, whether called trustees or not, still if the transaction amounts merely to a loan of money to the corporation on its own terms, and they obtain no unfair advantage, such transaction will be upheld, especially where the corporation ratifies the transaction by receiving the benefit of it. In any case, if the corporation or creditors claiming through it, wish to avoid such transaction they must restore the consideration received. Atwood v. Railroad Co., 85 Va. 966, 9 S. E. Rep. 748.

When Stockholders Occupy Position of Directors.—The general rule is that directors of a corporation cannot purchase the corporate property, but stockholders of a corporation, managed by a board of directors may; but where there is no such board, and the stockholders perform their duties, they occupy the same position as directors and are subject to the same incapacity to purchase the corporate property and any such purchase is voidable at the pleasure of any shareholder, though the price be fair and adequate. Reilly v. Oglebay, 25 W. Va. 36.

The President.

Power to Bind the Corporation.—The president of a railroad company has authority to make contracts for the necessary labor for the company, by virtue of his office, in all cases where the authority of the president is not restricted by special legislation or by regulations of the company known to the other contracting party. Railroad Co. v. Snead, 19 Gratt. 354.

When Parol Evidence Admissible to Show Who is Bound.—Where a due bill is signed by the president of a railroad, simply with his own name, parol evidence is admissible to ascertain whether it is an acknowledgment of his individual debt or that of the railroad company. Railroad Co. v. Snead, 19 Gratt. 354.

Mere Addition of "President" Not Sufficient.—The mere addition of the word "president" to the signature of the president of a corporation on negotiable paper does not bind the corporation. Scott v. Baker, 3 W. Va. 285; Rand v. Hale, 3 W. Va. 495.

Ratification by Corporation.—Whether the president of a land company is authorized or not to make a contract for the purchase of land, if the company ratify the contract by adopting the purchase and capitalizing it and offering it for sale, the company will be bound. W. Salem Land Co. v. Mont. Land Co., 89 Va. 192, 15 S. E. Rep. 524.

When President or Director a Trustee.—A president or director of a corporation stands as a trustee for it as to its property committed to his hands for the purposes of the corporation. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co. v. Woodyard, 46 W. Va. 558, 33 S. E. Rep. 285.

The Treasurer.

Has Power to Draw Checks, but Not to Endorse Negotiable Paper.—The authority to draw checks may be said to be inherent in the office of treasurer unless taken away or restrained, but the power to bind the company by endorsing negotiable notes is not, the law requires clear proof of the authority of an agent to endorse negotiable paper. As to what is not sufficient, see Davis v. Investment Co., 89 Va. 290, 15 S. E. Rep. 547.

Admissions of Officers.—In an action for libel against a corporation, the admission of the general manager of the corporation made weeks after the publication of the supposed libel, constitutes no part of the res gestæ and cannot be given in evidence against the corporation. Reusch v. Cold Storage Co., 1 Va. Law Reg. 286.

Compensation of Officers.—Although not necessary to the decision of the case, BRANNON, J., said in Crumlish v. Cent. Imp. Co., 38 W. Va. 390, 18 S. E. Rep. 456, "The law raises no implied promise to pay compensation to the directors, president or vice president of a private corporation in the absence of a provision in the by-laws or an order of the directors. And if the treasurer, secretary or other executive officer be a stockholder or director, no such promise is raised by law in his favor; but if not, then the law does raise such a promise and presumes that compensation was intended from the fact of such appointment." Ravenswood, etc., R. Co. v. Woodyard, 46 W. Va. 558, 53 S. E. Rep. 285.

An order of the board of directors of a corporation allowing compensation to the president, passed when he was present and perhaps voted is prima facie, fraudulent and void. Code W. Va., ch. 53, § 52; Ravenswood, etc., R. Co. v. Woodyard, 46 W. Va. 558, 33 S. E. Rep. 285; Sweeney v. Refining Co., 30 W. Va. 443, 4 S. E. Rep. 431.

The board of directors of a corporation cannot allow compensation to the president or any director for his services without previous authority granted by the stockholders. Code W. Va., ch. 53, § 52. And such an order of the board would be ultra vires and may be repudiated by the corporation. Ravenswood, etc., R. Co. v. Woodyard, 46 W. Va. 558, 33 S. E. Rep. 285.

Conflict of Laws.—Under the law of Pennsylvania, the president of a private corporation created by that state cannot recover from the corporation upon a quantum meruit for official services there rendered, in the absence of any by-law or resolution of the directors allowing compensation. Nor can one who is treasurer and secretary of the corporation, and a stockholder and director, recover on a quantum meruit for his official services without such by-law or resolution. The law of that state raises no promise on the part of the corporation in such cases, and the question whether, in such cases, there is an implied promise, depends on the law of that state. Crumlish v. Central Imp. Co., 38 W. Va. 390, 18 S. E. Rep. 456.

Subsequent Ratification of Allowance.—Though section 1119, Code Va., providing "There shall be no compensation for services rendered by the president or any director unless it be allowed by the stockholders," is mandatory, subsequent ratification by the stockholders of payments of salary to the president of a corporation by authority of the board of directors, is equivalent to previous authorization, but one or the other is indispensable. BUCHANAN, J., dissenting. Shickell v. Imp. Co. (Va.), 37 S. E. Rep. 813.

VI. CONSOLIDATION AND SUCCESSION.

A. CONSOLIDATION OF CORPORATIONS.—"A consolidation not only renders the property and works of the old company, which pass to the company with which it is consolidated, subject to the liabilities of the old company, but also makes the new, or surviving company responsible for them. Where two railroad companies unite, or become consolidated under the authority of law, the presumption is, until the contrary appears, that the united or consolidated company has all the powers and privileges, and is subject to all the restrictions and liabilities, of those out of which it is created. The corporation which is created by such consolidation, or the surviving corporation, where another or others are merged into it or consolidated with it, is ordinarily deemed the same as each of the corporations which formed it for the purpose of answering for the liabilities of the old corporation, and may be sued under its new name, or under the name of the surviving company, for their debts as if no change had been made in the name, or in the organization of the original corporations. There has been some question whether the consolidated company could be sued in an action at law for the liabilities of the companies composing it, or whether the proceeding must be in equity. But the better view seems to be that when a consolidation has been authorized and made, it confers all the rights, property, and franchises of the old company upon the new or consolidated company, and subjects it to all the liabilities of the old companies; and an action at law may be brought against the new or consolidated company for the debts or torts of the old companies. The question is not whether the consolidation compels a creditor to accept the defendant corporation as a new debtor against his will, or a person who has been injured to resort to a stranger for satisfaction, but whether it empowers the creditor or the person injured to resort, if he desires to do so, in the first instance, to the corporation which by the terms of the consolidation is made liable to him. The privity, some cases say, necessary to support this action, is created by the statute authorizing the consolidation and the purchase and conveyance made under it. Other authorities place the right to bring such action on the ground that the effect of the consolidation is, as to the liabilities of the old company, not to dissolve the corporation which is the immediate debtor, but to continue its existence in the consolidated corporation." BUCHANAN, J., in Langhorne v. Richmond R. Co., 91 Va. 369, 22 S. E. Rep. 159.

Either Liable but Not Both Jointly.—Where one corporation has been consolidated with another, a party injured by the original company has his option to sue either the original company which committed the injury or the new company with which such company has been consolidated, but he cannot sue both in the same action at law. Langhorne v. Richmond R. Co., 91 Va. 369, 22 S. E. Rep. 159.

Necessary Allegations.—The plaintiff in such case must allege generally the authority of the old companies to consolidate, the act of consolidation and under what name.

He must also state a good cause of action against the original corporation and the new one with which it has been consolidated. Langhorne v. R. Co., 91 Va. 369, 22 S. E. Rep. 159.

B. SUCCESSION OF CORPORATIONS.

Liability of Successor Corporation for Contracts of Former Corporation.—Where a railroad company buys the property of another insolvent railroad, it succeeds to its property, rights and easements and becomes responsible for its liabilities under any agreement entered into by the former company for the acquisition of land, especially where it has estopped itself by vouching such agreement to defeat an action of ejectment. Steenrod v. Railroad, 27 W. Va. 1.

Change of Name—Liability to Suit.—Where one corporation is a mere continuation of a former corporation with additional franchises, under a new name, it is liable to be sued on contracts made with the old corporation, and whether such is the case is a mixed question of law and fact to be submitted to the jury. Wilson v. C. & O. R. Co., 21 Gratt. 654.

ANDERSON, J., said obiter in the above case that when a corporation changes its name after the making of a contract it must be sued by its new name.

When Former Corporation Not a Necessary Party.—And in such a case where the former corporation is wholly insolvent and has "passed out of existence," it need not be made a party to a suit for specific performance of such an agreement against the successor corporation. Steenrod v. Railroad, 27 W. Va. 1.

Liable to the Extent of Property Received.—Where by authority of the legislature a corporation has accepted a transfer of the entire stock of another corporation and has taken possession and held the property of the old corporation after the expiration of the time limit of its charter, it places itself in the position of a successor to the latter corporation, liable, to the extent of the property received, to the debts, and entitled to all the rights of the latter. Barksdale v. Finney, 14 Gratt. 338.

And Only to That Extent.—When a new corporation, with different stockholders, is formed it cannot be sued by the creditors or held liable for the debts of the old corporation, except upon some special ground, such as having received assets of the old corporation without giving value therefor. Donnally v. Hearndon, 41 W. Va. 519, 23 S. E. Rep. 646.

Liability Must Be Enforced in Equity.—Where one corporation by legislative authority takes charge of the property and franchise of another, the first corporation cannot be garnisheed by a creditor of the second corporation; his remedy is in equity. Swann v. Summers, 19 W. Va. 115.

Assumption of Obligation Must Be Alleged, When Liability Is Based on Contract.—In a suit brought against a corporation which has assumed the obligations of a defunct corporation, failure to allege that the new corporation has assumed said obligations when the proof shows the obligation sued on to be that of the defunct corporation, is a variance, and plaintiff's evidence will be struck out. Knights of Pythias v. Weller, 93 Va. 605, 25 S. E. Rep. 891.

Effect of Acquisition of Entire Capital Stock.

Does Not Give Legal Title to the Property of Corporation.—A conveyance of all the capital stock of a corporation to a purchaser gives to such purchaser only an equitable interest in the property to carry on business under the act of incorporation and in the corporate name, and the corporation is still the legal owner of the same. Park v. Petroleum Co., 25 W. Va. 108.

Corporation Succeeding a Partnership.—Where a debt is due a partnership and the partners are afterwards incorporated, the debt becomes a debt of the corporation and they may sue for it in the corporate name in a court of equity. Griffin v. Macaulay, 7 Gratt. 476.

VII. DISSOLUTION OF CORPORATIONS.

A. CAUSES.

Forfeiture of Charter.

Franchise Continues Till Forfeiture Claimed by State.—The charter of a corporation does not expire by reason of acts of omission or commission on the part of the corporation, even where they constitute a sufficient ground for declaring a forfeiture; but the franchise continues in full force until a forfeiture is claimed by the state granting it, and this can be done only in a proper legal proceeding by which the cause of forfeiture is ascertained and dissolution adjudged. Moore v. Schoppert, 22 W. Va. 283.

Quo Warranto the Proper Remedy.—An information in the nature of a quo warranto is the proper remedy by which to try and decide whether the charter of a corporation ought to be nullified and vacated, or to prevent the company from receiving tolls. The fact that the commonwealth is a stockholder is no bar to such a proceeding. The superior court of law for the county in which the president and directors reside has jurisdiction in such a proceeding, no matter where the acts of forfeiture complained of were committed. Com. v. Pres. & Directors of James River Co., 2 Va. Cas. 190.

Causes of Forfeiture Cannot Be Taken Advantage of Collaterally.—Although a corporation by failure to perform its duties has made itself liable to forfeiture of its franchises, such grounds of forfeiture cannot be taken advantage of by injunction or otherwise in a court of equity to resist the payment of tolls, etc., or for any other purpose, except where a public nuisance results and in the case of charitable trusts; the only remedy is in a court of law by the writ of quo warranto instituted by the state, the court saying, "The act of incorporation is not a contract between the corporate body on the one hand and individuals whose rights and interests may be affected by the exercise of its powers, on the other, but it is a compact between the corporation and the government from which they derive their powers. Individuals cannot therefore take it upon themselves, in the assertion of their private rights, to insist on breaches of the contract of the corporation, as a ground for resisting or denying the exercise of a corporate power." Pixley v. Roanoke Nav. Co., 75 Va. 320.

A cause of forfeiture cannot be taken advantage of, or enforced against a private corporation, collaterally or incidentally, or in any other mode than by a direct proceeding for that purpose, against the corporation, so that it may have an opportunity to answer; and the state can alone institute such a proceeding, since it may waive a broken condition of a compact with it as well as an individual. Greenbrier Lumber Co. v. Ward, 30 W. Va. 43, 3 S. E. Rep. 227; Childs v. Hurd, 32 W. Va. 66, 9 S. E. Rep. 362; B. & O. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 3 W. Va. 319.

Non-Payment of License Tax.—And this is as true of the non-payment of a license tax to the state, as it is of any other cause of forfeiture, the law, in this respect, not having been altered by Code W. Va. 1891, ch. 32, § 88. Greenbrier Lumber Co. v. Ward, 30 W. Va. 43, 3 S. E. Rep. 227.

Failure to Appoint Officers, etc.—Forfeiture of the charter for failure to appoint officers or other acts of non-user, cannot be enquired into collaterally, unless there is evidence that the charter has been ascertained to be forfeited by the sentence of the proper court in a proper proceeding for the purpose. Crump v. U. S. Mining Co., 7 Gratt. 352; B. & O. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 3 W. Va. 319.

Express Provisions for Forfeiture in Charter, No Inquisition Necessary.—Where the charter of a railroad authorizes the company to issue bonds and secure them by a mortgage, but also provides that if the road is not completed to a certain point by a certain day, it shall forfeit to the state its corporate franchises and rights together with the roadbed and all other property, the two clauses are to be taken together and on the failure to complete the road in the specified time its property is forfeited to the state free from the incumbrance of the mortgage, it appearing that the holders of the bonds were the officers of the road and that none of the proceeds had been expended on the road, and consequently they were neither purchasers for value or without notice. Such forfeiture, the state having elected to enter for the forfeiture, is absolute and no inquisition or judicial proceedings of any kind are required to consummate it. Silliman v. R. Co., 27 Gratt. 119.

Expiration of Charter Period of Existence Ipso Facto Dissolves the Corporation.—If the charter or governing statute of the corporation, fixes a definite period of time at which its corporate life shall expire, when that period is reached, the corporation is ipso facto dissolved without any direct action to that end either on the part of the state or of its members; and it has no further power to adopt by-laws. Knights of Pythias v. Weller, 93 Va. 605, 25 S. E. Rep. 891.

A Mere Discontinuance of Business Does Not Effect a Dissolution.—A mere cessation or discontinuance by a corporation, of its corporate business, will not operate as a dissolution. Law v. Rich (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 858.

Insolvency Does Not, Per Se, Work Dissolution.—Insolvency, per se, does not work a dissolution of a corporation, nor invalidate an assignment of its effects for the benefit of creditors. Shen. Valley R. Co. v. Griffith, 76 Va. 913; Weigand v. Supply Co., 44 W. Va. 133, 28 S. E. Rep. 803.

Resolution by Majority of Stockholders Works a Dissolution.—A resolution by the stockholders of a joint stock company to discontinue its business under § 56, ch. 53, Code W. Va. 1891, operates as a voluntary surrender of the corporate franchise and a dissolution of the corporation. Law v. Rich (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 858.

Statutory Methods in West Virginia.—Not less than one-third in interest of the stockholders of a corporation have a right under § 57, ch. 53, Code W. Va. 1891, to file their bill in equity, and on showing sufficient cause the court will dissolve the corporation. Weigand v. Supply Co., 44 W. Va. 133, 28 S. E. Rep. 803.

In such a suit the corporation is a necessary party. Hurst v. Coe, 30 W. Va. 158, 3 S. E. Rep. 564.

More Than One-Third of the Stockholders May Join in the Bill but in Any Case Sufficient Cause Must Be Shown.—But in such suit the court cannot make a decree of dissolution unless cause be shown, even though a majority in interest are plaintiffs and they had an absolute right to dissolve the corporation by their majority vote at a general meeting of the corporation. Code W. Va., ch. 53, § 56. But the mere fact that a majority in interest are plaintiffs and had another remedy does not deprive the circuit court of its jurisdiction, on sufficient cause being shown, from decreeing a dissolution. Hurst v. Coe, 30 W. Va. 158, 3 S. E. Rep. 564.

B. EFFECT OF DISSOLUTION ON PROPERTY AND SUITS OF THE CORPORATION.

All Suits Abate.—At common law, upon the death or dissolution of a corporation, its real estate reverted to the grantors and donors and the personal property escheated to the king, while the debts due to and from it were thereby extinguished and all actions pending for or against it at the time, abated. Board v. Livesay, 6 W. Va. 44; Miller v. Coal Co., 31 W. Va. 836, 8 S. E. Rep. 600. Rider v. Nelson & Albemarle Union Factory, 7 Leigh 154; May v. State Bank of N. C., 2 Rob. 56.

Exception Where Corporation Had Assigned its Rights before Dissolution.—Where the charter of a corporation expired pending an appeal but the corporation had made an assignment of its rights in the subject in controversy, the court, if satisfied of the fact of the assignment, may permit the case to proceed without notice of the dissolution of the corporation. Bank of Alexandria v. Patton, 1 Rob. 499; May v. State Bank of N. C., 2 Rob. 56.

A Judgment Raises a Conclusive Presumption of a Continued Existence of Corporation at Time of Judgment.—But if an original judgment be rendered in favor of a corporation, as it could not be regularly rendered unless the existence of the corporation continued, the necessary intendment is that the continued existence of the corporation was either proved or admitted and if execution be sued out the defendant is estopped to deny the existence of the corporation at the time of the judgment, and proof of the extinction of the corporation before the judgment is inadmissible. No such estoppel exists, when, by an assignment before extinction, proof of the expiration of the charter is excluded, and no such intendment arises. May v. State Bank of N. C., 2 Rob. 56.

In Case of Dissolution after Judgment and before Execution No Execution Can Issue.—And if, after judgment in favor of a corporation, the corporation becomes extinct by the expiration of the term of its existence, no execution can be sued out or if sued out is liable to be quashed. Dictum in May v. State Bank of N. C., 2 Rob. 56.

Modern Rule as to Dissolution, May Still Sue and Be Sued in Respect of its Corporate Assets.—But this rule, so far as modern business and commercial corporations are concerned, has become practically obsolete. Its unjust operation upon the rights of creditors and stockholders has been generally prevented by statute and in equity the assets of such a corporation, which represent not the donation of the prince or its pious founder, but the contributions of its stockholders, are held, independently of statute, to constitute a trust fund, into whosesoever hands they may come, for the benefit of creditors and stockholders. Very soon after Rider v. Factory, 7 Leigh 154, was decided, and according to a suggestion of the court in that case the act of 1836 7 was passed by the general assembly of Virginia. Code Va. 1887, § 1163, which act was incorporated into the Code W. Va. ch. 53, § 59, providing in substance that when a corporation shall expire or be dissolved, its assets shall, under the direction of the board of directors then in office or such receiver as may be appointed, be subject to the payment of the liabilities, and the surplus, if any, be distributed among the stockholders. And suits may be brought or defended and all other lawful acts done in the corporate name in like manner as before dissolution Miller v. Coal Co., 31 W. Va. 836, 8 S. E. Rep. 600. Greenbrier Lumber Co. v. Ward, 30 W. Va. 43, 3 S. E. Rep. 227; Donnally v. Hearndon, 41 W. Va. 519, 23 S. E. Rep. 646, and such suits do not have to be carried on under the direction of such director or receiver. Hall v. Bank of Va., 14 W. Va. 584.

Assets, after Dissolution, a Trust Fund for Creditors.—After a corporation has ceased to exist or has abandoned its business, its assets become a trust fund for the payment of creditors and stockholders, creditors first and the residue if any, to the stockholders, who are simply deferred creditors. Crumlish v. R. Co., 28 W. Va. 623.

Functions of Directors Suspended.—When the stockholders have taken the necessary steps to effect the dissolution of the company, and are trying to liquidate its indebtedness with the least loss to themselves, the functions of the directors are, in effect, suspended; they cannot purchase for the company the stock of one of its shareholders, with the company's property, thereby diminishing its assets, both the directors and the said shareholders being aware of the facts. The directors can make no disposition of the corporate property which will not enure to the equal benefit of all the shareholders. Augsburg Land, etc., Co. v. Pepper, 95 Va. 92, 27 S. E. Rep. 807.

Effect of Dissolution on Contracts of Corporation.

Executory Contracts Avoided.—Where an insolvent corporation is forced into liquidation and dissolution, all its executory contracts perish with it, for this is an implied condition of their execution. Such, however, is not the law where a solvent corporation is voluntarily dissolved. By its own act it cannot relieve itself from its contracts, but its assets will be held liable for breaches thereof. Griffith v. Lumber Co., 46 W. Va. 56, 33 S. E. Rep. 125.

C. SUITS TO WIND UP THE AFFAIRS OF A CORPORATION.

Jurisdiction of Equity.—Equity has no inherent jurisdiction to dissolve a corporation; its powers in that respect are wholly derived from statute. Law v. Rich (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 858.

Equity Has Exclusive Jurisdiction.

A Creditor Cannot Obtain a Preference by Levying an Attachment.—There can be no suit against a defunct domestic corporation, except one in equity as provided in sections 57 and 59, ch. 53, Code W. Va. to wind up its affairs for the benefit of creditors and stockholders. No creditor can, by levying an attachment, obtain priority over other creditors. Stiles v. Oil & Coal Co. (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 986.

Proper Parties.

Rule in Virginia.

Stockholders Not Proper Parties.—Under Code Va. 1887, § 1103, the corporation, though dissolved or expired, is the proper party defendant in a creditor's suit against the corporation, and the stockholders are not proper parties. The fact that there has been an assignment of the corporate assets to trustees only alters the case so far as to make the trustees necessary parties. Hamilton v. Glenn, 85 Va. 901, 9 S. E. Rep. 129.

The stockholders individually are neither necessary nor proper parties to suit to wind up the affairs of a corporation, but they are bound by the decree, and where they never appealed from the decree they cannot question its validity in a collateral proceeding. Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 6 S. E. Rep. 866.

Where no relief is sought against the shareholders, they are sufficiently represented by the corporation. Bristol Iron & Steel Co. v. Thomas, 93 Va. 396, 25 S. E. Rep. 110. But where relief is sought against the shareholders themselves, they should be made parties. Martin v. S. Salem Land Co., 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. Rep. 591; Cason v. Seldner, 77 Va. 293.

Rule in West Virginia.

Stockholders Necessary and Proper Parties.—In a suit in equity under section 59, ch. 53, Code W. Va., by a creditor to assert a debt against a defunct domestic corporation and to wind up its affairs, the stockholders are necessary parties and the decree must both ascertain the debts against the corporation and the shares of the stockholders in the surplus. Stiles v. Oil & Coal Co. (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 986. See also, Styles v. Laurel Fork Oil, etc., Co., 45 W. Va. 374, 32 S. E. Rep. 227.

A Return of "No Effects" on an Execution Justifies a Resort to Equity.—Where a creditor of a corporation has obtained judgment against it, upon which execution has been issued and returned no property found, he has the right to sue in equity for the benefit of himself and all other creditors who will join in the suit to subject the assets of the corporation, including the unpaid subscriptions of its stockholders, as far as may be necessary, to the payment of its debts. It is in the nature of a creditor's bill, and by it the equitable assets of the corporation can be reached. Martin v. South Salem Land Co., 2 Va. Law Reg. 743, 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. Rep. 591.

Simple Contract Creditor Has a Right to Bring Such Suit.—A simple contract creditor, who has not reduced his claim to judgment, and has no lien, can yet sue a corporation in equity and have its assets administered and applied to the payment of its debts. Nunnally v. Strauss, 94 Va. 255, 26 S. E. Rep. 880, BUCHANAN, J., and KEITH, P., dissenting; Finney v. Bennett, 27 Gratt. 365.

Res Judicata in Such Suits.—In a suit involving, among other things, a debt between two corporations, a decree is rendered for a certain sum in favor of the one against the other, ascertaining the amount of the liability on the basis of the amount of paid-up stock of the creditor company. That decree is res judicata and estoppel between the companies as to the amount of recovery, and also as between the creditor company and its stockholders, and also between such stockholders as regards the amount of the recovery, but not as to the amount of paid-up stock in settling the rights of stockholders in the distribution of the fund arising from the debt so recovered, Crumlish v. Shenandoah Val. R. Co., 40 W. Va. 627, 22 S. E. Rep. 91.

Statutes, When Constitutional.—A statute, whose whole object is to provide a convenient and judicious mode for winding up an insolvent corporation and distributing its assets equitably amongst those entitled thereto, violates no contract and impairs no right of the corporators and should be upheld in Virginia as it certainly would be by the state enacting it. Bockover v. Life Ass'n, 77 Va. 85.

Creditors' Bills.—The road and franchises of a railroad company are liable, on a creditor's bill, to the payment of judgments recovered against the company, and where the amount of the judgment is small and the rental value of the road large, the road and franchises should be leased for as short a period as is practicable, but the creditors have a right to have them leased, even though the proceeds be far in excess of the judgment, if the lease cannot be made for a shorter period. It is proper to make another railroad in possession of the road in suit, a party to the suit, to ascertain its interest in said road and on failure of that company to respond or show what its interest is, a decree for leasing the road is proper. Winchester, etc., R. Co. v. Colfelt, 27 Gratt. 777.

Powers of Creditors and Majority of Stockholders over Assets of Insolvent Corporation.—Where a corporation has but one asset, namely, a decree for a certain sum against a railroad company, and a decree for the sale of its road, etc., to satisfy the same, after first satisfying prior liens and charges to a large amount, the creditors and the owners of a greater part of the stock may, if they see fit, give to outside parties, out of the amount decreed to them, a bonus, for a guaranty that at the commissioner's sale, the railroad, etc., shall be made to bring at least enough to pay their claim, as well as the prior liens and charges. And, if such bonus is made to appear to have been that, without which neither creditors nor stockholders would have received anything, then the court will charge the fund thus brought into the cause with the payment of such bonus, and, after the payment of the creditors, distribute the surplus, if any, among the stockholders according to their respective interests. Crumlish v. Shen. Val. R. Co., 40 W. Va. 627, 22 S. E. Rep. 91.

Rights of Creditors.—The makers of notes, delivered to a corporation on conditions which have not been complied with, cannot be held liable to creditors of the corporation whose debts were not contracted on the faith of such notes, and who did not know of their existence until after their debts were contracted. Catt v. Olivier, 6 Va. Law Reg. 465.

D. RECEIVERS.

When Appointed.—Where a corporation is insolvent and is largely indebted, which indebtedness is secured by a lien, which its creditors have a right to resort to; if it appears that the property of the corporation is being dissipated, it is proper for a court on the application of such creditors to appoint a receiver to take charge of the property of the corporation. The court, quoting the Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, said, "In order to obtain the appointment of a receiver the plaintiff must show—First, either that he has a clear right to the property itself, or that he has some lien upon it, or that the property constitutes a special fund to which he has a right to resort for the satisfaction of the claim; and secondly, that the possession of the property by the defendant was obtained by fraud, or that the property itself or the income arising from it is in danger of loss, from the neglect, waste, misconduct, or insolvency of the defendant." Kanawha Coal Co. v. Ballard, etc., Coal Co., 43 W. Va. 721, 29 S. E. Rep. 514; Donnally v. Hearndon, 41 W. Va. 519, 23 S. E. Rep. 646.

Duty of Receiver as to Executory Contracts of Corporation.—A receiver is not bound to carry out an executory contract of a corporation, but he may disregard it. The power to adopt or reject it is restricted to the receiver; it is not reciprocal. But if he adopts it under order of court and afterwards abandons it under a further order, the other party is entitled to compensation for what he has actually done in fulfillment of the contract, subject to deduction for what he, on his part, has received. Griffith v. Lumber Co., 46 W. Va. 56, 33 S. E. Rep. 125.

VII. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

A. SUITS MUST BE BROUGHT AND DEFENDED IN CORPORATE NAME.—A corporation must sue and be sued in its corporate name. Krell Piano Co. v. Kent, 39 W. Va. 294, 19 S. E. Rep. 409; Culpeper Agri., etc., Soc. v. Digges, 6 Rand. 164; Porter v. Nekervis, 4 Rand. 359; Stewart v. Thornton, 75 Va. 215; Hart v. Balt., etc., R. Co., 6 W. Va. 336; Hechmer v. Gilligan, 28 W. Va. 752; Mason v. Bank, 12 Leigh 84; Legrand v. Hampton-Sidney College, 5 Munf. 324. And the same rule prevails in courts of equity. Stewart v. Thornton, 75 Va. 215.

Misnomer of Corporation.—Though misnomer of a corporation is only matter of abatement, where it is plaintiff, yet where it is defendant, it is matter in bar. Bank of Va. v. Craig, 6 Leigh 399.

But where suit is brought against a branch bank instead of the mother bank, which, alone, is incorporated, this is not a mere misnomer, which must be pleaded in abatement; but is a bar to any recovery and though a verdict be founded upon the general issue pleaded, the error is not cured by the statute of jeofails. Mason v. Farmers' Bank, 12 Leigh 84.

Modern Rule.

Identification of Corporation Sufficient.—The name of a corporation is not the only means of identity. If some words be added, omitted, or changed in the spelling, in the true name of the corporation, this is not a fatal variance, if there be enough to distinguish it from other corporations, and to show that the corporation suing or being sued was the one intended. First Nat. Bank v. Huntington Distilling Co., 41 W. Va. 530, 23 S. E. Rep. 792.

Leave to Amend Will Be Given.—A corporation may be known by several names as well as a natural person and a recovery may be had against it in its true name provided its identity be averred in pleading and apparent in proof. Where there is a variance as to the name, opportunity to amend will be allowed so as to put in issue the identity of the two corporations. Langhorne v. Rd. City R. Co., 91 Va. 364, 22 S. E. Rep. 357.

Not Pleadable in Abatement.—The misnomer of a corporation cannot be taken advantage of by plea in abatement; but where formerly pleadable in abatement, the declaration and summons may, on the motion of either party, on affidavit of the right name, be amended by inserting the same therein. Code W. Va., ch. 125, § 14; First Nat. Bank v. Huntington Distilling Co., 41 W. Va. 530, 23 S. E. Rep. 792.

Abbreviated Name Used in Charter May Be Used, at Least No Objection Can Be Made in the Appellate Court for the First Time.—Where a corporation is formally called in the charter, the "President, Directors & Co. of the Farmers' Bank of Va.," but elsewhere in the charter and generally, merely the "Farmers' Bank of Va.," and it is sued in the latter name and no objection is made in the lower court, it cannot be successfully objected to in the court of appeals. Farmers' Bank v. Willis, 7 W. Va. 31.

Change of Name, Pendente Lite, Immaterial.—A mere change of name, pendente lite, of a defendant corporation, without any change of membership or composition, will not defeat an action against the corporation. Welfley v. Shen. I., L., M. & M. Co., 83 Va. 768, 3 S. E. Rep. 376.

Misnomer of Corporation in Contracts.—"But contracts may be made by or with them, by a mistaken name if the mistake be only in syllabis et verbis and not in sensu et re ipsa." So a bond executed to the "President and Managers of the Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society" may be sued on by the "Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society," that being the legal style of the corporation. Culpeper Agricultural, etc., Society v. Digges, 6 Rand. 165.

Contracts under an Assumed Name.—Where a corporation does business under an assumed name for its own convenience and a party contracts with it under that assumed name, having constructive notice of its true name, such contract can be enforced by either party. Marmet Co. v. Archibald, 37 W. Va. 778, 17 S. E. Rep. 299.

B. LOCALITY OF SUITS AGAINST A CORPORATION.—A corporation holding land in different counties, if so empowered by its charter, may be sued in any county wherein such land may be, though its principal office is located or its chief officer resides elsewhere. The cause of action growing out of its contracts, acts, negligences or omissions, may arise in a different county or corporation and suit may be brought where the cause of action arose without reference to the residence of the defendant corporation. B. & O. R. Co. v. Gallahue, 12 Gratt. 655.

Principal Office of Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company in West Virginia.—Since the charter of the C. & O. R. Co. provides that, if the company deems it inexpedient to establish its principal office in the state of West Virginia, its place of business at or nearest Charleston, shall for all purposes be deemed to be the principal office in said state; actions against said railroad company should be brought in the circuit court of Kanawha county. The fact that said company is doing business in other counties of said state will not confer jurisdiction on the courts of such counties, when the cause of action arose outside of the state; unless the president or other chief officer reside in such county. Code, ch. 123, § 1; Ballard v. C. & O. R. Co., 42 W. Va. 1, 24 S. E. Rep. 602.

What Amounts to a New Cause of Action so as to Confer Jurisdiction.—An action against a corporation on a contract for commissions on sales of stock, made at home office, should be brought in the jurisdiction of the home office, and the fact that plaintiff received a telegram from the corporation in a different jurisdiction, telling him that he would have to divide commissions on further stock with another agent who had an option on it, is a mere modification of the former contract and confers no jurisdiction on the courts of that place on the ground that a new cause of action arose there. Ferguson v. Grottoes Co., 92 Va. 316, 23 S. E. Rep. 761.

To Whom Process Must Be Directed.—If the foundation of the jurisdiction is that the cause of action or some part thereof arose in Lynchburg, the process can only be directed to an officer of that city. Dictum in Guarantee Co. v. Nat. Bank, 95 Va. 480, 28 S. E. Rep. 909; Code Va., § 3220.

C. SERVICE OF PROCESS.

On Whom.—Under Act 1883-4, p. 701, Code Va. 1887, § 3225, service of process on any corporation, other than a bank of circulation or a town, where the president is a nonresident, may be on any agent of the corporation, in the county or corporation in which he resides or in which the principal office of the company is located, whatever may be the employment of the agent. Norf. & West. R. Co. v. Cottrell, 83 Va. 512, 3 S. E. Rep. 123.

Service on Depot or Station Agent of Railroad Company Good.—In an action against a railroad company the summons may be served upon a depot or station agent in the actual employment of the company residing in the county or township wherein the action is brought and the return of an officer showing that such process has thus been served is sufficient. Code W. Va., ch. 52, § 20; Douglass v. Kan. & Mich. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 267, 28 S. E. Rep. 705.

Where.—Service of process on the president or other officer must be in the county or corporation in the state in which he resides. The clause providing for personal service of process on a nonresident, as a substitute for an order publication, Code Va. 187, ch. 166, § 15, Code 1887, § 3232, refers only to natural persons who are nonresident defendants and has no application to nonresident defendant corporations. A judgment based on such service is void for want of jurisdiction. Dillard v. Cent. Va. Iron Co., 82 Va. 734, 1 S. E. Rep. 121; Frazier v. Railroad Co., 40 Va. 224, 21 S. E. Rep. 723; Taylor v. Ohio, etc., R. Co., 35 W. Va. 328, 13 S. E. Rep. 1009.

When.—When it appears that process to commence a suit has been served on an agent of the company, less than ten days before the return day, Code Va., § 3227, the proper mode to take advantage of it is by motion to quash the sheriff's return and not by motion to dismiss the suit. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Carter, 91 Va. 587, 22 S. E. Rep. 517.

Service on Attorney Adversely Interested Voidable.—Service of process upon the president and attorney of a corporation who is also the attorney in adverse interest is not void but voidable on motion in time. ENGLISH, J., dissenting and holding such service absolutely void. Blowpipe Co. v. Spencer, 46 W. Va. 590, 33 S. E. Rep. 342.

Service on the Quondam Officer of a Defunct Corporation Good.—Service of process on the quondam president of a defunct corporation is good; the method by publication provided by Code Va. 1887, § 1103, is merely cumulative and does not exclude the methods applicable to an existing corporation. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. New York, etc., R. Co., 95 Va. 386, 28 S. E. Rep. 573.

Service of Process on Officer Who Has Been Notified of His Election is Good.—One who has been notified of his appointment as director, must be presumed to have accepted it unless he expressly declines it; service of process on such a person, therefore, is valid, especially where he makes no disclaimer. The fact that he does not notify the corporation is immaterial. Danville, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 90 Va. 340, 18 S. E. Rep. 278.

Disclaimer by Officers Immaterial.—Where process is duly served on officers of a corporation, such service is valid, though they disclaim the right to answer officially. Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 6 S. E. Rep. 866.

A Judgment without Service of Process Void—Remedy.—A judgment pronounced by a justice, without service of process upon, or notice to the defendant, is void. But as such judgment may be set aside, even when rendered upon the verdict of a jury, by the circuit court upon a writ of certiorari, the defendant in the judgment cannot obtain relief against it in a court of equity. Kanawha & O. Ry. Co. v. Ryan, 31 W. Va. 364, 6 S. E. Rep. 924.

Presumption That Process Was Duly Served.—Where it does not appear from the record whether process was duly served, or order of publication duly published and posted, or not, except from the decree, which declares that "process was duly served" or "order of publication was duly executed as to the defendants," it will be presumed that it was so served or executed. But when the record shows the process or order of publication, and shows clearly that process was not served or order of publication executed as to any particular defendant, such declaration in the decree will not raise such presumption as to such defendant. Styles v. Laurel Fork Oil & Coal Co., 45 W. Va. 374, 32 S. E. Rep. 227.

Acceptance of Process Must Show Character in Which Process Was Received.—An acceptance of process

reading "Service accepted. Alf. Paul," is bad, as not showing the character in which he received service, i. e., as attorney appointed to accept service. Adkins v. Ins. Co., 45 W. Va. 384, 32 S. E. Rep. 194.

D. ORDER OF PUBLICATION.

Must Follow the Statute.—An order of publication in a suit against a corporation, along with other defendants, must follow the statute and state, on affidavit, that such defendant is a corporation and that no person can be found in the county, upon whom process can be legally served and require it to appear within one month and do what is necessary to protect its interests. Styles v. Oil & Coal Co., 45 W. Va. 374, 32 S. E. Rep. 227.

Local Attorney of Corporation a Proper Person to Make It.—The affidavit of a corporation in an order of publication against "parties unknown" must, of necessity, be by an agent, and it is proper for the local attorney of the corporation to make it, who resides in the place where the cause of action arose and on that account is more likely to be conversant with the facts than some officer of the corporation residing elsewhere. Fayette Land Co. v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. Rep. 1016. On summoning corporations by publication, see article, 2 Va. Law Reg. 545.

E. SHERIFF'S RETURN.

Must Show Service on Attorney Appointed to Receive It.—A return of service of a summons in an action against a foreign corporation upon an attorney, must show that he is the attorney appointed by the corporation to accept such service, otherwise it is defective and judgment on it is void, but the return may be amended. The return must state all the facts necessary to make it good, so that the court may judge of the sufficiency of the service, and where it departs from the statute, everything is inferred against it that such departure warrants. Adkins v. Ins. Co., 45 W. Va. 384, 32 S. E. Rep. 194.

Return of Service on "Lawful Attorney" Prima Facie Good.—Where the return of the sheriff, shows that the writ was served on the "lawful attorney" of a nonresident insurance corporation, this is "prima facie" service on the attorney required to be appointed by such foreign insurance company by Code W. Va., ch. 34, § 15. Wagon Co. v. Peterson, 27 W. Va. 314.

Must Show Service on Such Attorney in the County Where He Resides.—The return of service of process on the attorney appointed by a corporation for accepting service of process or on any officer or agent authorized by law to accept it, by Code W. Va., § 7, ch. 124, must show that such service was had in the county in which such attorney, etc., resides, sec. 38, ch. 50.

Otherwise judgment rendered on such invalid service is void for want of jurisdiction, where there is no appearance. Frazier v. R. Co., 40 W. Va. 224, 21 S. E. Rep. 723.

This applies as well to process issuing from a justice's court as to that from any other court. Kanawha, etc., R. Co. v. Ryan, 31 W. Va. 364, 6 S. E. Rep. 924; Taylor v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 328, 13 S. E. Rep. 1009. But a court of equity will not enjoin such a judgment since there is adequate remedy at law by writ of certiorari. Kanawha, etc., R. Co. v. Ryan, 31 W. Va. 364, 6 S. E. Rep. 924.

Must Show Service Ten Days before Return Day.—Where the sheriff's return fails to state that process was served at least ten days before the return day of such process, where that is necessary, a judgment by default, founded on such process, is wholly void, it may be attacked in a collateral suit by third persons, it neither binds nor bars anything and all acts performed under it and all claims flowing out of it are void. Staunton Perpetual B. & L. Co. v. Haden, 92 Va. 201, 23 S. E. Rep. 285.

Amendment of Return.—Return of service of a summons from a justice's court, defective in failing to show that service on a corporation's agent was made in the county of his residence, may be amended, either before the justice or in the circuit court upon appeal. Hopkins v. B. & O. R. Co., 42 W. Va. 535, 26 S. E. Rep. 187; Assurance Co. v. Everhart, 88 Va. 952, 14 S. E. Rep. 836.

Lapse of Time No Bar to Amendment.—The return of a sheriff to a summons may be amended thirteen years after judgment by default has been rendered in the action, so as to show that the county in which service was had on the defendant corporation, by giving one of the directors a copy of the summons, was the county in which he resided, and the judgment will be validated by such amendment. It is immaterial that subsequent mortgagees of the corporation may be injured by the amendment, it not being shown that they were aware of the irregularity in the judgment, which was duly docketed, when they took their mortgages, and if they were, they would nevertheless acquire their liens subject to the judgment plaintiff's right to have the record perfected. Shenandoah Val. R. Co. v. Ashby, 86 Va. 232, 9 S. E. Rep. 1003.

F. SUITS BY AND AGAINST CORPORATIONS.

Prejudice against Corporations Not a Proper Question to Put to a Juror.—In an action against a corporation, a juror cannot be asked on his voir dire whether he is prejudiced against corporations. Atlantic, etc., R. Co. v. Reiger, 95 Va. 418, 28 S. E. Rep. 590.

No Averment of Incorporation Necessary, Only Proof of It at the Trial, by Old Rule.—A corporation need not set forth in its declaration how they are a corporation, but must prove it at the trial; and this rule applies to motions as well as to suits by a corporation. Grays v. Turnpike Co., 4 Rand. 578; Anderson v. Kanawha Coal Co., 12 W. Va. 526; Rees v. Conococheague Bank, 5 Rand. 326; Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh 471; Jackson v. Bank of Marietta, 9 Leigh 240; Quarrier v. Insurance Co., 10 W. Va. 507; Lithgow v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 297. And the same rule holds where a corporation is sued, nor do the provisions of sections 1 and 18, ch. 61, Code W. Va. 1868, "that an action for excessive charges cannot be maintained against anyone but an incorporated railroad company affect the case. Hart v. B. & O. R. Co., 6 W. Va. 336.

Same Rule in Criminal Proceedings against Corporations.—In criminal prosecutions against corporations, the fact of the incorporation of defendant does not have to be proven unless such fact is put in issue as provided in section 41, ch. 125, Code. State v. Thacker Coal & Coke Co. (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 529. See also, Lithgow v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 297.

Now Not Even Necessary to Prove It at the Trial unless Denied under Oath.—In a suit against a corporation it is not necessary to aver in the declaration, that it is a corporation, nor is it necessary to prove at the trial that the defendant is a corporation, unless with the plea there is filed an affidavit denying the fact. The court will take notice of the fact ex officio. Code Va. 1887, sec. 3280; B. & O. R. Co. v. Sherman, 30 Gratt. 602; Gillett v. American Stove, etc., Co., 29 Gratt. 565; Douglass v. K. & M. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 267, 28 S. E. Rep. 705. And the plea of "nul tiel corporation" unaccompanied by an affidavit denying the corporate existence of the plaintiff, does not put the plaintiff to the proof of its corporate existence. Crews v. Farmers' Bank, 31 Gratt. 348.

Never Necessary under a Plea of Conditions Performed.—But while under a special plea that the plaintiff was not a corporation or under the general issue, as non est factum, not guilty, and non assumpsit, it was necessary to prove plaintiff's existence as a corporation, under a plea of conditions performed, it never was necessary, since by such a plea, the defendant admits the obligee of the bond had an existence as a corporation. Central Land Co. v. Calhoun, 16 W. Va. 361.

Affidavit Must Deny Corporate Existence at Time of Contract Sued on.—The affidavit denying the fact of incorporation, which is necessary to put such fact in issue, Code Va. 1887, § 3280, must deny the corporate existence at the time of the contract sued on; it is not sufficient merely to deny it at the time of the institution of the suit. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. New York, etc., R. Co., 95 Va. 386, 28 S. E. Rep. 573.

Evidence of Incorporation.

Books of Corporation the Best Evidence.—The books of a corporation are the best evidence of due incorporation and ought to be admitted and all fair presumptions will be made in favor of the regularity of incorporation. Grays v. Turnpike Co., 4 Rand. 578.

Records and Parol Evidence.—The organization of a corporation may be proved by its records and parol proof, without the production of its list of subscribers. Crump v. U. S. Mining Co., 7 Gratt. 352.

Its Deed under Seal Evidence of Incorporation.—A deed of the corporation, signed with its name by the secretary and under the seal of the corporation, duly acknowledged and admitted to record and reciting that "it is a corporation framed under the laws of the state of New York" is prima facie evidence of incorporation. Anderson v. Kanawha Coal Co., 12 W. Va. 526.

Certificate of Incorporation.—Where the certificate of incorporation discloses no error on its face and is in accordance with the provisions of Code W. Va., ch. 54, sections 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, ch. 53, § 62, it is sufficient evidence of the existence of the corporation, and, having conducted business as a corporation, the validity of its incorporation cannot be attacked by proving aliunde the certificate that certain prerequisites of the law had not been in good faith complied with. Lafin & Rand Powder Co. v. Sinsheimer, 24 Am. Rep. 522.

Certified Copy of Certificate of Incorporation.—A certified copy of the certificate of incorporation, duly authenticated is sufficient evidence of the fact of incorporation Manufacturing Co. v. Bennett, 28 W. Va. 16.

Not Inferred from Merely Doing Business as a Corporation.—The fact of incorporation cannot be inferred from the mere doing business as if incorporated. Jackson v. Bank of Marietta, 9 Leigh 240.

Ex Parte Affidavit Not Sufficient.—Where the only proof of incorporation is the ex parte affidavit of a witness, which is excepted to by opposing counsel, such proof is insufficient and the bill should be dismissed. Bowyer v. Giles, etc., Turnpike Co., 9 Gratt. 109.

Estoppel to Deny Incorporation.—A party who has contracted with a corporation, as such, cannot afterwards raise the objection, that, at the time he entered into such contract, the corporation was not legally incorporated, if such corporation could constitutionally exist. Manufacturing Co. v. Bennett, 28 W. Va. 16; Marmet Co. v. Archibald, 37 W. Va. 778, 17 S. E. Rep. 299; Bon Aqua Imp. Co. v. Insurance Co., 34 W. Va. 764, 12 S. E. Rep. 771.

Where one party has admitted the due incorporation of the other in the facts agreed in the case, he will not be allowed in that case to question the existence of such fact. Nat. Building & Loan Ass'n v. Ashworth, 91 Va. 706, 22 S. E. Rep. 521.

When Court Will Notice Incorporation Ex Officio. Banks.—Where the charter of a corporation in a public act, e. g., the charter of a bank, it is not necessary for the corporation in bringing an action to prove its incorporation. Northwestern Bank v. Machir, 18 W. Va. 271; Hays v. Northwestern Bank, 9 Gratt. 127; Stribbling v. Bank, 5 Rand. 132.

Extension of Such Charters.—And the court will take judicial cognizance, not only of the original charter of a bank; but likewise of acceptance by the bank of an extension of its charter. Farmers' Bank v. Willis, 7 W. Va. 31.

Railroads.—The acts of the Legislature conferring corporate powers on the B. & O. R. Co. are public acts and will be noticed by the court ex officio. Hart v. B. & O. R. Co., 6 W. Va. 336; State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

Charters of Private Corporations Created under General Law and Printed with Public Acts.—Though the court expressly declined to decide the question, as not necessary to the decision in that case, Bon Aqua Imp. Co. v. Insurance Co., 34 W. Va. 764, 12 S. E. Rep. 771, they plainly indicated that, if the case arose, they would hold that the courts would take judicial notice of private corporations created under general law, whose certificates were printed with the public acts of the Legislature, in accordance with sec. 19, ch. 54, Code W. Va. 1891.

But an Act Creating a Rolling Mill, Private.—An act of the Legislature chartering a rolling mill is a private act, hence the provision of sec. 4203 of the Code, excluding from the operation of the Code any act passed between the 15th of March, 1887, and the 1st of May, 1888, does not apply, this provision referring merely to public acts. Va. Devel. Co. v. Crozer Iron Co., 90 Va. 126, 17 S. E. Rep. 806.

Inability of Corporation to Make an Affidavit.—In a suit against a corporation, a replication to a plea of the statute of limitations by the corporation, to the effect that the plaintiff could not truly make the affidavit prescribed by sec. 27, ch. 106, Code W. Va. 1868 is bad, since a plaintiff is excused from making such an affidavit in a suit against a corporation, the corporation on its part being unable to make an affidavit. Stuart v. Greenbrier Co., 16 W. Va. 95. The same is true where a corporation is plaintiff. Bank v. Handley, 14 W. Va. 823.

Answer of Corporation Must Be under Common Seal, Effect.—A corporation cannot be sworn and therefore must put in its answer under its common seal only. If the plaintiff wishes to have a sworn answer, he must make some of the officers or members of the corporation parties. The answer of a corporation not being verified by affidavit, is no evidence for the defendant, though responsive to the bill; but it puts the allegation to which it responds in issue and imposes on the plaintiff the burden of proving it. This is its effect on a motion to dissolve an injunction, as well as on the hearing of the cause. B. & O. R. Co. v. Wheeling, 13 Gratt. 40; B. & O. R. Co. v. Gallahue, 12 Gratt. 655; Jeter v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 433, 14 S. E. Rep. 146.

Bill of Discovery against Corporation Alone, Must Be Dismissed.—Since corporations cannot answer under oath, but only under their corporate seal, a bill of discovery against a corporation alone must be dismissed. The proper method is to make such officers or shareholders as are personally cognizant of the facts wanted, parties defendant along with the corporation. Roanoke St. R. Co. v. Hicks, 96 Va. 516, 32 S. E. Rep. 295; Jeter v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 433, 14 S. E. Rep. 146.

Pleading of Corporation Should Be Verified by Affidavit of Someone Conversant with the Facts.—A pleading of a corporation should be verified by the affidavit of the president or some other officer conversant with the facts, the affidavit of the attorney at law of the corporation is not sufficient, BRANNON, P., saying: "What would he know of the indebtedness, unless he should show that he was personally cognizant of the facts? Doubtless there are instances, in which an attorney may make affidavit for a corporation; but this is an instance where the affidavit calls for personal knowledge of the facts, the account between the parties, if any instance does." In such affidavit the affiant must state the facts, as of his own knowledge, and not as hearsay. Quesenberry v. B. & L. Ass'n, 44 W. Va. 512, 30 S. E. Rep. 73.

In Pleas to the Jurisdiction, Corporations Must Appear by Its President, Not in Person or by Attorney.—A corporation cannot, in pleas to the jurisdiction, appear either in person or by attorney, but must appear by its president. Quarrier v. Insurance Co., 10 W. Va. 507.

Form of Plea.—A plea to the jurisdiction by a corporation should conclude "whether the court can or will take further cognizance of the action aforesaid" not "that the plaintiff's aforesaid action may abate and be dismissed." The affidavit also should be positive and not "as affiant verily believes."

Further, the necessary facts should be alleged to have existed when the action was brought, not merely when the plea was filed. The language of the plea in these respects should have been "That the cause of action, if any such cause there was, did not, nor did any part thereof, arise in said county of Kanawha, and the principal office of the said corporation was not, and the president, who is its chief officer, did not, reside in that county at the time said action was brought, but its office and his residence were at the time and ever since have been, and now are in the county of Ohio, and in the last named county, there arose the cause of action and every part thereof, if any such cause there was." Quarrier v. Insurance Co., 10 W. Va. 507; Guarantee Co. v. Nat. Bank, 95 Va. 480, 28 S. E. Rep. 909.

One Party to a Contract Not Disqualified to Testify because Other Party is a Corporation.—A corporation must of necessity contract through its agents, and is incapable of testifying except through the mouth of its agents. Its incapacity to testify does not, however, operate to exclude the testimony of a party with whom it has made a contract or had a transaction, which is the subject of a suit between them, because it is not incapacitated to testify by reason of death, insanity, infamy, or other legal cause, the causes specified by the statute, whose existence shall disqualify the other party as a witness in his own favor, unless he be first called to testify in favor of the party who is incapable of testifying by reason of some one of the causes so specified. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 95 Va. 445, 28 S. E. Rep. 594; Kelly v. Board, 75 Va. 263.

Death of Other Party Does Not Disqualify Agent of the Corporation.—The agent of a corporation is not disqualified to testify by the death of the other party to a transaction, the original parties to which were the corporation and the said party. Unless the agent is one of the "original parties" to the contract, he is not incompetent; the test of competency being not the fact to which such party is called to testify, but the contract or other transaction, which is the subject of investigation. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 95 Va. 445, 28 S. E. Rep. 594; First Nat. Bank v. Terry, 99 Va. —, 6 Va. Law Reg. 770.

IX. FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

A. NO LEGAL EXISTENCE OUTSIDE OF STATE CREATING THEM.—A corporation exists only in contemplation of law, and by force of law, and can have no legal existence beyond the bounds of the state or sovereignty by which it is created. Rece v. Newport News & M. V. Co., 32 W. Va. 164, 9 S. E. Rep. 214.

Not "Citizens" within the Language of the Federal Constitution.

Power of Legislature to Exclude Them.—The clause of the federal constitution, art. 4, § 2, declaring that the citizens of each state are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states, does not apply to corporations. SAMUELS, J., in Slaughter v. Com., 13 Gratt. 767, said: "I have no doubt of the power of the general assembly of Virginia to forbid foreign corporations from engaging in any pursuit within the state; and, of consequence, to grant permission to engage therein only upon terms; and that a statute imposing a fine for doing business without a license. Code Va. 1849, ch. 38, § 25, is clearly within the scope of their legitimate powers."

If Admitted, it May Exercise All Its Charter Powers Unless in Contravention of the Laws or Policy of the State.—When a state permits a foreigner to come into its territory for the purpose of carrying on its business it must be presumed to have consented that that company should exercise all of the powers conferred by its charter and the general laws appertaining thereto, unless prohibited from doing so by the direct enactments of the state or by some rule of public policy to be deduced from the general course of legislation. Bockover v. Life Ass'n, 77 Va. 85.

Statutory Provisions for Admission.

Foreign Corporations, to Sustain an Action, Need Not Allege Compliance with Such Statute.

Defendant Must Plead and Prove Such Non-Compliance.—It is not necessary for a foreign corporation, in order to sustain its action, to set forth in its complaint that it has complied with the laws of the state which entitled it to do business therein, but this defense, if available, is a matter to be pleaded and proved by the defendant. Nickels v. Build. & Loan Ass'n, 93 Va. 380, 25 S. E. Rep. 8.

And He Must State in What Respect the Plaintiff Has Failed.—If the fact relied on by the appellee is that the appellant corporation has not complied with the requirements of the law, requiring a foreign corporation to have an office in the state, Code Va. 1887, § 1104, it is essential that the appellee allege in his bill in what particular the appellant has failed. Nat. Build. & Loan Ass'n v. Ashworth, 91 Va. 706, 22 S. E. Rep. 521; 1 Va. Law Reg. 519.

Effect of Compliance.

Still Nonresidents within the Meaning of the Attachment Laws.—Whilst a corporation may by its agents transact business anywhere, unless prohibited by its charter or by local laws, it can have no residence or citizenship, except where it is located by the authority of its charter. Hence a foreign corporation by complying with the requirements of the Va. statute, Code 1873, ch. 36, § 19, Code 1887, ch. 53, for doing business in the state of Virginia by making a deposit and appointing a resident agent, etc., is not a resident of Virginia within the meaning of the foreign attachment laws and the property of such corporation is liable to attachment as a nonresident. Cowardin v. Ins. Co., 32 Gratt. 445.

The appointment by a foreign corporation of an attorney in West Virginia to accept service of process. Code W. Va., ch. 54, sec. 24, does not make it a domestic corporation; it is still liable to attachment as a foreign corporation. Quesenberry v. Ass'n, 44 W. Va. 512, 30 S. E. Rep. 73; Savage v. Ass'n, 45 W. Va. 275, 31 S. E. Rep. 991.

A statute merely enabling a foreign corporation to hold property or do business in this state and have the same powers, rights and privileges and be subject to the same regulations, restrictions and liabilities, as domestic corporations, Code W. Va., ch. 54, § 30, does not make it a domestic corporation, and it may be proceeded against by attachment as a foreign corporation. Savage v. Ass'n, 45 W. Va. 275, 31 S. E. Rep. 991; Quesenberry v. Ass'n, 44 W. Va. 512, 30 S. E. Rep. 73.

But Cannot Be Required to Give Security for Costs.—A foreign corporation which has complied with the requirements of sec. 24, ch. 54, Code W. Va., as to appointing a resident agent is not to be considered a nonresident, so as to be required to give security for costs as plaintiff. Marmet Co. v. Archibald, 37 W. Va. 778, 17 S. E. Rep. 299.

Are Residents for the Purpose Being Sued.—But by compliance with the terms of such statute a foreign corporation is to be considered, for the purpose of being sued, as domiciled in Virginia and is entitled to rely on the statute of limitations just as if it had been chartered by the legislature of Virginia. Insurance Co. v. Duerson, 28 Gratt. 630; Cowardin v. Insurance Co., 32 Gratt. 445, approved in Hall v. Bank of Va., 14 W. Va. 584; Abell v. Insurance Co., 18 W. Va. 400. But where afterwards such corporation ceases to do business in the state and neglects to appoint an agent and otherwise fulfill the requirements of the statute, this is a withdrawal from the state and an obstruction of the plaintiff and such period is not to be counted in the running of the statute of limitations, in accordance with sec. 18, ch. 104, Code of W. Va. Abell v. Insurance Co., 18 W. Va. 400.

Corporations Existing When Constitution of West Virginia Adopted in 1860.—Under the 8th section of art. 11 of the constitution of West Virginia providing that the common law and laws of Virginia at the time of the constitution, not repugnant thereto, shall be and continue the law of West Virginia until altered or repealed by the Legislature, the charter of a bank incorporated in Virginia, having branches in West Virginia is continued in full force, unless repugnant to the constitution, as a domestic corporation of West Virginia and cannot be proceeded against as a foreign corporation by attachment or otherwise. Nor is the case of Parker v. Donnally, 4 W. Va. 648, even impliedly in conflict with this doctrine. Farmers' Bank v. Gettinger, 4 W. Va. 305.

But during the war all power of a Virginia corporation to do business in West Virginia was suspended and it was proper to proceed against it by attachment as a foreign corporation. Hall v. Bank of Va., 14 W. Va. 584.

Effect on Contracts of Non-Compliance.—A contract made by a foreign corporation before it has complied with the statutory prerequisites to the right to do business in another state will not on that account be held absolutely void, unless the statute expressly so declares; and, if the statute imposes a penalty upon the corporation for failing to comply with such prerequisites, such penalty will be deemed exclusive of all others. Toledo Tie & Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 33 W. Va. 566, 11 S. E. Rep. 37; Building Ass'n v. Snyder, 98 Va. 710, 37 S. E. Rep. 298; 1 Va. Law Reg. 524, and note.

B. SUITS BY AND AGAINST.

Power of a Foreign Corporation to Sue in Virginia Courts.—A foreign corporation may sue in our courts upon a contract with them, valid according to the laws of the country in which the contract was made, unless contrary to the policy of the laws of Virginia. Rees v. Conococheague Bank, 5 Rand. 326; Bank of Marietta v. Pindall, 2 Rand. 465; Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh 471; Freeman's Bank v. Ruckman, 16 Gratt. 126.

But no foreign bank can sue on a primary contract made in Virginia by discounting notes or otherwise. Bank of Marietta v. Pindall, 2 Rand. 465.

Power of Receiver, etc., of Foreign Corporation to Sue in Virginia Courts.—The law is now settled by an irresistible preponderance of authority that a receiver, trustee, or assignee of a foreign corporation, with general powers over the property of such corporation, has the right, by virtue of the comity existing between the various states of this Union, to sue for any debt, claim, or property owing to or belonging to such corporation. Swing v. Bentley & Gerwig Furniture Co., 45 W. Va. 283, 31 S. E. Rep. 925.

Power of Local Courts over Foreign Corporations. Will Not Interfere with Their Internal Management.—It seems to be well settled that the domestic courts will not interfere with the management of the internal affairs of a foreign corporation. The reasons for such a rule are apparent. Courts other than those of the state creating it, and in which it has its habitat, have no visitorial powers over such corporation, nor any authority to remove its officers, or to punish them for misconduct committed in the state which created it, or to enforce a forfeiture of its charter. Neither have they the power to compel obedience to their orders, or to enforce their decrees. Taylor v. Mutual, etc., Life Ass'n, 97 Va. 67, 33 S. E. Rep. 385.

A Virginia court will not enjoin a foreign corporation from forfeiting the policy of insurance of a citizen of Virginia nor require it to exhibit its books, papers, etc., since it has no means of enforcing such decrees. Nor can a court under such circumstances proceed to construe the contract and thus render the matter "res judicata," since it has no jurisdiction of it. Taylor v. Mutual, etc., Life Ass'n, 97 Va. 60, 33 S. E. Rep. 385.

But They Will Protect a Local Stockholder's Individual Rights.—Where the act complained of affects the complainant solely in his capacity as a member of the corporation, whether it be as stockholder, director, president, or other officer, and is the act of the corporation, whether acting in stockholders' meeting or through its agents, the board of directors, then such action is the management of the internal affairs of the corporation, and in the case of a foreign corporation our courts will not take jurisdiction. Where, however, the act of the foreign corporation complained of affects the complainant's individual rights only, then our courts will take jurisdiction whenever the cause of action arises here. Taylor v. Mutual, etc., Life Ass'n, 97 Va. 68, 33 S. E. Rep. 385.

How Jurisdiction of Foreign Corporation May Be Acquired.—Jurisdiction over a foreign corporation by the domestic courts can only be acquired in one of three ways. By the cause of action or part thereof having arisen in the state, Code Va., § 3215; by being sued with another who is a resident thereof, § 3214, par. 1, or by having estate or debts owing to it within the state, § 3214, par. 4. Guarantee Co. v. Nat. Bank, 95 Va. 480, 28 S. E. Rep. 909.

Suit May Be Brought in Any County Where Corporation Has Estate or Debts Due It.—A suit against a foreign corporation may be brought in any county wherein it has estate or debts due. It is a nonresident under clause 3, § 1, ch. 123, Code W. Va. Quesenberry v. B. & L. Ass'n, 44 W. Va. 512, 30 S. E. Rep. 73.

Under the act, 1 R. C. 1819, p. 474, ch. 123, directing the method of proceeding in courts of equity against absent debtors, a creditor of a corporation created by another state may maintain a suit in equity against such corporation, as a defendant out of this commonwealth, where there are persons within the same who have in their hands effects of, or are indebted to, such absent defendant; or may maintain a suit in equity against such corporation as an absent defendant, where it has lands or tenements within the commonwealth. Bank of U. S. v. Merchants' Bank, 1 Rob. 573.

In West Virginia Suit May Be Brought in Any County Where the Corporation Does Business.—A foreign corporation is liable to suit or garnishment in any county of West Virginia wherein it does business and has an agent upon whom process may be legally served according to sec. 7, ch. 124, Code W. Va. 1891, although the course of action arose without the state. Code W. Va., ch. 123, sec. 1; Mahany v. Kephart, 15 W. Va. 609.

Legislature May Authorize Suit "in Personam" if Process Can Be Legally Served on Foreign Corporation.—It is within the power of a state legislature to authorize a suit against a foreign corporation in personam as well as in rem. Hence a foreign corporation doing business in West Virginia may be sued in any particular county of said state by clause 2, sec. 1, ch. 123, Code W. Va. 1891, provided service of process can be lawfully had by sec. 7, ch. 124. Humphreys v. Newport News, etc., R. Co., 33 W. Va. 135, 10 S. E. Rep. 39.

When Local Courts Will Render a Personal Decree.

Actual Service of Process or Appearance Necessary.—A personal decree for specific performance may be rendered against a foreign corporation when actual service of process has been made within the state under the provisions of the Code W. Va., ch. 124, sec. 7. Shafer v. O'Brien, 31 W. Va. 601, 8 S. E. Rep. 298; Crumlish v. R. Co., 28 W. Va. 623.

In Gilchrist v. Land Co., 21 W. Va. 115, the court was forced to follow the construction of the New York courts in holding that no personal decree could be rendered against foreign corporations unless it had appeared, but the doctrine of Shafer v. O'Brien, 31 W. Va. 601, 8 S. E. Rep. 298, is that of the West Virginia courts.

Not Necessary for a Decree in Rem.—It is not denied that a corporation, like an individual, cannot be bound personally, unless it appears or is, by proper summons within its jurisdiction, brought before the court; but it cannot be questioned, that a court may, without personal service, take jurisdiction of the property of a nonresident person or foreign corporation, and its decree, to the extent that it takes possession and disposes of the property within its jurisdiction, will be binding upon all parties affected or interested whether resident or nonresident. Crumlish v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 623; Dillard v. Cent. Va. Iron Co., 82 Va. 734, 1 S. E. Rep. 124.

Cannot Be Compelled to Answer.—A foreign corporation cannot be compelled to file an answer. B. & O. R. Co. v. Wheeling, 13 Gratt. 40.

Suit to Settle the Affairs of a Foreign Corporation May Be Brought in Circuit Court in West Virginia.—The doctrine of Nimick v. Iron Works, 25 W. Va. 184, that a general suit to settle the affairs of a foreign corporation must be brought in the state of its domicile, has been superseded by sec. 58, 59, ch. 53, Code W. Va., which gives the circuit court jurisdiction of such suits. Swing v. Furniture Co., 45 W. Va. 283, 31 S. E. Rep. 925; Swing v. Veneer & Panel Co., 45 W. Va. 288, 31 S. E. Rep. 926.

Removal of Suits to Federal Courts.

A Corporation is a Citizen of the State Creating It.—Where a corporation is created by the laws of a state, the legal presumption is that all its members are citizens of the state by which it was created: and in a suit by or against it, it is conclusively presumed to be a citizen of such state. Rece v. Newport News & M. V. Co., 32 W. Va. 164, 9 S. E. Rep. 214. See full discussion in Hall v. Bank of Va., 14 W. Va. 584.

Citizenship of Stockholders Immaterial.—Where the plaintiff and defendant corporation are both corporations of Virginia the owners of the stock, though nonresidents, are not entitled to have the cause removed to the federal courts. Wash. Alex. & Georg. R. Co. v. Alex. & Wash. R. Co., 19 Gratt. 592

Corporations Created by Two or More States.

Distinct Corporations, Citizens of Each State.—While a corporation, by the same name, may be chartered by two states, clothed with the same capacities and powers, and intended to accomplish the same objects, and be exercising the same powers and duties in both states, yet it will, in law, be two distinct corporations,—one in each state,—with only such corporate powers in each state as are conferred by its creation in that state. Rece v. Newport News & M. V. Co., 32 W. Va. 164, 9 S. E. Rep. 212.

A railroad extending through two or more states and incorporated by the laws of each is not a joint corporation of the two states but a separate corporation in each state subject only to the laws of each state within the respective jurisdictions, however those laws may conflict as to the operation of the road, and one state cannot impose any restrictions or limitations upon the exercise of corporate powers in the other. Atwood v. R. Co., 85 Va. 966, 9 S. E. Rep. 748.

Such a corporation is a citizen of each state in respect of its rights of suing and being sued in the federal courts, i. e. it cannot sue or be sued in such courts by a citizen of any state in which it is incorporated. And at all events a corporation which is chartered in West Virginia and has accepted its charter by actually doing business there, must, in a suit in the West Virginia courts, be regarded as a domestic corporation resident in West Virginia. Hall v. Bank of Va., 14 W. Va. 584.

A Corporation Rechartered or Licensed to Do Business in More Than One State.—A railroad corporation may have an existence for the purpose of suing and being sued by the citizens thereof in more than one state, if chartered or licensed to build its road and do business in more than one. So the B. & O. R. Co. is a domestic corporation in West Virginia and as such is liable to be sued there and when sued there by a citizen of that state, in a state court such suit cannot be removed into the federal courts and those courts have no jurisdiction in such a case. B. & O. R. Co. v. P. W. & Ky. R. Co., 17 W. Va. 812; Goshorn v. Board, 1 W. Va. 307.

The B. & O. R. Co. under the charter granted by the legislature of Virginia re-enacting the Maryland charter and conferring the same rights and privileges, is a Virginia corporation and liable to be sued in Virginia. B. & O. R. Co. v. Gallahue, 12 Gratt. 655.

Necessary Allegations of Citizenship.—In a petition for the removal of a cause to the federal courts on the ground that defendant is a foreign corporation, it is necessary to allege not only that it is a citizen of another state but also that it is not a resident of Virginia, since a foreign corporation may become a resident of any state for the purposes of suit. Guarantee Co. v. Nat. Bank, 95 Va. 480, 28 S. E. Rep. 909.

When Motion for Removal Must Be Made.—A motion for removal to a federal court on account of diversity of citizenship is not made too late when made after a trial before a justice, a justice's court not being a "state court" within the language of the act of Congress. Rathbone Oil Tract Co. v. Rauch, 5 W. Va. 79.

Foreign Corporation Leasing Railroad in Virginia Liable to Suit in Virginia Courts.—Where a railroad which was incorporated in another state leases a railroad lying in Virginia and operates the same as owner thereof and an injury occurs on said railroad, the person having the right of action for such injury may sue the railroad in the courts of Virginia, and such company has no right to remove the suit to the federal courts. B. & O. R. Co. v. Wightman, 29 Gratt. 431; B. & O. R. Co. v. Noell, 32 Gratt. 394. So also where a corporation is rechartered in West Virginia or receives a license to extend its system into West Virginia. B. & O. R. Co. v. P. W. & Ky. R. Co., 17 W. Va. 812.

In West Virginia an Agreement Not to Remove Suits to Federal Courts as Condition of Admission within the State is Void.—So much of section 30, ch. 54, of Code of West Virginia, as declares that foreign railroad corporations, doing business in West Virginia shall, in all suits and legal proceedings, be held and treated as domestic corporations of West Virginia, and requires any such corporation to file an agreement to that effect, is, so far as it attempts to deprive such corporation of the right to remove to the federal courts suits brought by or against it in the courts of West Virginia, in cases in which it would otherwise be entitled to such right, inoperative and void; and such foreign corporation may exercise such right in any proper case, notwithstanding it has executed and filed such agreement in pursuance of the provisions of said statute. Rece v. Newport News & M. V. Co., 32 W. Va. 164, 9 S. E. Rep. 212.

Cannot Contract as to Jurisdiction of Suits.—A provision endorsed on the certificates of stock issued by a foreign corporation, that any action brought against said corporation by its stockholders shall be brought in a certain county of the state of its domicil, is void, as jurisdiction cannot be taken away by consent. Savage v. B. & L. Ass'n, 45 W. Va. 275, 31 S. E. Rep. 991.

C. TAXATION OF FOREIGN CORPORATIONS, STATE MAY TAX THEM, IF IT DOES NOT DISCRIMINATE AGAINST NONRESIDENTS.—It is competent for a state to impose a tax upon individuals or corporations within its territory; and such tax, if it does not discriminate against nonresidents or the products of other states, may be upon the property, or franchises, or the business, of the individual or corporation; and its validity is not at all affected by the consideration that the party is engaged in foreign as well as domestic trade and traffic. West. U. Tel. Co. v. City of Richmond, 26 Gratt. 26.

It May Be in the Form of a License Tax.—"The council of the city of Richmond has authority, under the charter of the city, to impose a license tax upon a foreign telegraph company having an agency in the city and doing business therein. And there is nothing in the constitutions and laws of Virginia or of the United States which forbids such a tax, if it is equal and just in its provisions. Though the ordinance of the city speaks only of persons or firms doing business in the city, yet, as it imposes a tax in terms on telegraph companies, it is obviously intended to include incorporated companies as well as individuals. Corporations are to be deemed and taken as persons when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of natural persons expressly included in a statute." Western Union Telegraph Co. v. City of Richmond, 26 Gratt. 1.

A statute imposing a license tax on foreign corporations and not on those created by Virginia is not in contravention of the Virginia constitution, art. X, sec. 1, providing that taxation shall be equal and uniform, since that does not apply to taxes on licenses, whose values are too unequal to be taxed uniformly. Slaughter v. Com., 13 Gratt. 767.

When Residents within Meaning of Revenue Laws.—A foreign corporation, which has a place of business in Virginia where it sells its machines and has paid the required state tax, is a resident merchant in the meaning of the revenue laws of Virginia. Webber v. Com., 33 Gratt. 898.

Agencies of the Federal Government.

State May Tax Their Property but Not the Instrumentalities of the Government in Their Possession.—The cases recognize a distinction between taxation of the property belonging to a private corporation employed by the government, and taxation of the instrumentalities or means of the government in the possession of such corporation. The state may tax a banking institution; but it cannot tax the currency or the government's bonds belonging to such bank. It may tax the railroad, but not the mail or the munitions or other property of the government. It may tax the contractor with the government, though not the contract. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. City of Richmond, 26 Gratt. 2.

Provided Congress Has Not Exempted Them from State Taxation.—Corporations, which derive their existence and exercise their franchises under authority of state laws, but are employed by the national government for certain duties and services, may be exempted by Congress from any state taxation which will really prevent or impede such services, yet in the absence of legislation by Congress to indicate that such exemption is deemed essential to the performance of governmental services, it cannot be claimed on the mere ground that the corporation is employed as an agency of the government. And the tax may be either upon the property or business of the corporation. Western Union Tel. Co. v. City of Richmond, 26 Gratt. 2.

Manufacturing a Patented Article Gives No Exemption.—The fact that a foreign corporation is manufacturing a patented article does not entitle it to sell them in Virginia without complying with the requirements of the state revenue laws. Webber v. Com., 33 Gratt. 898.

D. EFFECT OF WAR ON POWERS OF FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.—A corporation chartered under the laws of Virginia before the late civil war and having its office and place of business, its officers and directory in the city of Richmond, if not actually dissolved, at least was, so far as to suspend its power to make assessments on property outside the jurisdiction of the Confederate government during the war, as being against the policy of the law. 778 *Burner v. The Commonwealth.

(Absent, ALLEN, P.)

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

1. Indictment against Ordinary Keeper—Sufficiency of.—An indictment which charges that the defendant, on a day and time specified, kept an ordinary without obtaining a license to do so, is sufficient, without setting out the facts of his furnishing for compensation lodging or diet, &c.
2. Same—Surplusage.—Such an indictment, with the addition that he continued to keep the ordinary from the day stated to another subsequent day, is not defective: the continuando is mere surplusage.
3. Same—Case at Bar.—A person having a license to keep a house of private entertainment cannot be convicted of keeping an unlicensed ordinary by proving the sale by him of spirits to be drunk at the house of private entertainment, the place of sale, in addition to the furnishing for compensation diet, lodging and provender at that place.†

At the September term 1854 of the Circuit court of Shenandoah, Noah J. Burner was indicted for keeping an ordinary at his house in said county without having obtained a license to do so. There was a verdict and judgment for thirty dollars against the defendant: Whereupon he applied to this court for a writ of error, which was allowed. The case is stated by Judge Samuels in his opinion.

J. W. F. Allen, for the appellant.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

SAMUELS, J. An indictment containing two counts, was found against Noah J. Burner, in the Circuit court of Shenandoah county. The first count alleged, "that Noah J. Burner, on the first day of 779 August 1854, at *his house in Powell's Fort in the county aforesaid, did keep an ordinary without obtaining a license to do so, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided," &c. The second count differs from the first only in alleging the keeping of the ordinary to have been on the second day of August 1854, and from that time to the first day of September 1854. A separate demurrer was filed by the plaintiff in error to each count in the indictment, in which the attorney for the commonwealth joined; the plea of not guilty was also filed and issue made up thereon. The Circuit court overruled the demurrer to the first count, and sustained that to the second count. On the trial of the issue upon the first count the jury found the plaintiff guilty and assessed a fine of thirty dollars; and the court rendered a judgment for the fine. In the progress of the trial several exceptions were taken by the plaintiff to several opinions of the court; and the case is brought to this court to correct errors alleged to exist in the record.

The prosecution was had under the several provisions of the statutes, ch. 38, § 4, 9; and ch. 96, § 1 of the Code of Virginia.

It may be doubted whether the difference between the two counts in the indictment be such as to require a different judgment upon the demurrers to them respectively; the continuando in the second count could not have the effect of making the offense charged therein different from that charged in the first count; it should be regarded as mere surplusage, and did not vitiate, if the count would have been good without it. Code, ch. 207, § 11, p. 770. The commonwealth, however, was not prejudiced by the error herein, if it be error, as any conviction which could be had under the second count, may be had as well under the first count.

I was strongly inclined to doubt
780 the sufficiency of *either count. It seemed to me that the specific facts of furnishing, for compensation, lodging or diet to a person boarding in his house, or provender for a horse feeding in his stable or on his land, (except a drove of live stock and persons attending it,) and selling by retail wine or ardent spirits, or a mixture thereof, to be drunk in or at the place of sale, or such of these things as would constitute the keeping an ordinary, should be alleged to have been done by the plaintiff without license; that the facts themselves and not the conclusion of law upon them should have been alleged. A majority of the court, however, is of a different opinion, and hold that the indictment in the language of the statute creating the offense is sufficient, under many decisions of the late General court, and of the English courts. I therefore waive my doubts, and concur in holding that the demurrer to the first count was properly overruled.

Upon the trial of the issue the commonwealth offered evidence tending to prove that the plaintiff, at the time and place alleged in the indictment, had sold spirits to be drunk there; and for compensation had furnished diet for persons and provender for horses without having a license to keep an ordinary. The plaintiff in error gave in evidence a license from the County court of Shenandoah to keep a house of private entertainment at the place and time in the indictment alleged.

Five several instructions from the court to the jury were prayed for by the plaintiff in error. Of these the first, second, third and fourth in substance propound the same proposition of law, to wit, that if the plaintiff had a license to keep a house of private entertainment, he could not be convicted for keeping an unlicensed ordinary, by proving the sale by him of spirits to be drunk at the house of private entertainment, the place of sale, in addition to 781 the furnishing, *for compensation, diet, lodging and provender at that place. These instructions, I think, propound the law correctly.

The statute, Code, ch. 96, § 1, declares who shall be deemed the keeper of an ordinary. To make up this character a person must for compensation furnish either diet or lodging to a person boarding in his house, or provender for a horse feeding in his stable or on his land; and also sell by retail wine or ardent spirits or a mixture thereof, to be drunk in or at the place of sale. The second section of the statute, ch. 96, declares who shall be deemed the keeper of a house of private entertainment. If he for a time not exceeding one month, if within, or not exceeding a week, if without a city or town, furnish for compensation lodging or diet to one boarding in his house, or provender for a horse feeding in his stable or on his land, except as aforesaid, he shall, if he be not the keeper of an ordinary, according to the preceding section, be deemed to keep a house of private entertainment, unless the place of furnishing the same, when without a city or town, be more than eight hundred yards from a public road or highway. Thus it is seen the subject of diet, or lodging or provender are common to both definitions. One or more of these subjects must be united to the sale of wine, &c. to be drunk, &c. to make an ordinary. It is of the essence of an ordinary that they be combined. If, however, a party have a license to furnish diet, lodging and provender as keeper of a house of private entertainment, he cannot be indicted for doing those things, or any of them: he is justified by law. Thus it seems that as to one part of the offense he cannot be found guilty; and the remaining part of the offense, the sale of wine, &c. to be drunk, &c. if proved, will not sustain an indictment for keeping an ordinary; but it will be an offense punishable under 782 § 18, ch. 38 of the *Code. The law makers seemed to have intended to fix a gradation of offenses, and to graduate the punishment accordingly; the sale of wine, &c. without license, to be drunk at the place of, or elsewhere, is punished by a fine of thirty dollars; § 18; that of keeping unlicensed private entertainment by a fine not exceeding fifty dollars; § 9; that of keeping an unlicensed ordinary, which includes the less offense last above mentioned and also the sale of wine, &c. to be drunk, &c. by a fine not less than thirty nor more than one hundred dollars.

I am thus led to the conclusion that if the plaintiff had the license to keep the house of private entertainment, that in going beyond his license and selling wine, &c. to be drunk, &c. he did not incur the guilt of keeping an unlicensed ordinary.

It was said by the attorney general in the argument here, that as the first four instructions moved for by the plaintiff in error were in substance the same, and as the first and third were given as prayed for, the Circuit court was justified in refusing the second and fourth, because they had already been substantially given; and it would be an idle repetition to give them again. If the Circuit court had placed its refusal upon this ground, and had so informed the jury, there would have been no error of which complaint could be made. The court, however, by a simple refusal without more, left the jury to draw the obvious inference that the instructions refused did not state the law correctly; thus putting the jury in a condition to be misled by the rulings of the court. It is against the theory of trial by jury to confide to their sagacity the duty of extracting the law from contradictory rulings of the court.

However the case may stand in regard to any conflict of decisions on the plaintiff's instructions, there can be no doubt that the one given at the instance of 783 *the commonwealth's attorney, is in conflict with those given at the instance of the plaintiff. This instruction propounds the law to be that the furnishing diet, &c. and the sale of wine, &c. without an ordinary license, of themselves make the offense of keeping an unlicensed ordinary; thus denying all effect whatever to the license to keep private entertainment in mitigating the offense: and this although the unlicensed furnishing diet did not take place. This instruction moreover mistakes the law to be that a sale of wine, &c. of itself, without regard to the place at which it is to be drunk, may form part of the offense of keeping an unlicensed ordinary; the statute in terms prescribes that such sale must be made to be drunk at the place of sale, or it does not enter into the definition of an ordinary.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment, and award a new trial, upon which the Circuit court shall conform to the law as herein declared.

The other judges concurred.

The judgment was as follows:

It seems to the court here, that the plaintiff should not have been convicted of keeping an ordinary without license, without proof of such and so many of the acts as would make him the keeper of an ordinary under the statute, Code, ch. 96, § 1. That if he had a license to keep a house of private entertainment at the time and place in the indictment alleged, he was authorized by law to furnish for compensation the diet, lodging and provender, as mentioned in § 2 of the same statute; and as the unlicensed furnishing of these things, or one or more of them, must concur with the unlicensed sale of liquors named in the first section, to complete the offense of keeping an unlicensed ordinary, the plaintiff 784 could not be convicted *thereof, if he had a license to keep a house of private entertainment. Thus it seems to the court here, that the Circuit court erred in refusing to give the second and fourth instructions prayed for by the plaintiff, and that this error is not cured or obviated by the court's giving the first and third instructions, of the same substance as the second and fourth, without informing the jury that the second and fourth instructions were refused for reasons other than error therein.

It further seems to the court here, that the Circuit court erred in giving the instruction moved for by the attorney for the commonweatlh, as well because it is in conflict with the law as herein declared, as because it assumes that the unlicensed sale of liquor, without regard to the place where it is to be drunk, may enter into the offense of keeping an ordinary without license. Without deciding any other question made in the case, it is considered by the court that the judgment aforesaid be reversed and annulled; and it is ordered that the verdict of the jury be set aside, and the cause remanded to the Circuit court of Shenandoah county for a new trial to be had, upon which, if the evidence shall be substantially the same as that on the first trial, and the plaintiff shall again ask for the first, second, third and fourth instructions moved for on the first trial, the court directs that they be given; and that the instruction moved for by the commonwealth's attorney be refused.

785 *Bishop v. The Commonwealth.

(Absent ALLEN, P.)

January Term, 1856, Richmond.

1. Presentments—Requisites of.—A presentment of a grand jury, to be a proper foundation for an information, must contain every matter necessary to render the act imputed to the defendant unlawful; and the supposed offense must be described with at least reasonable certainty.

2. Gaming—Presentment Must Charge Public Place.—A presentment for playing at cards must charge that the place at which it occurred was a public place at the time of such playing; the name of the place not of itself importing that it was at all times a public place.

3. Same—Same—Same.—A presentment for playing at cards "at or near" a place, is objectionable for uncertainty.

4. Appellate Practice—Presentment—Motion to Quash.—Upon a rule to show cause why an information should not be filed, the defendant appears and moves the court to quash the presentment on the ground that it does not charge any offense against him; but the motion is overruled. The information is then filed, and he pleads "not guilty;" and on the trial there is a verdict and judgment against him. Upon a writ of error to the appellate court, he may object to the insufficiency of the presentment.

At the November term 1852 of the Circuit court of Prince George county, the grand jury presented Charles Bishop for playing at cards for money on a Sabbath, at or near Old Shop meeting-house in that county, within the preceding six months, contrary to law. On this presentment there was a summons to Bishop to show cause why an information should not be filed against him. On the return of the summons Bishop appeared by attorney, and objected to the filing of the information, on the ground that the presentment did not charge any offense against him. But the court overruled the objection; and the information was filed; to which 786 Bishop pleaded "not *guilty:" And upon the trial there was a verdict and judgment for the commonwealth. Bishop thereupon moved the court for a new trial, which was refused; and he excepted; and applied to this court for a writ of error, which was allowed.

John Lyon, for the appellant.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

LEE, J. According to the English practice a criminal information at the crown office is only allowed to be filed upon motion and a rule to show cause grounded upon a proper and legal affidavit: and this affidavit should be full and explicit, should disclose all the material facts of the case and contain all matters necessary to criminate the defendant. 5 Bac. Abr. (Bouv. ed.) "Informations," (D) p. 180; 1 Chit. C. L. 857; Arch. C. P. 73, 74. Our act of assembly expressly requires the leave of the court on a rule to show cause; but by our practice a previous presentment by the grand jury

*Gaming—Presentment Must Charge Public Place.—For the proposition that, a presentment (or indictment) for playing at cards must charge that the place at which it occurred was a public place at the time of such playing, the name of the place not of itself importing that it was at all times a public place, the principal case is cited and followed in State v. Brast, 31 W. Va. 383, 7 S. E. Rep. 12.

often comes in place of the affidavit required by the English rule. Where however it is thus sought to be made the ground of the rule to show cause, it must like the affidavit, contain enough to show that an offiense has been committed. No matter material to render the act imputed to the defendant unlawful can be omitted, and the supposed offense must be described with at least reasonable certainty. If it be defective in these respects, the presentment cannot avail for any legal purpose whatever.

The presentment in this case charges the defendant with playing at cards for money on a Sabbath at or near Old Shop meeting-house in the county of Prince George within six months previous thereto contrary to law: but it does not allege that Old Shop meeting-house was a public place at the time of such playing. It may or may not have been such public place at that 787 *time. The name of the place does not ex vi termini import that it was at all times a public place. Although whilst the public might be assembled there for religious worship or other purpose or whilst so assembling or afterwards dispersing, it might well be a public place within the meaning of the statute, yet at all other times it might be a strictly private place, the playing at which would not be a violation of the law. Thus a matter most material to show that an offense had been committed, was omitted and the presentment was therefore radically defective. Hord's Case, 4 Leigh 674; Roberts' Case, 10 Leigh 686. Nor will the words "contrary to law" supply the omission. These terms in an indictment serve to preclude all legal cause of excuse for the act imputed, but never to enlarge or extend the force and effect of those employed to describe it so as to make the act unlawful when it is not so by the description itself. In Roberts' Case, ubi sup. the charge was for "unlawfully" playing cards at a grocery, yet the presentment was held to be defective.

The presentment is also objectionable for uncertainty. If Old Shop meeting-house were ex vi termini, a public place playing near it would not necessarily be a violation of the statute unless at a place so near that it too was rendered a public place by reason of its proximity. The very place of the playing should therefore be averred to be a public place, and as it is laid in this presentment to have been in the alternative "at or near," it would seem on that account to be uncertain and defective.

That the defendant subsequently upon the filing of the information appeared and pleaded not guilty, upon which a trial was had and a verdict rendered against him will not preclude him from objecting to the presentment now. In Chalmers' Case, 2 Va. Cas. 76, and Wells' Case, Ibid. 333, the right to object to the presentment 788 *on which the information was founded was held to be taken away by such plea and verdict upon the information: but it does not appear that the defendant in either of those cases made the objection at the proper time upon the rule to show cause. In Wells' Case he did not appear at all upon the rule to show cause though duly summoned. In this case the defendant did appear upon the rule and showed for cause that the presentment did not charge any offense against him and moved the court to refuse leave to file an information. His objection was however overruled, the rule made absolute and leave given to file the information. After that all he could do was to defend himself upon the information as best he might.

I think the Circuit court erred in making the rule absolute and giving leave to file the information. And in this view it is rendered unnecessary to decide the question raised upon the facts approved at the trial.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment set aside the verdict and quash the information, to discharge the rule to show cause and quash the presentment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Judgment reversed, all the proceedings to the presentment set aside, and quashed.

789 *Commonwealth v. Nax.

(Absent ALLEN, P.)

April Term, 1856, Richmond.

Indictments*—Sale of Goods without License—Case at Bar.—An indictment which charges that the defendant "unlawfully did sell music not manufactured by the seller within the state without having a license therefor according to law," is good, it sufficiently appearing that music is a species of goods, wares and merchandise.

Joseph Nax was presented by the grand jury of the Corporation court of Fredericksburg, for that he "unlawfully did sell music not manufactured by the seller within this state, without having a license therefor according to law." He pleaded "not guilty," and on the trial of the case the jury found him guilty, and assessed his fine at eighty dollars. Nax thereupon moved the court to arrest the verdict, upon the ground that there was no offense charged in the presentment. But the court overruled the motion, and entered up a judgment upon the verdict. He then applied to the judge of the Circuit court of Spotsylvania for a writ of error, which was awarded; and upon the hearing of the case the Circuit court reversed the judgment of the Corporation court and arrested the verdict. Whereupon the attorney general applied to this court for a writ of error, which was allowed.

technical expressions are required to 790 be used; as in indictments for *murder, burglary, mayhem, and other felonies which it is not necessary to enumerate. In such cases no other words, howsoever descriptive of the offense, will be allowed to stand in the indictment as the substitutes for the precise language to which usage and precedent have attached the peculiar and exclusive office of describing the offense. The like nicety and particularity is also required in indictments for offenses under various statutes; and the precedents are numerous in which very slight departures from the terms in which the offenses are described in such statutes, have been held to vitiate the indictments. In the case of United States v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. R. 460, however, Judge Story, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme court, says, that such instances have not resulted in the establishment of any general rule; but that on the contrary, the course has been to leave every class of cases to be decided very much upon its own peculiar circumstances. And in United States v. Bachelder, 2 Gallis. R. 15, the court say that there is no general rule which requires more than that the offense be set forth with substantial accuracy and certainty to a reasonable intendment.

We have also the authority of the case of the King v. Stevens, 5 East's R. 244, for holding, that, whilst every indictment or information ought to contain a complete description of such facts and circumstances as constitute the offense, there is no rule, except in particular cases, where precise technical expressions are required to be used, which compels the courts, in construing the language of indictments, to reject the aid of such references to the context and the relation and dependence of the words, as are properly resorted to and found useful in ascertaining the true aim and meaning of other pleadings; and that, where a word, used in an indictment, is capable of different meanings, if it is sufficiently 791 marked by the context or *other means in what sense the party framing the charge intended to use it, it does not clash with the rules of construction applied to criminal proceedings, to construe it in that sense.

A proper application of these views to the case before us will, I think, result in showing the correctness of the judgment of the Corporation court, and the consequent error in that of the Circuit court.

The brief charge in the indictment is, that the defendant "unlawfully did sell music not manufactured by the seller within this state, without having a license therefor according to law."

There is no law which forbids the sale of music in terms. But by the 30th section of the act of 1852-3, concerning the assessment and collection of the public revenue, it is declared that no person shall, without obtaining a license as a merchant, sell at any store or place in this state any goods, wares, merchandise or other articles, except such as may have been manufactured by the seller in this state, or been produced or raised by him, &c.: And it is under this law that the indictment has been preferred, and the verdict and judgment had against the defendant.

In this state of things, the enquiries, which would seem to present themselves, are: Is "music" in any well established sense, embraced by the words "goods, wares or merchandise." And if so, does it appear with certainty that the indictment speaks of it in that sense? If so then the indictment in effect charges the sale of goods, wares or merchandise, and specifies the particular class or kind in the sale of which the statute has been violated. That there is such an acceptation of the word, is a matter of public knowledge and general information. The word is used in that sense in the daily advertisements, and the kind of merchandise it imports is to be found exhibited for sale in the store of nearly every bookseller or stationer 792 *in the country. It is said, however, that the word is ambiguous; that it has several other meanings; and that without an averment in the indictment of its being goods, wares or merchandise, the sense in which the word was used is not fixed with certainty; that one learned in the science, or skilled in the arts of a musician may impart instructions therein, or make exhibition of his skill, or grant the license to perform his musical works or compositions, for a price, and that in each of these senses he may be said to "sell music"; and that for none of these acts could he be held amenable as for a violation of the statute; and that, consequently, though the defendant were to admit the truth of every allegation in the indictment, (as he does in the motion to arrest the judgment,) he would not as a legal necessity admit that he had done an illegal act.

The obvious answer to this argument of the defendant's counsel is, that in none of the instances supposed by him, is there a sale in the sense in which that word is most usually received; which is, to indicate the exchange of some material article of property for money; and that the words in the indictment, "not manufactured by the seller within the state," do not admit of any other than the most awkward connection with the word "music" in any of the senses in which the counsel supposes it legally possible it may have been used; whilst they are very proper to be used in reference to "goods, wares and merchandise."

It is true that the phrase, "not manufactured by the seller within this state," is not used in the indictment for the purpose of explaining the preceding portion of the charge. Its special office is that of setting forth a further distinct element of the offense. If, however, from its nature and position, it necessarily reflects on an ambiguous word, the sense in which the 793 *latter must have been used, I know of no rule which constrains us to reject the explanation, and to refuse to accept the word in the sense which will give force and validity to the indictment.

If the acceptation of the word "music," as importing a kind or class of goods, wares and merchandise, were not a matter of common understanding, it might have been necessary to aver in the indictment that it was goods, wares and merchandise, or to have given some such description of its properties as would necessarily show that to be the fact. But as such an application of the word is well understood, the law does not recognize the necessity of such averment or description, either to certify the court that the indictment contains a criminal charge, or to notify the defendant of its precise nature. The necessity of such an averment is not only disowned by the general principles to be deduced from the cases already cited, but is expressly denied by a decision of the Supreme court of Mississippi in a case very similar in its features to the one under consideration. I refer to the case of The State of Mississippi v. Borroum, 23 Miss. R. 477, in which the indictment was for buying from a slave "seventy-five pounds of cotton," under an act making it a misdemeanor to buy from a slave without the permission of his master, &c. any corn, fodder, hay, meal, &c. or "other produce or commodity." Cotton is not one of the commodities enumerated in the statute, and the indictment did not contain any averment that cotton was "a product or commodity." Yet the indictment was held sufficient.

The obvious reasons on which that decision was founded, apply with equal force here. The court is presumed to know the sense or senses in which a word is ordinarily used, and is not bound, when met by an ambiguous word in an indictment, to reject that meaning which is made obvious 794 by the context, and to contend *for some other use of the word that every man of ordinary information in the community, untrammeled by rules of construction, would discard as absurd. Neither the court or the defendant could have misunderstood the sense in which the word in question was intended to be used in the indictment.

Under these circumstances, to declare the indictment insufficient would be to revive an unreasonable strictness, and to pay to mere form the scrupulous deference that is shown in some of the early decisions, and is still observed in certain classes of cases before mentioned, but which the courts in modern times have on various occasions properly shown a determination to extend to no case or class of cases in which such observance is not exacted by the strictest analogy.

I think that the judgment of the Circuit court ought to be reversed, and that of the Corporation court affirmed.

The other judges concurred.

The judgment of the Circuit court reversed, and that of the Corporation court affirmed.

795 *Jackson v. The Commonwealth.

April Term, 1856, Richmond.

1. Order Changing Time of Holding Court—All Justices Present—Effect.—All the justices of a county being present in court, they make an order changing the months in which the quarterly courts are to be held, and also the day of the month on which the court is to commence. All the justices being present, a notice to them to attend was unnecessary; and the order is valid.*

2. Indictments—At Least Four Justices Must Be Present—Not Waived by Pleading.†—A County court at which an indictment is found by a grand jury, must consist of at least four justices, or the indictment is null. And the objection will not be waived by the defendant's pleading to issue, and being tried and found guilty before a court properly constituted, before making the objection.*

At the November term for 1853 of the County court of Lewis county, John G. Jackson was indicted for an assault and battery upon John Flanigan. Upon this indictment process was issued; and at the March term of the court for 1854, he appeared and put in the plea of "not guilty;" on which an issue was made up. At the June term of the court the case was tried and the jury found the defendant guilty, and assessed his fine at thirty dollars; and the court rendered a judgment upon the verdict. And at a subsequent day of the same term Jackson moved the court to arrest the judgment, "because the prosecution was conducted by a court composed of a less number of justices than that which is necessary to constitute a court for the prosecution" of the offense aforesaid. The cause was continued on this motion until the next term; and at the next term the court overruled the motion, and gave judgment against Jackson for the fine of thirty dollars. Whereupon he excepted.

796 *It appeared from an inspection of the record, that at the terms when the indictment was found by the grand jury, and when the defendant filed his plea, and the issue was made up thereon, the court was composed of but three justices; and the same was the case when the motion in arrest of judgment was overruled: But at the term when the cause was tried, and whilst the trial was progressing, there were more than four justices on the bench.

At the same term of the court, and on the 10th of August, Jackson moved the court to set aside the judgment rendered in the cause on the 8th day of the month, because by law the first day of the term was fixed to commence on the second Monday of the month, which in that month was the 14th day, and had not then arrived. But it appeared that at the June term 1854 the County court, without having been previously summoned for that purpose, but all the justices being present, entered an order, directing that there should be four terms of the court for the trial of causes by juries, to wit, March, June, August and November; and that the said terms in the months of March and August should be held on the first Mondays in said months; and the court therefore overruled the motion, and refused to set aside the judgment: And the defendant again excepted.

Jackson applied to the judge of the Circuit court for a writ of error to the judgment of the County court, which was allowed. But when the cause came on to be heard the Circuit court affirmed the judgment: Whereupon Jackson obtained a writ of error to this court.

Bennett, for the appellant.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

LEE, J. By the Code of Virginia
797 (ch. 157, § 2, *p. 616,) authority is given to the County courts to change from time to time, the days for the commencement of the terms thereof, all the justices of the county having been first summoned and a majority concurring in such change. The object of the provision requiring the summons is to give notice of the proposed change and to enable all the justices to be present and give their voices if they will, upon the question. If then without having been previously summoned, all the justices shall yet be actually present at the time a change is proposed and thus have the opportunity of being heard, and the requisite majority shall be found to concur in the measure, the object and spirit of the law will be fully satisfied and all questions as to the regularity or the fact of previous summons must be at an end and it will be in vain afterwards to say that the order is without effect because the justices had not been formally summoned previously to attend the court for the purpose of considering the subject. I think therefore there is nothing in the objection that the term at which the judgment occurred commenced upon a day not authorized by the law.

The other objection going to the constitution of the court at which the indictment against the plaintiff in error was found by the grand jury and of that at which the plea was entered is one of a much more serious and difficult character.

The constitution provides (art. 6, § 25,) that there shall be in each county of the commonwealth a county court which shall be held monthly by not less than three nor more than five justices except where the law shall require the presence of a greater number. By § 22 of the act passed April 22, 1852 (Sess. Acts p. 65,) it is provided that there shall be in each county in four of the months of every year, a quarterly term of every county court, and in 798 every other month a *monthly term thereof, to be held at the times and with the jurisdiction, so far as consistent with the constitution and that act, then prescribed by law. The section then proceeds to declare that the number of justices necessary to constitute a court of oyer and terminer a court of examination and courts in all criminal prosecutions shall be the same as then prescribed by law: in all civil cases and in matters of county police and in all other cases, except criminal, the presiding justice and two other justices, or in the absence of the presiding justice any three justices, to constitute a court, except where more than four are necessary under the laws then in force. By the Code (ch. 212, § 2, p. 877,) a court of oyer and terminer must consist of five justices at the least, and an examining court (ch. 205, § 4, p. 765,) of the same number: and by the general county court law of the Code (ch. 157, § 1, p. 615,) it is declared that the County court in each county shall be held by the justices of the county or any four or more of them, except where otherwise expressly provided. So that at the passage of the act of April 22, 1852, the number of justices necessary to constitute a court in a criminal prosecution other than cases for a court of oyer and terminer or of examination was four at the least. Does an indictment for an assault and battery or other misdemeanor constitute a criminal prosecution? Notwithstanding in some of the sections of the Code the term "criminal cases" may seem to be used in the sense of felonies only, in this there can be no doubt it is used to embrace both felonies and misdemeanors. The section itself refers to and recognizes the usual classification of causes inter partes, into civil and criminal cases, the latter of which embraces all prosecutions for offenses against the laws of whatever grade. And in the Code it will be seen, chapter 199 which is entitled "General provisions concerning crimes and punishments"
799 embraces alike misdemeanors *and felonies. The same is to be said of chapter 201, entitled "For preventing the commission of crimes" and of chapter 211, entitled "General provisions as to proceedings in criminal cases." Indeed throughout the body of the criminal code commencing with title 54, headed "Crimes and punishments" misdemeanors and felonies are alike contemplated as the subjects of criminal proceedings and by ch. 199, § 1, all offenses against the laws are declared to be the former or the latter. In § 22 the term "criminal prosecution" is expressly used in a sense embracing all offenses of both classes. Its language is "In a criminal prosecution other than for perjury, &c.;" yet perjury with a single exception (when committed on a trial for felony) is but a misdemeanor. By § 37 of ch. 208, provision is made for the adjournment of questions of law in "criminal case" to the General court; and it was never questioned that it embraced misdemeanors as well as felonies. And in ch. 201, § 11, provision is made where there is a conviction in a "criminal case" before a justice of the peace, which must be of course for a misdemeanor. Other sections will be found of similar import. And it will be observed this § 22 speaks of courts of oyer and terminer, courts of examination and courts in all criminal prosecutions: and as the county courts have no jurisdiction of felonies except as courts of oyer and terminer and of examination, to satisfy the terms employed, misdemeanors must be deemed to be intended.

It follows then that in a prosecution for a misdemeanor, the court to be legally constituted must consist of four justices at the least.

Nor is there any thing to restrict the necessity of the presence of four justices to the final trial of the cause. In many misdemeanors the court upon conviction, may, and in some, must impose corporal punishment by confinement in the county
800 jail and in *others by stripes. In certain cases still further penalties are incurred. Such being the grave character of many misdemeanors, and moreover as no writ of error lies for the commonwealth except in prosecutions for breach of the revenue laws, it may be supposed it was the purpose and policy of the law to secure in all criminal prosecutions the collective intelligence and information of four justices at least as affording a surer guaranty of a correct decision and the attainment of the ends of justice than that of a less number. And this reason would apply with equal force to other stages of the prosecution as to the final trial. For a case might be as effectually disposed of at a previous stage upon a motion to quash or a demurrer, or the tender of a plea, as at the trial before a jury. So upon the impaneling of a grand jury and in directing the subjects and the mode of its investigations and in receiving its presentments, important questions might arise upon which a party not yet charged with an offense would not be entitled to be heard. The reason and spirit of the law therefore would seem to require the presence of at least four justices when a grand jury is impaneled and the prosecution is commenced as well as upon the final trial of the case, whilst there is certainly nothing in its terms to render a less number sufficient. The language is "courts in all criminal prosecutions shall be &c." not "courts for the trial of criminal cases."

I think therefore the objection that the record upon its face shows there were but three justices present when a grand jury was impaneled and when an indictment was found, is fatal under the law as it stands, and that the only remaining question is whether it has been waived in this case or the benefit of it otherwise lost to the party by his pleading to issue and failing to raise it until after a verdict against him.

If the objection but imported some 801 imperfection or defect of *form in the indictment, or went merely to the qualification of the grand jurors or any one of them or any other matter of abatement it would be of course too late after verdict to attempt to raise it. But it is not of this character. It goes to the constitution of the court in which the prosecution was commenced by the finding of the indictment and in effect to the very fact of there being any indictment against the party. For if the court as constituted had no authority to impanel a grand jury and no jurisdiction either to commence or determine a prosecution by trial, the indictment must be of necessity a nullity. From its nature therefore it is an objection which is not waived by any pleading and which is not cured by any thing that afterwards transpired. In Cawood's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 527, the clerk had omitted to record the fact of the finding of the indictment, which had however in fact been endorsed by the foreman "a true bill" and presented in court with other bills. In the record of the proceedings had it was thus recited: "Benjamin Cawood who stands indicted for murder, was led to the bar in custody &c. and thereof arraigned and pleaded not guilty to the indictment &c." Another order spoke of the prisoner as "accused of murder" and made provision for a jury "for the trial" of the prisoner. An ineffectual trial was had and in the entry of the same the prisoner was spoken of again as standing indicted for murder. The jury having failed to agree, the prisoner petitioned for a change of venue which was granted. Yet held that the omission to record the finding of the indictment was fatal and could not be supplied by the paper itself nor the endorsement thereon nor by the subsequent recitals; and that the prisoner's plea of not guilty or the subsequent proceedings did not cure the defect. I think the reason for not holding the defect to be cured in the present case is at least as strong as in the case just
802 cited; and *regarding the objection as going to the foundation of the whole proceeding, the authority and jurisdiction of the court itself in which the prosecution was commenced, I think it was not and could not be cured by the subsequent proceedings and might be taken advantage of at any time either before verdict or after.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment of the Circuit court and that of the County court and to render judgment for the plaintiff in error.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

803 *Richards v. The Commonwealth.

October Term, 1856, Richmond.

Larceny—Case at Bar.—A person is staying at a tavern, and the landlord offers him a gun to go and shoot robins, which he takes, and after shooting once or twice near the house, goes off with the gun and disposes of it. HELD: Under the circumstances of the case, he is guilty of larceny.

William Richards was indicted in the Circuit court of Henrico county at its April term 1856, for larceny in stealing a gun, a bird bag and a powder flask, the property of Stephen B. Sweeney. At the same term of the court he was tried and convicted, and the jury fixed the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary at one year. The prisoner then moved the court for a new trial; but the motion was overruled, and sentence was passed upon him; and he excepted. The facts certified by the court are as follows:

It was proved that on the morning of the 16th day of March 1856, the prisoner was discharged from the penitentiary, and that he arrived at the tavern or public house of Stephen B. Sweeney, about twelve miles below Richmond, on the evening of that day, and took up lodgings here, and spent the night. That shortly after the prisoner arrived at said place, two other men came in, and after some conversation, determined to stay all night. These men, upon being interrogated during their stay, refused to give their names. The one of them, whose name is Livingston, was seen in custody on a criminal charge before the mayor of Richmond on the morning of the day this cause was tried. They and the prisoner were seen during their stay at Sweeney's to have several conversations together. The 804 prisoner said his name was *Blitz, and that he as the son of a man of that name who formerly resided at City Point, and was known to Sweeney. He stated to Sweeney that he and his father were still in business largely at City Point. That their store had been burned, and that they had set up in another place. That they were in the business of making barrels, tubs, &c. and that he the prisoner was on the look out for a contract for barrel timber. He was referred by Sweeney to James W. Binford, who was in that business in his neighborhood. He further stated that he had staid at Dr. Lyne's in Henrico the night before, and his mare had got away from him, and he supposed had crossed the river on her way home. All of these statements were proved to be false. The two other men went away the next morning, stating that they were going to Dr. Mettert's, who lived near Binford. The prisoner declined going with them, but said he would remain about during the day, and see what he could do. That Sweeney not liking to leave him by himself at his house during the day, asked him to walk with him to his field, which he did, and remained with him until Sweeney returned to dinner. After dinner Sweeney's son had been shooting some birds within a short distance of the house, and on his return to the house with his father's gun, Sweeney asked the prisoner if he was fond of shooting. Prisoner said yes, and then Sweeney offered prisoner his gun to shoot some robins. Prisoner took the gun and a bird bag and powder flask, and went over the road, and Sweeney heard him shoot once or twice before he Sweeney left the house on his return to the field. Prisoner did not solicit the use of the gun, but it was tendered by Sweeney of his own accord. This was about two o'clock on Monday, the day after prisoner came to Sweeney's. Prisoner did not return to the house with the gun, and in the evening Sweeney made pursuit and enquiries after him.

805 *It was further proved that prisoner was in Chesterfield at Shell's store about ten miles from Sweeney's on Tuesday, and traded off the gun with a young man named Shell for another gun and two dollars and fifty cents boot, and gave the shot bag and powder flask to the person to whom he traded the gun. He also sold Sweeney's pointer dog to said Shell for two dollars and fifty cents; which dog Sweeney missed after he had ascertained that the prisoner had left. He then sold the gun he had traded for to the father of said Shell, and left Shell's store soon after, and was seen going in a fast walk towards the woods. The gun and dog were advertised by Sweeney, who offered a reward of twenty-five dollars for them, and were received by him, and the reward paid some day or two after.

Prisoner was arrested a few days after, above Richmond.

While at Shell's store he stated that his name was Patterson, and that he was the son of Dr. Patterson of Manchester. It was proved that the articles specified in the indictment and disposed of by the prisoner were worth twenty dollars. The articles were proved to be the property of Sweeney. Prisoner went from Sweeney's without paying his bill. And these were all the material facts proved.

The prisoner applied to this court for a writ of error, which was allowed.

McRae, for the prisoner.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

MONCURE, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents for decision the question, whether the goods, of the larceny of which the prisoner was convicted, were taken by him against the will or without the consent of the owner.

Larceny, at common law, is the 806 taking and carrying *away of the personal goods of another, against his will or without his consent, and with a felonious intent. There must be a taking or severance of the goods from the possession of the owner on the ground that larceny includes a trespass. If there be no trespass in taking goods, there can be no larceny in carrying them away. 2 Russ. 95; 1 Hawk. c. 33, § 2. But the possession of the owner may be actual or constructive. If it appear that although there is a delivery by the owner, yet the legal possession still remains exclusively in him, larceny may be committed exactly as if no such delivery had been made. Thus, if a person to whom goods are delivered has the bare charge, custody or use of them, and the legal possession remains in the owner, such person may commit larceny by a fraudulent conversion of the goods to his own use. 2 Russ. 106; 1 Hale 506; 1 Hawk. c. 33, § 6;

Arch. Crim. Pl. edition of 1846, p. 192. The most familiar application of the rule is, to the case of servants, whose possession of their master's goods by his delivery or permission is the possession of the master himself; 2 Russ. 197; 2 East P. C. 564, 682, 683; Walker v. Commonwealth, 8 Leigh 743; and to the case of a guest at an inn, who may be guilty of larceny in taking a piece of plate or other thing set before him for his accommodation; for he hath not the possession delivered to him, but merely the use. 2 Russ. 107; Arch. 192; 1 Hale 506; 1 Hawk. c. 33, § 1. "The distinction, (says Russell,) between a bare charge or special use of goods, and a general bailment of them, seems to be sufficiently intelligible; and it seems consistent with principle, that in the former case the legal possession should be considered as remaining in the owner: and in the latter as having passed to the bailee; and that therefore in the former case larceny may be committed of them by the person to whom they have been delivered, and that in the 807 *latter it may not, unless there be a determination of the privity of contract: but it is in the application of this doctrine to particular cases that the distinctions seem to become obscure." 2 Russ. 108. How does the doctrine apply to the facts of this case? Were the goods delivered to the prisoner on a bailment; or merely for special use, and without changing the legal possession of the owner?

If the prisoner had fraudulently converted to his own use a piece of plate, or other thing delivered to him for his accommodation as a guest in the tavern of the prosecutor, we have seen that he would have been guilty of larceny. If he had so converted to his own use a book handed to him to read for his amusement while he continued to be such guest, there can be no doubt he would have been guilty of larceny. Why does not the same principle apply to this case, in which the prisoner fraudulently converted to his own use a gun delivered to him "to shoot some robins" for his amusement while he continued to be such guest? Is it because the gun was not to be used in the house? The rule under consideration does not require the property to be used in the house of the owner. Suppose the prosecutor had accompanied the prisoner when he went over the road to shoot the robins, and the gun had been converted in the presence of the prosecutor: Or, suppose the gun had been handed to the prisoner to shoot some robins in full view of the house, and that, instead of shooting them, he had walked off with the gun and converted it to his own use: Would he not, in either case, have been guilty of larceny? But the rule does not require that the property should be converted in the presence or the sight of the owner. Nor indeed does it require that the relation of master and servant, or landlord and guest, should exist between the owner of the property and the person converting it. No writer has 808 *laid down the rule under any such restriction. As laid down by all the writers, it only requires that the person converting the property should be entitled merely to a charge or special use, and not the legal possession of it. In the familiar cases of master and servant, and landlord and guest, the rule generally, if not always, applies; because generally, if not always, a servant or guest has a mere charge or special use of the property of the master or landlord. These cases are therefore stated by writers as instances of the application of the rule; but as instances only, and not as limitations or restrictions of the rule. The question in every case is, Whether, under all the circumstances, a bare charge or special use, or a legal possession under a bailment exists? There is rarely any difficulty in solving the question when the relation of master and servant, or landlord and guest subsists between the parties at the time of the conversion, or where the property is delivered to be used in the presence of the owner. In cases of this kind, the property being resumable by the owner every moment, his dominion over it is as perfect as before; and the person to whom it is delivered has at most no more than a bare limited use or charge and not the legal possession of it. 2 Russ. 108. The same principle seems to be generally applicable wherever property, whether it be a gun or any thing else, held by a person, whether he be an inn keeper or not, for the use and accommodation of his family, is delivered to a member or visitor of the family to be temporarily used by him as such, whether in the presence of the owner or not.

A difficulty sometimes arises in the application of the rule to other cases. Generally, though not always, where property is delivered to a person who is not a servant or guest of the owner, or a member or visitor of his family, and to be used 809 elsewhere than in the *owner's presence, a bailment, and not a mere charge or special use, is created. There is no difficulty, we think, in the application of the rule to this case. The relation of landlord and guest subsisted between the prosecutor and prisoner, who were strangers to each other at the time of the conversion. The relation was expected to be of very short duration, and to terminate during the same evening, or at least the next morning. The occasion for delivering the gun was very sudden; and was induced by the return of the prosecutor's son from shooting some birds within a short distance of the house. The object of it was to afford the prisoner some amusement during the evening while the prosecutor was absent in his field. It was not intended that the use should continue longer than the prisoner continued to be a guest; nor expected that the gun would be carried far from the house, and perhaps not off the land of the prosecutor. It was offered to the prisoner "to shoot some robins;" and he took the gun, bird bag and powder flask, and went over the road; and prosecutor heard him shoot once or twice before he left the house on his return to the field. Under these circumstances, we think the prisoner had a mere special use of the property, and not a legal possession of it; that the owner's legal possession was unbroken by such special use; that the property was in his legal possession when it was fraudulently carried away by the prisoner; and that the prisoner took it against the will or without the consent of the owner. He was therefore properly convicted of larceny.

Being of opinion that the delivery of the property by the prosecutor to the prisoner did not amount to a bailment, it is of course unnecessary to consider whether the evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the felonious intent existed at the time of such delivery; or whether, 810 if such delivery *had amounted to a bailment, and the felonious intent had not existed at the time of the delivery, but had arisen afterwards, the prisoner would have been guilty of larceny under the Code, ch. 192, § 21, p. 730.

We are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment, and that it be affirmed.

DANIEL, J. The certificate of facts shows that the delivery of the property, of the theft whereof the prisoner has been convicted, was made to him by the owner. In order, therefore, to vindicate the judgment of the Circuit court, it must, I apprehend, be shown, either that the delivery was fraudulently procured by the prisoner with a felonious intent, at the time, to convert the property to his own use, or that the purposes and uses with and for which the delivery was made, were of a nature so restricted and special as to leave the legal possession of the property, notwithstanding the delivery, still exclusively in the owner, and to place the prisoner, on his subsequent conversion of the property, in the same predicament as if he had then acquired the possession, against the consent of the owner, and with a felonious design.

It must be conceded that the conduct of the prisoner is well calculated to produce the impression that he came to Sweeney's with some bad design. It does not seem uncharitable to found, on the various false statements which he made to Sweeney about himself, his business, his plans, and his relationship and connexion with others, and his subsequent conduct in the conversion of the property of Sweeney, the suspicion that he was on the look-out for a favorable opportunity to practice some fraud on Sweeney, or perhaps to perpetrate a larceny of some of his goods. It must, however, I think, be also conceded that the conduct of the prisoner, in making these false statements, is not irreconcilable with the idea that he designed and 811 *wished thereby merely to produce upon Sweeney's mind favorable impressions as to his character and standing, without any purpose of ulterior fraud or wrong to him or others. It is obvious that the testimony does not disclose the resort to any trick, device, stratagem or artifice by the prisoner, which from its very nature held out an immediate inducement or motive to Sweeney to lend the gun, or indeed to trust the prisoner with the possession of any of his goods. Indeed, it does not appear that the prisoner gave any intimation, by word or deed, that he desired the use of the gun. He was the mere recipient of an unsolicited act of courtesy or kindness gratuitously proffered by the owner of the property. And unless it can be maintained that every man who resorts to falsehood for the purpose of creating or maintaining with another a character for respectability, trustworthiness or responsibility, may be treated as a thief when he converts to his own use property which may have been entrusted to him on the faith of such character, I do not see how we can hold that the delivery of the property was in this case procured by fraud. The conduct of the prisoner preceding the delivery of the property is reconcilable with too many hypotheses—the pointings of his falsehoods seem to me too indeterminate and vague—the delivery of the property appears too remotely connected with the means supposed to have been used by him to effect it—to justify us in deducing the loan of the gun or license to use it as the legal consequence of the prisoner's fraud.

The verdict of the jury, it is true, especially in respect to what it must be taken to say relative to the prisoner's motives and designs, is entitled to great weight. Still, after allowing to the verdict the fullest weight authorized by the practice now prevailing in this court, I have been unable to discover, in the certificate 812 *of facts, any sufficient warrant for the prisoner's conviction, so far as it rests on the first ground here taken in its support.

Can it be sustained on the second ground? There can, I apprehend, be no doubt that when the delivery of goods is fairly obtained on hire or loan, no subsequent wrongful conversion of them pending the contract will amount to larceny.

There are, it is true, many cases in the English courts holding that when the purpose of the hiring or loan for which the delivery was made had ended, felony might be committed by a conversion of the goods. This doctrine, so far as it could be invoked here, was, however, fully considered by the judges in the case of Rex v. Banks, 1 Russ. & Ry. Cr. Cases 441, and decided to be wrong.

It appeared that the prisoner had borrowed a horse for the purpose, as he said, of carrying a child to a surgeon. Whether he carried the child thither did not appear; but the day following, after the purpose for which he borrowed the horse was over, he took the horse in a different direction, and sold it. The jury (it is stated) thought the prisoner had no felonious intention when he took the horse; but as it was borrowed for a special purpose, and that purpose was over, when the prisoner took the horse to the place where he sold it, the judge presiding at the trial submitted it to the consideration of the judges whether the subsequent disposing of the horse, when the purpose for which it was borrowed was no longer in view, did not in law include in it a felonious taking. Upon consideration, the judges were of opinion that the doctrine on the subject asserted in previous cases was not correct. They held that if the prisoner had not a felonious intention when he originally took the horse, his subsequent withholding and disposing of it did not 813 *constitute a new felonious taking, or make him guilty of felony; and that consequently the conviction could not be supported.

I have seen no subsequent decision, in which the authority of this case has been questioned: And in the 2d vol. of Russell on Crimes, p. 57, the author, after citing the case, declares upon the force of it, that it is now settled, that when the owner parts with the possession of goods for a special purpose, and the bailee, when that purpose is executed, neglects to return, and afterwards disposes of them, if such bailee had not a felonious intention when he originally took the goods, a subsequent withholding and disposing of them will not constitute a new felonious taking, nor make him guilty of felony.

So again, at page 21 of his second volume, the author says that there were decisions to the effect that when the delivery of goods is made for a certain special and particular purpose, the possession is still supposed to reside unparted with in the first proprietor. And that if a watchmaker steal a watch delivered to him to clean; or if a person steal goods in a chest delivered to him with the key for safe custody; or clothes delivered for the purpose of being washed: In all these instances he says the goods taken have been thought to remain in the possession of the proprietor, and the taking of them away held to be felony. But (he adds) unless in these cases the privity of contract under which the goods were delivered, appeared by some means to have been determined, it seems difficult to distinguish them from the cases of a goldsmith to whom plate is delivered to work or to weigh; a tailor to whom cloth is delivered that he may make clothes with it; and a friend who is entrusted with property to keep for the owner's use; in which cases an embezzlement or conversion of the goods by the party to whom they are 814 delivered, has *been said not to amount to felony. In these latter cases, (he continues,) as well as in the former, the delivery of the goods is made only for a special purpose; yet it seems that the possession of them has not been considered as remaining with the owner, but as having passed to the party by lawful delivery without fraud, and therefore not the subject of subsequent felonious taking.

It is argued here, however, that as the prisoner was the guest of Sweeney at the time when he acquired possession of the gun, though he took it not only by the consent but at the instance of Sweeney, he does not stand on the same footing as if no such relation between the parties existed. It is argued that, because of such relation, and the character of the license given to him, he is to be treated as having the bare custody of the gun, and that the exclusive legal possession must still, notwithstanding such custody, be held to have remained with Sweeney.

As the main stress of the effort to sustain the conviction was laid on this ground, I have made it the subject of the fullest examination and consideration in my power. But I have been unable to discover in the authorities to which I have had access, any sufficient warrant for such distinction. It is true, in Hale's Pleas of the Crown, vol. 1, p. 505, it is said that he that hath the care of another's goods hath not the possession of them, and therefore may by his felonious embezzling of them be guilty of felony; as the butler that hath the charge of the master's plate, the shepherd that hath the charge of his master's sheep. The like law for him that takes a piece of plate set before him to drink in a tavern, &c. for he hath only a liberty to use, not a possession by delivery.

So in East's Crown Law, vol. 2, p. 682, after citing instances in which the delivery had been held to confer the bare charge or custody, as distinguished from 815 *the possession, the author says, the same rule applies to him who has a bare special use of goods; as in the case of a guest in the owner's house: for none of these persons have properly speaking the possession. The proposition is stated in like terms in other elementary works.

I can perceive nothing in these declarations and illustrations of general principles, from which to infer that there is any thing in the relation between a transient guest and the inn keeper, with whom he is staying, which places the guest on a footing of criminal responsibility, in respect to the goods of the inn keeper, different from that which would be occupied by any other person to whom goods might be delivered for a momentary purpose to be accomplished in the house, or in the presence of the owner. Thus I apprehend, in the case of the piece of plate, if instead of being placed before the guest to drink, it were handed to a mere stranger to admire its style or workmanship, and then hand it back to the owner, the carrying it away by the stranger with a felonious intent would be as clearly a larceny as if the same act were done by the guest. So I suppose if an artisan or mechanic should go into a room of an inn, by the direction or permission of the owner to repair the furniture, and he should avail himself of the opportunity feloniously to carry away the furniture, the measure of his guilt would be the same with that of the guest who should wrongfully convert any article of the landlord's furniture put in his room for his temporary use. And so again, in the familiar case (so often mentioned in the books) of one invited to try the paces of a horse in the presence of the owner, and going off with the horse, I apprehend that it would make no difference whether the wrongdoer were the guest of the owner or a mere stranger. In either case, there would be a larceny of the horse.

816 *The true reason, I apprehend, why the guest, in the cases just mentioned, would be held guilty of larceny, is drawn not from the nature of any relation between him and the inn keeper, but from the consideration that the property used by him is expected to remain in the house or presence of the owner, and so within his constant and immediate control. This will, I think, be fully seen by a further reference to the paragraph in East, from which the citation, in respect to the wrongful conversion by a guest in the owner's house, has been made. So (in the very next sentence he proceeds) if a weaver or silk throwster deliver yarn or silk to be wrought by journeymen in his house, and they carry it away with intent to steal it, it is felony; for the entire property remains then only in the owner, and the possession of the workman is the possession of the owner. But if the yarn had been delivered to a weaver out of the house, and he having the lawful possession, had afterwards embezzled it, this would not be felony; because by the delivery he had a special property and not a bare charge; in the same manner as one who is entrusted with the care of a thing for another to keep. It is worthy of consideration (he continues) whether the above mentioned distinction concerning the legal possession remaining in the owner, after a delivery in fact to another, does not extend to all cases where the thing so delivered for a special purpose is intended to remain in the presence of the owner. For in such case, the owner cannot be said to give any credit to, or to repose any confidence in, the party in whose hands it is so in fact placed; and the thing being intended to be returned to the owner again, and resumable by him every moment, his dominion over it is as perfect as before; and the person to whom it is so delivered has at most no more than a bare limited use or charge, and not the legal possession of it.

817 *This fiction, (he adds,) such as it is, is generally admitted to exist in the case of servants, and even in the case of other persons having a special use of goods in the owner's house: the best reason for which is the presumed presence and superintendence of the owner. And it does not seem more unreasonable to regard goods in the actual presence of the owner, out of his house, as being in his legal possession, though put into another's hands for a particular purpose, than if such goods were delivered to another for the like purpose in the owner's house during his absence.

The same author shows, I think, conclusively, that this fiction of the supposed superintendence and consequent exclusive legal possession, by the owner, of goods entrusted to another for a special use, can have no application (except in the case of servants) when, by the terms of the delivery, the goods are to be used neither in the house nor presence of the owner. For at p. 564, after stating that the rule holds universally in the case of servants whose possession of their master's goods by their delivery or permission is the possession of the master himself, he adds, that supposing the maxim well founded, it leads to an important difference between the case of servants and others: for if there be a delivery of goods by a master to his servant for a particular purpose, and he embezzle them, it amounts to felony, although there be no evidence of a prior felonious intent at the time he received the goods; because even after the delivery to him the goods continued in the legal possession of the master and not of the servant; and therefore the act of converting them fraudulently is in law a tortious taking from the possession of the master. But it is otherwise in the case of a legal delivery to any other than a servant; for then unless such delivery were procured by fraud and the jury find a previous felonious intent to convert the goods, ex-818 isting at the *time of the delivery, a subsequent conversion is not felony; unless (he further adds) in those cases (which he says will be subsequently pointed out) where the privity of contract is determined. The last expression in the way of exception cannot impair the force of the general proposition asserted by the author, inasmuch as it will be found, on looking to the cases referred to by him in respect to the determination of the privity of contract, that they belong to a class of cases which, so far as they could apply here, have been overruled by the decision in Rex v. Banks, already cited.

There are several English decisions, (some of which were cited at the bar,) in respect to the conversion of cattle by parties employed to drive them to market, which may seem at first view to be in conflict with the general principle asserted by East. But in those cases and in cases of a like kind, where convictions have been sustained, it will be found that the judges (when they have assigned the reasons from their opinion) have generally if not invariably declared that they regarded the accused as having acquired the charge or custody of the property as servants. If, however, some of these cases may still be considered as having established exceptions to the general principle, it cannot, I apprehend, be affirmed of any of them, that they have gone to the extent of placing the possession of one to whom property has been loaned, on the footing of the charge or custody by a servant of his master's goods, or that they assert any doctrine from which to deduce that a transaction, which would otherwise be defined as a bailment, becomes a mere charge, by the consideration that the party to whom the property is delivered, is the visitor or guest of the owner.

But if it were so that the relation in which the prisoner stood to Sweeney

Digitized by Google

819 could affect the case, it would, *I apprehend, have still to be shown that the delivery and use of the gun was incidental or accessory to that relation. Of this there is no proof. It does not appear that it was the custom of Sweeney to furnish his guests with guns for their amusement, or that he held out to the public any expectation that he would do so. The transaction is one which might have taken place between Sweeney and any one of his neighbors (not a guest) as naturally as between him and the prisoner. And if it had, could we have hesitated to say that there was a bailment of the gun by loan? The gun was delivered, not that something might be done to it, or with it, for the benefit of the owner, but to be used by the prisoner for his own amusement. There was nothing said from which it can be inferred that it was to be used merely in the presence of Sweeney or within his hearing or call or upon his farm.

The prisoner, without any violation of the terms or spirit of the license given him, might, in pursuit of his game, have gone to any place from which he could return before the expiration of the time when his return might be reasonably expected. And he might thus have lawfully placed himself and the property in his possession during such time entirely beyond the control or supervision of Sweeney. And there is nothing in the record from which we can infer he did not. During such period the dominion of Sweeney over his property was to a certain extent, by his own consent, necessarily suspended by his want of the present power either to resume the possession, or to demand it, and place the prisoner in the position of a wrong-doer on his refusal to return it.

The transaction seems to me, therefore, to have all the features of a loan. As such, it invested the prisoner with a legal possession. In the subsequent conversion of the property he was guilty of no trespass, and consequently of no felony.

820 *It may be that the prisoner's conduct, considered morally, is in little or no degree less deserving of punishment than if he had acquired the possession of the property by fraud or stealth; still I have been unable to see (as the proofs stand) on what established rule of criminal law he can be treated as guilty of larceny. And having as I conceive no warrant to stretch or fashion the law to meet the supposed or real moral exigencies of the case, I cannot concur in a judgment affirming his conviction.

I am of the opinion that the prisoner is entitled to a new trial.

12. An executor having received assets of his testator, the debts are charged upon his real estate by his official bond.
Baylor's lessee v. Dejarnette, 152

13. If the liability of one joint obligor in a bond is defeated on a ground not personal to himself, (as infancy, bankruptcy or death,) the liability of all the obligors is at an end; and therefore one obligor is an incompetent witness for his co-obligor in an action on the bond.
Brown's adm'r v. Johnson, 644
Isbell's ex'or v. Johnson, 644

14. The statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 98, § 3, p. 359, Code, ch. 144, § 13, p. 582, in relation to joint obligations, though it gives an action against the personal representative of a deceased obligor, does not affect the principle, that the defeat of the remedy against one joint obligor upon a ground not personal to himself, defeats it as to all the obligors. Idem, 644

BOUNDARIES.

1. Three or four corners of a large survey are ascertained; but between these ascertained corners the patent calls for several lines and courses. In fixing the boundaries of the land, the lines calling for these ascertained corners must be run thereto, though this may require a variation of both course and distance; but where a corner is called for which is not found, the course and distance called for in the patent must govern; and an average allowance of variation in each course and line called for between the ascertained corners is not to be made.
Clements v. Kyles, 468
